Introduction

I was born in Zululand on the 21st July 1921 according to my father. When my father met my mother, he had just lost his wife and a number of children in a terrible influenza epidemic, which had spread through Southern Africa, killing thousands of people in the years 1918 and 1919. Thus my father was a widower with three surviving children.

When my parents met it was in the year 1920, and my father was a builder and a Christian, and my mother was a young Zulu girl who practiced the ancient religion of the Zulu people. I am told that my parents were deeply in love with each other and wanted to get married, but the white missionaries forbade my father from marrying my mother until she became a Christian.

My mother's father was a crusty old warrior who had taken part in the bitter wars that the Zulus had fought against the English, and he coldly refused to allow his daughter to come under the yoke of what he called the "religion of our enemies." I cannot allow my child to become a Christian," my grandfather was said to have said," These Christians are a race of thieves, of liars, and murderers, who stole our country from us at sword point and at gunpoint. I would rather die than see a Christ worshipping Christian within the stockade of my village. Never!"

Caught between catholic missionaries on one hand, and a stubborn old Zulu warrior on the other, my mother and father had no choice but to separate. Although my father already suspected that my mother was pregnant. A great scandal broke out in my grandfather's village when my mother's pregnancy was discovered. My grandfather chased my mother out of his homestead and she was taken by one of her aunts to her own village and there she gave birth to me, an illegitimate child, a child of shame. In those days there was no greater shame among the Zulus than for a girl to give birth out of wedlock. A great stigma was attached to this thing. After a time however, my grandfather allowed my mother - whom he loved dearly to return, back to his village and he insisted that she was not to see my father again.

It so happened that when I was about a year old, a younger brother of my fathers, who had heard about my birth come up from the Natal South Coast to my mothers village and asked my grandfathers permission to take me away, permission that my grandfather angrily granted. "Remove this disgrace from my home, Christian fellow!" he said to my fathers brother," And tell your brother that if I ever set eyes on him, I will make him suffer bitterly for what he did to my daughter. I will seize him and kill him very slowly indeed. Tell him that. I was taken to my father's home in the South of Natal, on the northern bank of the Umkumazi River, and there I grew up. And it was while growing up that it was discovered that I was something of a visionary and a prophet. A talent, which together with an artistic inclination, to draw and to sculpt, the woman who now brought me up, my fathers new wife, did her uttermost to suppress.

I did not attend school until I was well within my 14th year of life. And because my family now kept on travelling, as a result of my fathers building profession, which took him from town to town, we became a family of travellers, who never stayed long in one place.

In 1935, my father found a job, a major building job, in the Transvaal and he brought us all from natal to join him where he was building. I attended school on and off in different schools, and then, in 1937 I went through great shock and trauma, when I was seized and sodomized by a gang of mineworkers outside a mine compound. This caused me to be ill for a long time.

And although I was taken to white doctors, I could find no help until my fathers brother, the same one who had taken me away from my maternal grandfather decided to take me back to my mothers village in the hope that I would find help there. And I did. My grandfather, a man whom my father despised as a heathen and a demon worshipper helped me and brought me back to health, where Christian doctors had failed. I, still a Christian and a confessing catholic, had not believed at all that my grandfather would be able to help me. And I was greatly surprised when he did, and I began to wonder were not the missionaries wrong when they called people such as my grandfather ungodly heathens. If my grandfather had been a stupid heathen savage, as white missionaries loved to call people like him, how is it that he had been able to help me?

It was here that I began to question many things that I never questioned before. Where our ancestors really the savages that quiet missionaries would have us believe they were? Were we Africans really a race of primitives who possessed no knowledge at all before the white man came to Africa? These and many, many other questions began to haunt my mind. And then one day when he was sure that I was fully returned to health, my grandfather told me that the illness that had been troubling me for so long, had actually been a sacred illness which required that I had to become a shaman, a healer. And when the old man said this to me, I readily agreed to undergo initiation at the hands of one of my grandfather's daughters, a young sangoma named Myrna.

When they heard that I had become a sangoma, both my father and my stepmother, told my maternal uncle that I was never to set foot in their home again. And so I found myself on my own, a youth without a home, without family and so I began travelling. First I went to Swaziland and then the land of the Basotho, and I developed a wanderlust that was to be with me until today. I was not travelling for enjoyment, however I was travelling for knowledge, in search of clarity of mind and in search of the truth about my people.

Sometimes I would find jobs for a few months and then move on. Sometimes I found myself travelling with missionaries, the very people in whom I no longer believed. Sometimes I found myself travelling with miners, returning home from the Johannesburg gold mines. I came into contact with men and women of countries that I had not known about before. I learned things that

I had not known about before. I experienced things, which only those that walk the path of the healer in Africa experience.

If a strange thing was happening in the place that I happened to be, I became one of those who were summoned to that place to help using Africa's ancient wisdom and knowledge in that situation. I found myself amongst amazing and strange people. I found myself amongst men and women, possessing knowledge that was already ancient when the man Jesus Christ was born. I heard stories from the lips of storytellers that went back to the remotest of the remote times. Stories that very few had ever heard before.

As the years past, I became filled with a fanatical obsession; I realized how rapidly Africa was changing. I realized to my shock and sorrow that the culture of my people, a culture that I had thought immortal, was actually dying. Very, very soon the Africa that I knew would become a forgotten thing. A thing of the past and I decided to try and preserve somehow, what I could of my people's culture. How was I to do that? Friends advised me to write books. One friend advised me to build living museums in which I would preserve the dying culture of my people, and I struggled very hard to bring these things about. I wrote books, and I tried to borrow money from banks and organizations supposedly established to help black people who wanted to establish businesses.

Again and again, I was disappointed until, after long years of struggle. In 1975 I succeeded in obtaining permission and funds to build the first living museum, for the preservation of my people's knowledge, religion and culture, in the centre of Soweto. Many black people misunderstood the purpose of my having built this living museum. They falsely accused me of cooperating with the apartheid regime and of quote-"glamorising the Soweto ghetto"

But I did not see myself as a politician, I saw myself as a healer, whose duty it was to preserve the greatness of his people, regardless of which government happened to be in power in South Africa. I saw myself as a healer whose purpose it was to create job opportunities for my starving people in Soweto, regardless of whether we were ruled by the apartheid regime or the A.N.C government. I believed firmly that knowledge was about politics and that a race that did not know its true greatness, will never obtain full freedom. And I was saddened by the fact that our people were making huge sacrifices, fighting for freedom when they did not know their full greatness. I said to my now late wife, Cecilia, and myself that if our people gain freedom under these circumstances, that freedom would be an illusion and a fraud.

Years of careful investigation had taught me the European powers that had colonized Africa had done more than just beat our people into submission with artillery and rifles. They had done more than simply sow confusion amongst our people by introducing many conflicting versions of the Christian religion amongst the people. They had deliberately so brain washed our people, that Africans had lost all self-knowledge, self-love, self-respect, self-pride and self-dependency. If you rob a people of all these things you turn them into a race of robots, forever dependent upon you. And even if you stood up and walked away from these people, and said tot them that you were giving them back their freedom, they would stand up and follow you wherever you are going for their minds were still your slaves even though their bodies were now free of your chains.

I believed then as I believe now, that the African has never really gained freedom and independence. Which is why our people have not been able to achieve what nations such as India and the tiger Nations of South East Asia, which were once also colonized by the white people as we were, have today achieved. For example today India is a nuclear power feared and respected by all nations on earth. India is admired for its great culture and its ancient religious philosophies as well as its other philosophies. While Africa is a downtrodden casualty of history forever dependent like a whipped slave upon her former oppressors.

This breaks my heart as a black man, I who, over many years of travelling through my motherland, have discovered that there was a time when we, the black people now held in contempt by many races were once masters of the world. When we, now derided as a nation of savages incapable of ruling itself were once the tutors of the early world, I feel great bitterness, when I see how far we have been made to fall. We whose sons and daughters once walked tall in the Americas, not as slaves but rather as civilizes and rulers. I wept when I found out that we were once the founders of some of the world's oldest civilizations.

We were there in Sumeria, we were there in India, we founded great kingdoms in Cambodia, and the first man to be saluted as emperor of China was one of us, a son of Africa, a black man. Buddha was a black man from Africa, his earliest statues confirm this. Krishna was a black warrior. The goddess Kali, is depicted as an African woman. Even the bible states that Nimrod was a great man in the eyes of the Lord and he was the father of Cush, who founded the great cushite nation. I weep even now when I see Africans slaughter each other in the streets of South Africa, now supposedly a free nation. I weep even now when my people hunger and suffer in the veld in South Africa.

I weep even now when Euro centric education is being fed to our children. Fed in order to make them Afrofobes, creatures that hate and despise their motherland, which look down in contempt upon their own people, because this is what all European educated black people to do. They despise Africa and all she stands for. And they are in contempt of the culture of her people. They are still even now doing the colonialists dirty work for them, because if you want to destroy the culture of a nation, you must brainwash the youth of that nation and make them do your dirty work for you.

There is not a single university in Africa, even now which teaches our people the truth about themselves. There is not a single school in South Africa even now which teaches our people about what it means to be an African. Our children who will stone a Sangoma to death, who will burn an Inyanga to death with a petrol soaked car tire even now, do not know, and were never taught that Africans were once kings of the Americas. They were founders of the amazing Olmec Civilization, whose breath taking relics craved in eternal stone still amaze visitors in museums to this day.

Our children who would gladly spit at the face of a sangoma, who hate the traditional dress of their people, would gladly put on a highland kilt, not knowing that amongst the founders of the Scottish nation were black men and woman and that the surnames of some of these Scotsmen, confirm this. Sholto-Douglas, what does this word mean? What does this Surname mean? Sholto-Douglas. It means Behold the black man. Black knights once fought for the kings of Scotland, and the Danish people who are fraudulently represented in the history books as blond and pink skinned Nordics, had large numbers of black men in their ranks. When Alfred slaughtered the Danes, in England so many years ago, amongst the warriors that he slew were dark skinned men, whose ancestors had come to Denmark from Africa thousands of years before. All these truths are hidden from our children.

Our political leaders, fail to create United Nations in Africa. Our political leaders live on a razors edge in Africa everywhere. They sit on shaky thrones from which they can get kicked off by any armed thug carrying the rank of colonel or general. Why? Because you can never build a viable nation on the cesspit of self-ignorance and self-despite. I have seen many African leaders at first sight, I have spoken to some of these men and all of them have one thing in common, they are simply white men in black skins. And this is why they fail again and again to create a peaceful, progressing and prosperous Africa. They are still slaves of their long departed colonial masters. Look at what is happening in South Africa now. Look at the confusion and the crime, the disunity and the epidemic political killings. What do all these things tell you? That our people lack self-pride and self-knowledge and therefore can never be politically united ever.

I have suffered in the cause of my battle against shadows. When you are fighting against ignorance you suffer just as much as you if you were on a battlefield under gun fire. I have lost people I love; I have lost a woman I love years ago in 1960 to the guns of the white man. To the guns of the oppressive regime In was falsely accused of being a supporter of. I lost a son, my first-born son, Innocent, to the knives of black activists, murdering people under the banner of the mass democratic movement.

I came close to losing another son to the spears of the Inkatha freedom party, God have mercy upon us! I have been cheated by whites who took advantage of my ignorance and stupidity and who robbed me of millions of rands of money I made out of my books. Even as I am talking to you now there is a white woman, who deceived me into signing away everything that I wrote, everything that I painted, and everything that I sculpted. I have suffered, and am still suffering. Even now there are white men that have set my own children, my sons against me. A born again Christian preacher of lies brain washed my daughters mind and stole her away from me, saying, you must not talk to your father , he is a devil worshipper.

I am not seeking anybodies sympathy when I am telling you this; I just want you all to know who and what Credo Mutwa is. I am one of the scums of this earth, a creature dejected and ridiculed by university professors. Professors who later came sneaking into my home seeking the very information that they ridiculed me for revealing. I am a black man who has every reason to be bitter and angry. But somehow I cannot get myself to be angry. You cannot be angry at the ignorant. You cannot but pity the self-destructive.

Many years ago I was fortunate enough to find a woman who loved me, a woman who became my wife and the mother of my seven children. This woman was a strong and godly woman whose quietness, hid a person of steel, this woman gave up drinking, gave up dependence on alcohol out of the love of her children, and of love of fool and the cretin that she married. Today I stand alone, a man rejected by the world. A widower who lost his wife a few months ago under extremely sinister circumstances. My wife went to hospital supposedly suffering from cancer of the uterus, while I was away, and x-rays showed a strange metal device inside her womb.

Nobody knows what this device was. Nobody knows how it had got into my wife's uterus, but before my wife passed away, I received a threatening letter warning me not to talk to a man named David Icke or else my wife would die. I did not take that warning seriously, and my wife died within two weeks after I had received it. I have every reason to be angry with the frot that is called western civilization. I have every reason to be angry with the various foreign religions that enslave our peoples minds and blinker their vision. I have every reason to be angry with education systems that rob our people of their true worth, of the truth about themselves. This is my friends is Credo Mutwa.

I am a sculptor, who has created large sculptures in various parts of south Africa. I am a painter who has painted pictures that were afterwards stolen from him, by exploiters. I am the writer of books, whose books fill the pockets of others with money, and not his own. That is Credo Mutwa. I have used the knowledge that I acquired over many years of investigation and travel, I have used that knowledge to create job opportunities for my starving people. The villages that I built in Soweto, and which were destroyed by misguided youths.

The villages that I built in Mafekeng, and the village and the statues that I built in the Eastern Cape, placed bread in the hands of my starving fellow South Africans. I made jobs where there are none. I made livings for my people where there had been none. I believe that a truly democratic country, is a country that uses the spiritual talents and the heritage of its people to feed the hungry and clothe the naked. But what has been my reward? I have been scorned; demonise lied about by conspirators, who delight in setting black against black, by gullible blacks that swallow any garbage white newspapers feed them. If you speak about the international conspires, that is the government behind many countries governments, people laugh at you for a fourteen carrot lunatic, but there is such a thing and it is ruining my people even now.

The Aids epidemic which will soon wipe out great tribes, such as the Zulus, my people, is no accident, neither is the flood of drugs that is sweeping over this once beautiful country. The soaring crime wave is no accident. The epidemic of political killings which are almost a daily occurrence in some parts of South Africa is no accident either. All these things are planned by someone and carried out by someone on behalf of that someone.

They tell us that the high incidence of rape in South Africa is a macho thing. Rubbish! It is deliberate, it is planned, and most of the woman that is raped in South Africa is raped for black magical purposes. Children who disappear; where do they disappear to? In South Africa today, criminals have got more rights than law-abiding citizens. A criminal will kill your father, in the morning, be arrested in the afternoon and be released on bail on the following morning to come back and kill you who helped the police to put him behind bars. Today in South Africa, as in Prohibition era, America, the distinction between the police and the criminals is getting dimmer and dimmer by the day. And all this is no accident.

Africa My People

There are many shameful things that are being done to Africa and her people by Western nations these days. These shameful things are also being done to African people by Western researchers as well as ordinary writers, who deliberately by pass my Motherland, driving her into isolation, and treating her as though she was not part and parcel of humankind. These writers and these researchers deliberately overlook many important facts about our people, and some time go out of their way to deliberately merely skim the surface of African knowledge, overlooking the rest, and passing on to nations and races which they favour.

There was a time when I wondered, why this was being done? But now I know, too late, the cold blooded satanic purpose behind all this. The black man of South Africa must be denied his identity to make it easier for people with sinister agenda's to turn him into a puppet, spiritually and physically dependent on the west and its rapacious and exploitive ways. The black man must be made to look down upon himself and the other nations too, must be made to look down upon him in contempt. I know as a keeper of my peoples oldest traditions, that sometimes when an animal, be it a goat or an ox, is about to be sacrificed to the ancestral spirits, it must be driven into isolation, kept apart from the other animals, before it is slaughtered. And Africa today is being slaughtered.

The wars that are tearing her apart, the thing that is called Aids, that is raging like wild fire through the plains and valleys through my motherland, are all part of the arsenal of murder that is being employed by certain organizations and nations, in order to bring about Africa's destruction as a race. When I say this, I am not paranoid; I am a man who has studied a number of terrible facts that are to be seen in Africa for some years now. Africa is being destroyed. There are those in whose interests it is that this, the Mother Continent of humankind must be depopulated through war famine and disease and sent into oblivion along with the great knowledge that it's people possessed. I have taken an oath that even if Africa is ultimately destroyed, as the great prophets once foresaw that it would be, the shiny fruits of its children's mind would not perish.

Hundreds of books and magazines have been written and published about Native American people and their undeniably great cultures that they once possessed. Hundreds of books have been written and published in the west about the Hindu people of India, their religion, their sciences and their great philosophies. But nobody ever wants to write anything worthwhile and in depth about Africa.

For example it is a well-known fact that Native American people in Central and South America possessed deep knowledge about the universe, about the constellations, about solar as well as lunar eclipses. It is also well known that these people possessed great calendars of great sophistication and great accuracy. But the fact that African people of various tribes of Eastern, Central, Western, and Southern Africa possess the same knowledge has been overlooked. One particularly atrocious crime for which I cannot forgive people of Europe is that whenever they write about the people of Africa they deliberately separate them.

They treat the ones they talk about as if they were not part and parcel of the African continent at all. Nowhere is this more evident than when European scientists talk about Egypt. They deal with the Egyptians as if Egyptians were a totally separate race from the rest of Africa, and yet anyone that knows Africa well will tell you that Africa is interconnected. That the various people of our Mother land are inter connected as are the gears and flywheels of a clock, and to see the people of Egypt apart from the rest of Africa is a fraud, a delusion, a crime. The people of Egypt were an African people, not at all removed from those in Nubia, in Ethiopia and in those African regions far to the South of Egypt.

For example anyone that knows Africa well will tell you that the many half-human, and half-animal gods that the Egyptians worshipped had their origins deep in Central as well as Southern Africa and that these gods are still being worshipped by the people of Africa even now. Here is yet another example of how the western investigator deliberately distort facts about Africa. There are writer that write about the khoi San people in Southern Africa- the Bushman people. These writers deliberately view the Khoi san as if they were an entity completely isolated from the rest of the African people, and yet I can tell you, I who have Khoi san blood in me, that the cultures of many black nations in Southern Africa were intimately interconnected with the Khoi san cultures.

The same thing is done when writers write about people such as the pygmies in Central Africa, the Wat-wu. One writer even went as far as to say that the Wat-wa were not an African race and I ask myself, where the thundering hell this white fool thinks the Wat-wa comes from? On which far island does he find them? Anyone that knows the culture and the language of the Wat-wa will tell you that this culture and language are interconnected with the cultures of other people in that part of Africa, where the Wat-wa, or Twa are to be found. This deliberate separation of Africa, the creation of some of the separate races and tribes has resulted in great disaster for the people of Africa as a whole.

For example, for many years, the Belgium's committed the crime of dividing up the people of the Burundi and Rwanda into two separate races. The Watutsi were believed to belong to the Nileotics, and the Bahutu were seen to be Bantu. But anyone who knows the history of these people will tell you that the Watutsi and the Bahutu are not so separate a people, they are simply two divisions of exactly the same people, and these two divisions had lived in peace for hundreds of years until animosity was stirred up between them by the Belgium colonists to suit their own sinister agenda. Before Africa vanishes under the clouds of endemic civil wars, before my motherland disappears under the fog of Aids and other man made diseases, designed for the extermination of my people, I Credo Mutwa, want to correct these blatant injustices.

I Credo Mutwa want to expose these crimes, shameful crimes of the intellect. And as a first step towards correcting this injustice, I want to tell you that it was not only the Mayas, the Incas, the Aztecs and other people of Central and South America who possessed amazing knowledge about the mysteries of the Universe. It was not only these people that possessed knowledge about solar as well as lunar eclipses, as well as the Earth's movement though space. Our people of many tribes in Southern, Eastern and Central Africa possessed this knowledge. And they passed it on from generation to generation in various ways, but mostly orally.

Mysteries of Africa

Before human beings were created on this planet, there had existed a very wise race of people known as the Imanyukela. These people had come from the constellation known to white people as Orion, and they had inhabited our earth for thousands and thousands of years. And that before they had left our earth to return once more to the sacred Spider constellation, they made a great evacuation under the earth, beneath the Ruwensory Mountains- the Mountains of the Moon. and deep in the bowels of Mother Earth, the Imanyukela built a city of copper buildings.

A city with a wall of silver all around it. A city built at the huge mountain of pure crystal. The mountain of knowledge. The mountain from which all knowledge on earth comes. And a mountain to which all knowledge on earth ultimately returns. This old woman told me that her grandmother had told her this story while she was still a virgin of some fifteen years or so and under going initiation into the mysteries and the culture of the Bahutu people. The old woman went on to tell me that many generations ago, there came to the land of the Bahutu, a group of little yellow skinned men, who wore colourful robes and strange brightly coloured hats.

These men she said had come in search of the great city of knowledge which they had heard many, many years ago, stands in the earth under the Mountains of the Moon - the Ruwensory Mountains. This story remained in my mind and was one of the many, many strange stories that I had heard during my long, long travels through Africa. And then much to my amazement, in the year 1975 there arrived at my home in Soweto, a friendly bright priest from Tibet.

The priests name was Akyong Rin Poche, whom ever today I still regard as a great friend of mine, is a man who sparkles like a glass of precious champagne. He is a man, unlike most Tibetan monks whom I have met in my life, who looks at life through the mask of humour. He is a man who ever is smiling. A man whose ever word is perfumed with humour. A man who laughs readily. A lovely and lively fellow human being. I was honoured to talk to this man in one of the huts that formed the museum village that I had built in Soweto, and Akyong Rin Poche nearly knocked me over by asking me a question that caught me totally by surprise, and which brought back memories of bygone years in a green and half forgotten Central African country. "Do you know anything," he asked, "About the city of copper, which is said to be somewhere in Central Africa?" For a few moments I was stricken Dumb by astonishment.

And the I replied, " Yes, honourable Rin Poche. In the days I was travelling through the land of the Watutsi and the Bahutu, the land that was then known as Rwanda Urundi, I heard a story about this mysterious city, and I also heard that this city lies deep under ground - under the Mountains of the Moon." Akyong Rin Poche threw another surprise at my feet. He told me how in olden days a great Lama led a group of fellow monks on an expedition into Central Africa in search of this mysterious city, and that Lama and his followers were never heard from again. I was stunned, here was an African story being confirmed by a man from Tibet.

I was totally flabbergasted, and I thanked God that many years ago I had set myself the task of recovering that I had learned through my long journeys through Africa. Today Rwanda and Burundi are countries in grip of death. Tens of thousands of people have been slaughtered. Scores of tribes have been decimated and scattered, never to be reformed again. And great quantities of knowledge have been lost forever. This is the agony of Africa. This is the shame of my motherland.

The Origins of the Gods

In many western countries, when an old person dies it is simply the death of an old human being who has gone through life and whose days on earth now come to an end. But in Africa, the death of an elder - an old man or an old woman, becomes a supreme disaster because in the mind of that elder often carries knowledge passed down from parent to child. Knowledge that is not only valuable to Africa and her children, but to human kind as a whole. No matter where you go in Africa, no matter how deep into the interior of the dark continent you tread, you will find very ancient stories which are incredibly similar.

You will find African tribes and races who will tell you that they are descendants from gods who came out of the skies thousands of years ago. Some however say that these gods came to them from the sea in magical boats made out of reeds or wood or copper or even gold. In some cases these gods and goddesses are described as beautiful human beings whose skins were either bright blue or green or even silver. But most of the time you will find it being said these great gods, especially the ones that came out of the sky were non human, scaly creatures, which lived most of the time in mud or in water. Creatures of an extremely frightening and hideously ugly appearance. Some say that these creatures were like crocodiles, with crocodile like teeth and jaws, but with very large round heads. Some say that these creatures are very tall beings with snake like heads, set on long thin necks, very long arms and very long legs. There are those that tell us that these gods who came from the skies travelled through the land in magical boats made of bright metal, silver, copper or gold. Boats which had the ability to sail over water or even to fly through the sky like birds.

It is further said that some of these sky gods carried their souls in little bags which hung from their belts. These souls being in the form spheres of crystals clear material. Spheres which could float about in the air, and which emitted a dazzling light. A light which could illuminate an entire village at night. We are told that some very brave African chiefs used to hold these great gods hostage simply by snatching their little shiny soul globes away from them and hiding them in holes deep in the ground.

Throughout Africa we are told that these mysterious beings taught human beings many things. They taught human beings how to have laws, knowledge of herbal medicine, knowledge of arts and knowledge of the mysteries of creation and the cosmos as a whole. We are told that some of these gods had the ability to change their shapes at will. They had the ability to assume the shape and the appearance of any creature that there is on earth whenever they had good reason to do so. A sky god could even turn itself into a rhinoceros and elephant or even a stork, a sky god could even turn turn itself into a rock or even a tree.

We are told that some of the gods used to travel through the sky in swings made out of brightly coloured lengths of rope. The Wutwa, people of the forests of the Congo, told me about one such god, who swung through the sky on a swing whose ends were attached to the clouds in the sky and who could go anywhere, no matter how far away, and come back before sunset on his magical swing.

In Africa these mysterious gods are known by various names, in West Africa, in the land of the Bumbara people these amphibian or reptilian sky gods are known as Zishwezi. The word zishwezi means either the swimmers or the divers or the gliders. It was said that these sky gods could dive from above the clouds down to the top of a mountain whenever they felt like it, they could also take deep dives into the bottom of the ocean and from there fetch magical objects and then bring them to the shore, placing them at the feet of the astonished black people.

In West Africa again, these creatures are called the Asa, which means the mighty ones of magic. It is from this word asa, a word that speaks great magical power that comes the name Asanti, which means a king, but literally means, the child of asa and as you know Asanti gave birth to the word, Ashanti.

In the land of the Dogon people we find the famous Nommo, a race of reptilian or amphibian beings who were said to have come from the Sirius star to give knowledge and religion to the black people of Dogon. Incidentally, scientists have never explained the meaning of Dogon; it means God Almighty and the Dogon people know themselves as the children of the God Almighty.

There are tribes in various parts of Africa which regard themselves as God's chosen people. These tribes call themselves by a name which means god. In South Africa there is a tribe that calls itself the Tonga, and another very large group which calls itself the Tsonga. And in Zimbabwe there are two tribes, one of which is called the Batonga, and another that is called the Tongaila. The name Tonga, Tsonga or Donga means people of god and you will find these people living in some of the holiest and most spiritual places in Africa. For example, the Matonga people of Northern Zululand live in the area of the sacred St Lucia Lake which is believed by the Zulu people and other tribes in Natal to be the place where, hundreds of years ago, the great earth mother arrived in a boat of reeds, accompanied by her son and his two wives.

And she came to give laws, culture, religion as well as healing arts, and other mysteries to human beings. It is said that the great earth mother was a huge woman, very, very fat with bright green skin and so was her son and his two wives. There once existed in Zimbabwe a very sacred place called Kariba Gorge, which is now covered by a huge lake as a result of the damming of the Zambezi River at this place. In Kariba Gorge there lived two remarkable tribes, the Batonga, which means people of God, and the more remarkable tribe whose name is the Tongaila.

Tonga as you know means God, but the word Ila also means god, thus the Tongaila people are called the people of the God Ila- the wise old god, who according to some stories created the earth and everything in it. The Tonga and the Tongaila used to tell me that not only are the chosen people sent by God to guard the Kariba Gorge, but they are also in yearly touch with the great gods who come from the stars, whom they call the Bananaila, the children of Ila. Now let us go to West Africa for a while, in the land of the Dogon, there, one is told that when the Nommo arrived from the sky in their fantastic sky ship, there were several of them, thirteen or fourteen of them.

And they created a lake around their sky ship and every morning they used to swim from their sky ship to the shores of the lake and there preach to the people who assembled in large numbers around the lake. It is said that before the Nommo departed, returning with a great noise back to their home star, they first chose one of their number, killed it and cut its body up into little pieces and then gave these pieces to the assembled people to eat in the first sacrificial ritual of its kind on earth. When the people had eaten the sacred flesh of the star creature and drunk its blood mixed with water, the Nommo took the lower jaw of their creature and by some incredible fact of magic brought the whole creature back to life again. We are told that this is the way that the Nommo taught our people that there is no death and that behind every death there shall be a resurrection.

And also that an individual must sometimes sacrifice himself or herself for the good of the community. It is the Nommo, we are told that taught the people of Africa about the mysteries of reincarnation, about the belief that, that which goes away, gone off on the wings of death, will always come back again on the fragrant wings of life. In the land of Nigeria, we hear of how the great mother goddess, Mawi gave birth to human beings after having created the world, and that after a number of centuries, people on earth became filled with selfishness and other forms of negative behaviour and the great mother who was now in the land of the gods, sent down her daughter, Gabato, to earth to once more place human beings upon the path of righteous.

It is said that Gabato arrived on earth in the mouth of a great serpent with all the colours of the rainbow, And this serpent, crawled all over the earth, and such was its size and so great was its weight that wherever it went it created gorges and valleys and canyons. What I found was very astonishing, was that in many countries of the world, amongst the aborigines of Australia, and amongst the native people of the Americas, as in Africa, you find belief in the rainbow serpent. And you also find belief in the feathered serpent.

In the Americas, in South and Central America mostly, the feathered serpent is called Quetzalcoatl, and amongst my people, the Zulus, we find belief in a serpent called Yndlondlo. The Yndlondlo is said to be a huge mamba or a huge python, whose neck is covered in greyish blue feathers, like the feathers of a blue crane, and at the top of the serpents head grow three feathers. One green one, one red one and a white one which look like huge ostrich tail feathers. The Yndlondlo, like the (South) American Quetzalcoatl, is associated with God the Son

The History of the Cross

A mystery that has fascinated African's for thousands of years. Seen in cross section, this rather dull looking crystal shows a cross like pattern in it. It shows a pattern of the kind that our people of olden days used to call the perfect cross, or the cross of the sun. Before I tell you more, I wish you to know that the thing known as a cross was not brought to Africa by missionaries, knowledge of the cross in its many forms, was here in South Africa from the remotest of remote times.

It was already known to the mystics of Africa long, long before the Christian religion was established in Europe, and further more, the various types of cross were used by African healers and mystics for either good purposes, or evil ones. Africans believed that the cross, either made of wood, ivory or metal was a powerful object, possessed of great magic, capable of unleashing powers of healing, or renewing or powers of destruction and killing.

There were three types of cross that Africans used for healing, there was the T-shaped cross known in Western mysticism as the tau cross, then there was the proper cross of the kind we are told Jesus was crucified upon. A cross with a long stem and short arms. Then there was the unsaid cross, known to white people as the Ankh, which many western thinkers wrongly assume to have been only known to the ancient Egyptians. This ankh was actually known by our people as the knot of eternity, or the knot of eternal life, and it was used even by Khoi San people, for purposes of healing.

The greatest users of the ankh, were the almost extinct Khoi Khoi or Hottentot people. The Khoi Khoi said that the unsaid cross represented their great sun god, Heitsie-Ibib. The zulus, Xhosas and the Swazis and other Ngoni speaking peoples of South Africa also believed in a sun god, who died each evening to be reborn again each morning. Who died each winter and was reborn again each spring.

They believed that this beautiful son of God the Father and God the Mother whom they knew by various names, had lost his left leg in a savage fight against a terrible dragon, some say a gigantic crocodile which walked on its hind legs, its rear legs much, much longer than its fore legs. The symbol of this handsome God of the sun, this hero God and bringer of peace, was also the unsaid cross, Which the Zulus called Mlenze-munye. The Swazis knew him as Mlente-munye. The name Mlenze-munye or Mlente-mmunye mean the on legged one. The one with one leg. And incidentally, when Africans saw the cross which missionaries often hung around their necks, they immediately recognized it as the symbol of the eternal God with one leg who dies and is born again forever and ever. And they respected missionaries as messengers from this God. Which is why in some part of Africa missionaries were called a name which is also one of the many names of the African sun god, namely Muruti, which means the great teacher, a name by which Twana speaking, Owambo speaking and Sotho speaking people still call missionaries to this day.

Our people believed also in what they called the perfect cross, the most powerful cross of all. This was a cross that had all its four wings of exactly equal length. The cross of the kind that white people call the Celtic cross. A cross which is often imprisoned within a circle, with all its wings of exactly equal length, our people used this cross, drawing it in its many forms, healing some of the most horribly diseases to which the body is prone.

Before a person was treated for cancer, the herbs, the powdered herbs which were to be used in this treatment, were first laid out on a piece of clean springbok skin on the likeness of the perfect cross, then spoon after spoon, they were taken and poured into a clay pot which had been blessed several times. There were forms of the cross, which unlike these which I have briefly described which were used for healing, were used for extremely destructive purposes and one of these is what the white people call the Saint Andrews cross.

The X-shaped cross which even today we find teachers in mission schools using to mark a wrong answer written by a pupil in his or her exercise book. Africans believed that the X-shaped cross possessed great powers of evil, and they used it to put curses upon people. It may be of interest to you to learn that when a Xhosa person from the Eastern Cape, says that you are crazy, you are mad he says, "Uphameene."

And the literal meaning of this word is, "You have a cross put upon you," across which has made you cross witted, mad. In ancient times and even modern times, when a African artist, woodcarver or decorator of any kind draws a cross, he or she must take great care to only draw one of those crosses that heal and not to dare to draw, carve or render in beads, one of the evil crosses, because Africans say that the first person that gets affected by a negative engraving or a negative drawing is the artist himself. And the first person to be affected by a positive drawing or a positive engraving is the artist himself or herself.

Children of Mars

Africa is a land full of surprises, and they who travel through her forests and upon the banks of her great rivers, and over her eternal plains must always be prepared to meet surprises. One day I was travelling along the Zambezi river, when I came to a home stead which people in villages that I had passed had told me about. I had been told that in this small village I would find some of the wisest people in the land, people who claim ancestry from creatures who are said to have come from the red star know as Liitolafisi, the red star whose name means the eye of the brown hyena is the star, or rather the planet that white people call Mars.

I wanted to meet these wise people, and when I came to the home stead, a collection of grass and wooden huts, protected by a wooden fence, I saw a number of women and children standing inside the fence near the gate. These people were smiling at me and their smiles grew even wider as I drew near the gate, the woman standing nearest to the gate, moved slightly to her left, coming to stand right in the centre of the open gate. My eyes went to her feet, and all courage left me, and like the coward that I often am, I turned around and ran away, followed by loud peals of feminine laughter. I had dropped all my property, my bag and my walking stick upon the dusty path that led to the gate, and there I was running away like a fat ape seeking the safety of the green bush. The women laughed and laughed again, and when I threw a glance over my shoulder, I saw them come out and pick up my property and take it into the village. I had never seen anything like what I saw on that day, the thing that caused me to run away like an idiot fleeing a bush fire.

The woman who had stood in the centre of the gate facing me had only two large toes on either of her feet. It was as if I was staring at the feet of not a human being, but of a monstrous bird from the valleys of folklore and legend. Shame faced I walked towards a tree and stood under it trembling with fear and as I stood there a group of men came out of the village and walked laughing and smiling towards me. Nearly all of them had only two toes on each foot. They wore no shoes, and in the African dust their feet really looked frightening. They came around me and surrounded me and said, Do not be afraid of us, we are people just like you. What is it about us that frightens you? Unable to answer, my face hot with shame and embarrassment, I glanced toward their feet and then they roared with laughter. This is how I met a tribe of people know as the Bantwana, which means children. A tribe of people who claim that their remote ancestors were bird like people who came from the stars and who mated with earthly woman and produced these two toed human beings. The Bantwana people welcomed me into their small village and for three months at the feet of two of their elders, I learned about things that left me numb with amazement. The Bantwana are shy people who in ancient times suffered persecution at the hands of people of other tribes, but when they like you and trust you, and feel pity for you, they tell you things that fill you with great amazement. They tell you that there are twenty four inhabited planets within the area of space in ...

Holy Places in South Africa

Although South Africa possesses a huge, highly organized tourist industry, that tourist industry, however, has not scratched the surface let alone dented it of the colossal potential as a tourist Mecca and destination that our country possesses. South Africa could attract four or five times the number of tourists that she is at this moment attracting if only those, whose duty it is to attract those tourists, knew more about their country - about South Africa and knew just how huge is the potential that this country possesses as a Mecca for tourists.

It is one of the most shameful truths in our country that those who live within our country's borders know little or nothing about the country in which they live. There may be those who resent my words but this is a fact and I want to state again that the tourist potential of the Republic of South Africa is grossly under-utilized by those whose duty is to tap into it and to activate it for the benefit of the peoples of this land. If those in authority could know more about South Africa's tourist potential, unemployment in our country would be cut down by a large percent and we would find hundreds of black people, especially, successfully involved in the tourist industry of our country.

I speak as someone who has travelled to many parts of the world, when I say that in some countries you find thousands of people gainfully engaged in their particularly country's tourist industry whereas in South Africa only a small percentage of people are engaged in this. What is utterly shameful is that, in South Africa, tourism is mostly a white-owned and white-run business and black people, even now, are left out in the cold or if they are engaged in the tourist industry at all, they are engaged simply as employees and paid servants. I have been to countries such as Japan where that country's tourist industry involves thousands of people. I have been to countries such as South America, especially, where you find hundreds of native Americans gainfully involved in their country's huge tourist industry.

Furthermore, when tourists arrive in South Africa they are shown many things only from the perspective of the European people and not from the African perspective. For example, they are shown South Africa's wild life and they are shown this wild life from the viewpoint of white scientists only - from the viewpoint of white settlers only and they are denied the rich folklore that black people - Koi Koi and Koi San people - knew and still know about wild animals. Tourists are shown, for example the South African wildebeest but they are not told what Africans think about this animal and thought about it - that the wildebeest was one of the holiest animals in Africa.

It was believed by the various tribes to possess powers of expelling negative spirits and other evil influences from the land and the tail of the wildebeest is used even now by shamans and sangomas as an instrument for exorcising evil spirits from people and from places. Tourists are shown the zebra, they are told that this is a Burchells Zebra or whoever's zebra and then they are given the Latin name for this African animal.

They are never told that to African people the zebra was an animal sacred to the great Earth Mother, an animal whose spoor possessed a power to take away infertility and other female illnesses from black women. I can say, bluntly, that a tourist gets cheated in South Africa in that he or she is denied the great beauty of the fold-lore that our people held and still hold regarding animals. I believe that this gross injustice must be remedied and remedied at once. Zoologist and other scientists have been in Africa for just over four hundred years but Africans have lived side by side with wild animals, birds and insects for millennia and over the years they built mythologies around these creatures, mythologies that should not be denied to those who visit our country's shores.

There are even places in South Africa, places of great interest about which tourists know nothing because those who live within our country's shores know nothing and care to know nothing about those things. I say again that South Africa is a paradise, a potential paradise for overseas visitors if only those in authority could allow traditional Africans to have their say and to talk to overseas visitors openly just as trained tour-guides do. South Africa does not consist only of scientists. South Africa does not consist only of white settlers. She consists of ancient tribes and communities, which were here long before the first Portuguese ship sailed around the Cape of Good Hope.

I am going to talk to you about two places. Two places whose potential as tourist destinations we are going to unveil. The first of these two places is a piece of land called Vulindaba, whose name means open the story or start the story. Vulindaba is at the foot of a range of mountains of the Megaliessberg Mountain system. It lies along a road named Lazy River Road. Vulindaba is going to be opened as a wilderness trail to young people, overseas visitors as well as school children. Vulindaba is a piece of unspoilt countryside.

It is a piece of wild bush and grassland. It is a piece of snarling rocks and a steep mountain slope. It is a piece of land on which there still grow some of the ancient flora, which one finds or used to find in this place. There will be accommodation at Vulindaba for young people to spend the night under the South African stars, to listen to stories and to listen to dancing and drum beating - to be one with the spirit of the wilderness and to be one with the spirit of the ancient Mountains of Magadi. This was a land once ruled by matriarchs - a land of hard-working people who were engaged in trade with seafarers far to the east of South Africa. There are many stories in this land.

There are many songs, which one can still hear being sung by old men and old women in this area. It is here that one must, once more, reconnect oneself with the bygone days of this country. There is mystery among the Megaliessberg Mountains. There are ancient things that you find here which have never been written about in any tourist brochure. There are historical structures, which still stand on farms in this area. There are ancient mines, which go deep into the entrails of the mountains. Mines, which were dug by people we do not know.

People who were mining for something we do not know. There are places amongst the Megaliesberg Mountains, which have been regarded as sacred by black people for hundreds if not thousands of years. Let me tell you about one such place. There is a farm along the Lazy River Road and on the edge of this farm there is a spring of pure water. Water that bubbles out of the earth, travels for a few yards or so and then disappears back into the earth again.

Our people called this spring the Spring of Marutwani, who is said to have been a great female healer and prophetess who lived nearly two hundred years ago. For many generations now sick black people, as well as traditional healers, have been coming to the Spring of Marutwani to get its pure healing water and in these two or three decades most the people who have been coming to this place have been members of the powerful Zion Catholic Church, the most powerful free church in South Africa, who have been coming here with plastic containers to get the water of Marutwani's spring. Now let me show you a blatant injustice - an injustice born of ignorance.

There are in England a number of sacred wells and springs whose waters are said to possess healing powers and in my travels to the far away British Isles I came across several such sacred wells and springs and one of them is called Chalice Well. The rusty coloured water that comes out of Chalice Well has been believed by the English people to possess healing powers for thousands of years and the waters of this spring are bottled and exported to distant parts of the world by the English people. But here is South Africa we have got springs like the Spring of Marutwani about which the world knows nothing and the water of Marutwani has got just as powerful healing powers as Chalice Well, Lourdes and other famous places like that in Europe and in England possess.

Everybody knows about Chalice Well but nobody knows about the Sacred Spring of Marutwani and the powers - real powers of healing that it possesses. Another thing. In the same area that Vulindaba is, about a few miles away from it, there stands a little hill, a small mountain, which for thousands of years has been viewed by black people as a mountain just as sacred as Mount Zion is to the people of Israel. This mountain is called Intaba kaNgwenya. This mountain stands out above the landscape and is visible from almost anywhere.

Black people, especially the Mandebele people, have held the belief that gods from the stars descend upon this mountain on a regular basis and ascend up this mountain also on a regular basis for reasons that we human beings do not know. Hundreds of Ndebele men and women over the decades have claimed to have seen strange creatures whose skins are chalk-white. Creatures with the heads of crocodiles and the bodies of human beings, descending out of the sky and then returning back to the sky from the top of this mountain. Many years ago, when I was a sangoma novice, I heard stories about these strange crocodile gods near the cooking fires of wise men and wise women who had their homes around this amazing little mountain.

The farmers upon whose land this mountain stands do not realize what a sacred or an important thing it is and they do not realize how it can be used to attract visitors from far away across the wide belly of Mother Earth. We have got treasures that the gods gave us, but these treasures are unknown to us. This is the tragedy of South Africa. When people visit Vulindaba they shall hear about all this and much more.

Not far away from Vulindaba, across the tarred road that leads to Hartebeespoort, you shall find another place, another farm which, like Vulindaba sits at the feet of the mighty Megaliesberg Mountains, but this farm is unique in that there is a river, the mighty Crocodile River, which flows through the land at the foot of a huge mountain, which old people used to call Nkwe Mountain.

This mountain is a huge, massive thing and seen from a certain angle it looks like a gigantic, sleeping leopard with its head resting upon its paws and what is amazing is that there is a visible feature on the slope of this mountain which looks like the open, snarling mouth of the leopard. There are two semi-circular features, which look like the mouth of a beast. The Sleeping Leopard Mountain is joined by a smaller mountain with a sharp point which the old women who used to have their kraals in this place many years ago used to call the Iswele, the Woman's Breast Mountain, and between the Leopard Mountain and the Woman's Breast Mountain there is a gap and from behind this gap rises the sun and it goes over the farm to set in the West.

We are told that ancient tribal astrologers used to observe the sun and the moon rising from behind these two mountains and they could tell which season it was by which part of the gap between the two mountains was the sun rising at any given time. This farm that I am talking about is now owned by the London based, Women for Peace, the brave women who go into places such as Bosnia and Sarajevo to comfort traumatized refugees and to care for the injured and upon this farm it is our intention to create unique attractions, which visitors will see.

One of these attractions will be a healing village where actual healing of people will take place. Traditional healers will be available here to tend to those who require their skills. Also in this place there will be a place for visitors to spend nights and days and there will also be a Garden of Mysteries, with standing stones erected according to traditional African ways. There will also be statues of various African gods, which will be seen in this place. This place, which did not have a name before, has been given the beautiful African name Naledi that means a star or the giver of enlightenment. Here visitors will take part in traditional astronomy and astrology and here stories will be told and visitors will also be shown healing herbs grown in the Garden of Mysteries. They will be shown that and much, much more. Works of art and other beautiful traditional artifacts will be here for sale for those who wish to buy them. It will be a place of Life, a place of Light and a place of Beauty.

Alien Abductions and Reptilians

[by Rick Martin 9/30/99, THE SPECTRUM]

Martin: First of all, let me say it is an honor and a privilege to speak with you, and I would like to thank and acknowledge David Icke and Dr. Joubert, without whose help we would not be having this conversation today. Our readers are aware of the existence of the shape-shifting reptilian extraterrestrials, and what I would like to discuss with you concerns the specifics of their presence, their leadership, their agenda, and their methods of operation at this time. So, the first question I would like to ask you is: Can you confirm that shape-shifting reptilian extraterrestrials do, in fact, exist on our planet at this time? And if they do, if you can confirm this, will you please be specific about them. Where do they come from?

Credo Mutwa: Sir, can your newspaper send people to Africa?

Martin: I'm sorry, can you repeat that?

Credo Mutwa: Can your newspaper kindly send somebody to Africa in the near future?

Martin: We are financially not able to do that at this time, but that may change in the future.

Credo Mutwa: Because there are some things that I would, please, like your newspaper to check-out, independent of me. You have heard of the country called Rwanda, in Central Africa?

Martin: Yes.

Credo Mutwa: The people of Rwanda, the Hutu people, as well as the Watusi people, state, and they are not the only people in Africa who state this, that their very oldest ancestors were a race of beings whom they called the Imanujela, which means "the Lords who have come". And some tribes in West Africa, such as a Bambara people, also say the same thing. They say that they came from the sky, many, many generations ago, a race of highly advanced and fearsome creatures which looked like men, and they call them Zishwezi. The word Zishwezi means the dival or the glidal-creatures that can glide down from the sky or glide through water. Everybody, sir, has heard about the Dogon people in Western Africa who all say that they were given culture by the normal beings, but they are not the Dogon people are but ONE of many, many peoples in Africa who claim that their tribe or their king were first founded by the supernatural race of creatures that came from the sky.

Are you still with me, sir?

Martin: Oh yes, very much so. Please continue.

Credo Mutwa: Sir, I can go on and on, but let me bring you to my people, the Zulu people of South Africa.

Martin: Please.

Credo Mutwa: The Zulu people, who are famous as a warrior people, the people to whom King Shaka Zulu, of the last century, belonged. When you ask a South African White anthropologist what the name of Zulu means, he will say it means “the sky” (laughter), and therefore the Zulu call themselves “people of the sky”. That, sir, is non-sense. In the Zulu language, our name for the sky, the blue sky, is sibakabaka. Our name for inter-planetary space, however, is izulu and the weduzulu, which means “inter-planetary space, the dark sky that you see with stars in it every night”, also has to do with traveling, sir. The Zulu word for traveling at random, like a nomad or a gypsy, is izula.

Now, you can see that the Zulu people in South Africa were aware of the fact that you can travel through space-not through the sky like a bird - but you can travel through space, and the Zulus claim that many, many thousands of years ago there arrived, out of the skies, a race of people who were like lizards, people who could change shape at will. And people who married their daughters to a walking (extraterrestrial), and produced a power race of Kings and tribal Chiefs, there are hundreds of fairy-tales, sir, in which a lizard female assumes the identity of a human princess and poses as her, and gets married to a Zulu Prince.

Every school child in South Africa, sir, knows about the story of a princess called Khombecansini. Khombecansini was to have married a handsome Prince called Kakaka, a name which means “the enlightened one”. Now, one day while Khombecansini was gathering firewood in the bush, she met a creature called an Imbulu. And this Imbulu was a lizard which has the body and the limbs of a human being, but a long tail. And this lizard spoke to Princess Khombecansini, “Oh, how beautiful you are, girl, I wish I could be like you. I wish I could look like you. Can I come close to you?” said the Imbulu lizard woman to the princess.

And the princess said, “Yes, you can.”

And as the lizard, which was a taller one, came close to the girl, she spat into the girl’s eyes and she began to change. That is, the lizard suddenly changed into a human shape and this lizard began to look more and more and more and more like the girl, with the exception of her long, pointed tail. And then, with her sudden burst of violence, the lizard woman sealed the princess and removed all her bangles and her beads and her wedding skirt off her, and she put them on. Thus, the lizard became the princess.

Now there were two identical women in the bush, the shape-shifted lizard woman and the original woman. And the lizard woman said to the original woman, “Now you are my slave. Now you are going to accompany me to the marriage. I will be you and you will be my slave, come-on!” She took a stick and started beating up the poor princess. And then she went, accompanied by other girls who were bride's maids, according to Zulu custom, and she arrived at Prince Kakaka's village. But, before they reached the village she had to do something about her tail, that is, the shape-shifting woman had, somehow, to hide the tail. So, she forced the princess to weave a net out of fiber and she tucked the tail in and she tied it tight to herself. She now looked like a Zulu woman with attractive, very big buttocks, when seen from outside.

And then, when she arrived and she became the wife of the prince, a strange thing started happening in the village. All of the milk started disappearing because each night the shape-shifting princess, the false princess, used to release her tail, which used to suck in all of the sour milk through a hole at the tip of the tail. And the mother-in-law said, "What is this? Why is the milk disappearing?" Then, she said, "No, I see, there is an Imbulu amongst us."

The mother-in-law, who was a clever old lady, said, "A hole must be dug in the front of the village and it must be filled with milk." And this was done. And then, all of the girls who had come with the false princess were told to jump over this hole. One after the other one, they jumped. And when the shape-shifter was forced, at spear-point, to jump as well, as she jumped her long tail burst out of the net under her skirt and started slurping the milk through the hole, and the warriors killed the shape-shifter. And thus, the real Princess Khombecansini became the wife of the king-of King Kakaka.

Now, sir, this story has got many versions in it. Throughout South Africa, amongst many tribes, you'll find stories of these amazing creatures who are capable of changing from reptile to human being, and from reptile to any other animal of their choice. And these creatures, sir, do really exist. No matter where you go throughout Southern, Eastern, Western, and Central Africa, you'll find that the description of these creatures is the same. Even amongst tribes which never, throughout their long history, had contact with each other at all.

So, there ARE such creatures. Where they come from, I will never claim to know, sir. But they are associated with certain stars in the sky, and one of these stars is a large group of stars which is part of the Milky Way, which our people call Ingiyab, which means "The Great Serpent". And there is a red star, a redish star, near the tip of this huge rim of stars which our people call Isonkanyamba.

Now, this star called Isonkanyamba, I managed to find its English name. It is the star called Alpha Centauri, in English. Now, this, sir, is something that is worth investigating. Why is it that well over 500 tribes in parts of Africa which I've visited in the last 40 or 50 years or so, all of them describe similar creatures?

It is said that these creatures feed on us human beings; that they, at one time, challenged God Himself to war, because they wanted full control of the universe. And God fought a terrible battle against them and He defeated them, injured them, and forced them to hide in cities underground. They hide in deep cavities underground, because they are always feeling cold. In these cavities, we are told, there are huge fires which are kept going by slaves, human, zombie-like slaves. And, it is further said that these Zuswazi, these Imbulu, or whatever you choose to call them, are not capable of eating solid food. They either eat human blood, or they eat that power, the energy that is generated when human beings, on the surface of the Earth, are fighting and killing each other in large numbers. I met people who have fled from the early Masaki in Rwanda, from years ago, and these people were horrified by what was happening in their country. They said that the slaughter of the Hutus by the Watusi, and the Watusi by the Hutus, is actually feeding the Imanujela, monsters. Because the Imanujela like to inhale the energy that is generated by masses of people being terrified or being killed by other people.

Are you still with me, sir?

Martin: Yes, I'm completely with you.

Credo Mutwa: Now, let me point out an interesting thing, sir. If you study the languages of all African nations, you find within the languages of our people words which are similar to Oriental, Middle-Eastern, and even Native American words. And the word Imanujela means "the Lord who came". A word that anyone can discover in Rwanda, amongst the Rwandan Hutu and Watusi people, is very similar to the Hebrew word Immanuel, which means "the Lord is with us". Imanujela, "the ones who came, the Lords who are here". Our people believe, sir, that we, the people of this Earth, are not masters of our own lives, really, although we are made to think that we are. Our people say, that is, Black people of all tribes, all of the initiated ones, all of the shamans everywhere in Africa, when they get to trust you and share their deepest secrets with you, they say that [with] the Imanujela, there is Imbulu. And there is another name by which these creatures are known. This name is Chitauli.

Now, the word Chitauli means “the dictators, the ones who tell us the law”. In other words, “they who tell us, secretly, what we are to do”. Now, it is said that these Chitauli did a number of things to us when they came to this planet.

Please forgive me, but I must share this story with you. It is one of the strangest stories that you find everywhere in Africa in shamanic secret societies and other places where the remnant of our ancient knowledge and wisdom are still preserved. It is that, originally, the Earth was covered by a very thick blanket of fog or mist. That people could not actually see the Sun in the sky, except as a nimble of light. And they also saw the Moon at night as a gentle claw of light in the sky, because there was this heavy mist. And the rain was always falling in a steady drizzle. There was no thunder, however. There were no storms.

The world was thickly covered with great forests, great jungles, and people lived in peace on Earth at that time. People were happy and it is said, at that time, we human beings did not have the power of speech. We only made funny sounds like happy monkeys and baboons, but we did not have speech as we now have it. And in those centuries, people spoke to each other through their mind.

A man could call his wife thinking about her, thinking about the shape of her face, the smell of her body, and the feel of hair as a woman. That a hunter would go out into the bush and call out for animals to come, and the animals would select one of their number which was old and tired, and this animal would offer itself to the hunter so that he may kill it quickly and take it as meat to his cave.

There was no violence against animals. There was no violence against Nature by human beings at that time. Man used to ask for food from Nature. He used to come to a tree and think about fruit, and the tree would allow some of its fruit to fall to the ground, and man would take it.

And then it is said, however, that when the Chitauli came to Earth, they arrived in terrible vessels which flew through the air, vessels which were shaped like great bowls and which made a terrible noise and a terrible fire in the sky. And the Chitauli told human beings, whom they gathered together by force with whips of lightning, that they were great gods from the sky and that from now on they would receive a number of great gifts from the god. These so-called gods, who were like human beings, but very tall, with a long tail, and with terrible burning eyes, some of them had two eyes-yellow, bright eyes-some had three eyes, the red, round eye being in the center of their forehead. These creatures then took away the great powers that human beings had:

- the power of speaking through the mind only
- the power of moving objects with their mind only
- the power of seeing into the future and into their past
- the power to travel, spiritually, to different worlds

All of these great powers the Chitauli took away from human beings and they gave human beings a new power, now, the power of speech. But, human beings found, to their horror, that the power of speech divided human beings, instead of uniting them, because the Chitauli cunningly created different languages, and they caused a great quarrel between people.

Also, the Chitauli did something which has never been done before: they gave human beings people to rule over them, and they said, “These are your kings, these are your chiefs. They have our blood in them. They are our children, and you must listen to these people because they will speak on our behalf. If you don’t, we are going to punish you very terribly.” Before the coming of the Chitauli, before the coming of the Imbulu creatures, human beings were spiritually one. But when the Chitauli came, human beings became divided, both spiritually as well as by language. And then, human beings were given strange new feelings by the Chitauli. Human beings started to feel unsafe, and so they started making villages with very strong fences of wood around them. Human beings started becoming country makers. In other words, they started creating tribes and tribe lands, which had borders, which they defended against any possible enemy. Human beings became ambitious and greedy and they wanted to acquire wealth in the form of cattle, and sea shells.

And, another thing the Chitauli forced human beings to do, they forced human beings to mine into the Earth. The Chitauli activated human women and made them to discover minerals and metals of certain types. Women discovered copper; women discovered gold; women discovered silver. And, eventually, they were guided by the Chitauli to alloy these metals and to create new metals which had never existed in Nature before, metals such as bronze and brass and others.

Now, the Chitauli, further, removed the sacred rain-bringing mist from the sky and for the first time since creation, human beings looked up and saw stars, and the Chitauli told human beings that they have been wrong in believing that God dwelt under the Earth. “From now on,” the Chitauli told people of this Earth, “the people of Earth must believe that God is in Heaven and they must do things here on Earth which would please this God who is in Heaven.”

You see, originally, human beings had believed that God was underground, that she was a very great mother who dwelt under the Earth because they saw all the green things growing from under the Earth-the grass came from below ground, the trees grew from below ground, and the people had believed, therefore, that the dead people who died go underground. But when the Chitauli turned humans' eyes towards the sky, people started believing, now, that God is in the sky and that those who die from this Earth don't go underground, but go up into the sky.

And to this day, sir, throughout Africa wherever you go as an investigator, you will find this amazing - these two amazing ideas which conflict with each other. Many African tribes believe in what is called Midzimu or Badimo. Now, the word Midzimu or Badimo means "them who are in the sky". But, in Zulu-land, amongst my people, you find this amazing schism going hand-in-hand. There are Zulus who believe that the dead ones are the Abapansi, which means "the ones who are below, who are under the Earth". Then there is another idea which says Abapezulu. The word Abapezulu means "those who are above", and the word Abapansi, which is the oldest name for the spirits of the dead, means "they who are under the Earth". So, even today, sir, all over Africa amongst hundreds of tribes, you find this strange double-belief that the dead go into the sky, and side-by-side with the belief that the dead die and go under the Earth. This belief that the dead die and go under the Earth is said to date to the days when our people believed that God was a woman, the great Cosmic Mother. And, it is contrasted by the Abapezulu belief that God is a man who dwells in the sky.

Now, sir, another thing that the Chitauli told our people, it is said, is that we human beings are here on Earth to change the Earth and to make it suitable for "God" to come down one day and dwell in it. And it is said that they who work to change this Earth and make it safe for the serpent god, the Chitauli, to come and dwell in it, will be rewarded with great power and with great wealth.

Sir, as I have watched over many years of study, over many years of initiation of the mysteries of African shamanism, wisdom, and knowledge, I have found myself wondering why we human beings are actually destroying the Earth on which we live. We are doing something which is only done by one other species of animal, namely, the African elephant, which utterly destroys every tree in the place in which it dwells.

We human beings are doing exactly this. And wherever you go in Africa, where once there were great ancient civilizations, you find desert. For example, there is the Kalahari desert in South Africa, and under the sands of that desert, I have found the ruins of ancient cities, which means that human beings turned this stretch of land, which was once green and fertile, into a desert. And, in days when I was with explorers and safari people in the Sahara regions of Africa, I also found evidence of unbelievably ancient human habitation in places where there is nothing now but angry rock and whispering sand.

In other words, the Sahara Desert was once a fertile country and was turned into a desert by human beings. Why? I must ask myself, again and again, why are human beings being driven by insecurity, greed, and lust of power to turn the Earth into a desert in which, ultimately, no human being would ever be able to live? Why?

Although we are all aware of the terrible dangers that this will bring about, why are we cutting huge areas of jungle in Africa? Why are we on Earth carrying out the instructions which the Chitauli programmed into us? Although my mind refuses to accept this, the answer is a terrible yes, yes, yes.

Amongst the many people of wisdom who honor me with their friendship, is a man of great knowledge who lives in Israel, Dr. [Zecharia] Sitchin. According to the ancient books which were written by the people of Sumeria, out of clay, gods came out of the sky and forced human beings to work for them, to mine gold for them. This story is confirmed by African legends throughout Africa, that gods came out of the sky and made us into their slaves, and they made us into slaves in such a way that we would never realize that we are slaves.

One other thing that our people say is that the Chitauli prey upon us like vultures. They raise some of us, they fill some of us with great anger and great ambition, and they make these people they've raised into great warriors who make terrible war. But, in the end, the Chitauli do not allow these great leaders, these great war chiefs and kings, to die peacefully. The warrior chief is used to make as much war as possible, to kill as many of his people, and those he calls enemies, as possible, and then, in the end, the warrior chief dies a terrible death, with his blood being spilled by others.

And this phenomenon I have seen in my people's history, again and again. Our great King Shaka Zulu, he fought over 200 great wars during the reign of some 30-something years. And then, he was slaughtered and he died a violent death. He died a broken man who, because of the death of his mother, had no longer the power to win any more battles.

And, before Shaka Zulu, there was another king who trained Shaka to become the great king that he was. That king's name was Dingiswayo. Dingiswayo had fought great wars trying to unite the Zulu people into one great tribe. He had seen the White people of the Cape and he thought that, by uniting his people into one huge nation, he would be able to repel the threat to his people which the White people posed. But, what happened was, after winning many battles of uniting many tribes, King Dingiswayo suddenly became stricken by an eye disease which made him almost blind. And he hid this secret that he could no longer see. But, that terrible secret was discovered by a woman, a queen of another tribe, called Ntombazi. Ntombazi took a battle ax and beheaded Dingiswayo with one blow, after she had lured him into her hut and given him food and beer to drink.

There is also a similar phenomenon with great White leaders: Napoleon, in Europe, who died a miserable death on his lonely island in the Atlantic Ocean; Hitler, also in Europe, who died a terrible death by putting the gun in the mouth and killing himself, we are told; Attila the Hun, who was killed by a woman, and many other great leaders who came to a sticky end after giving as much death and misery to as many people as they could.

King Shaka was stabbed to death by his half-brother, who used on him the same type of spear that he had designed to kill people as quickly as possible. And, Julius Caesar also met a similar fate after he, like our Shaka Zulu, had conquered many nations.

Always the warrior hero dies a death that he, really, should not die. King Arthur, in England, was killed by his own son, Mordred after a long and courageous reign. I could go on and on and on.

Now, all these things, if you bring them together, they show that whether people laugh at this or not, whether people scoff at this or not, there is a certain power that is guiding we human beings toward the dark river of self-destruction. And the sooner many of us become aware of this, the better, perhaps, we might be able to deal with it.

Martin: Do you believe that these beings are around the world equally, or are they primarily focused in Africa?

Credo Mutwa: Sir, I believe that these creatures are everywhere on Earth, and with respect, sir, although I hate talking about myself so much, I am a person who has traveled to many parts of the world. I have been to your country, the United States, sir. I have been to Australia. I have been to Japan, amongst other countries.

And no matter where I have gone, sir, I have found people telling me about creatures like this. For example, in 1997, I visited Australia, sir, and I traveled a lot to try and find the Black people of Australia, the Aborigine. And when I did find them, they told me a number of things that astonished me very, very much. The same things that I'd found in Japan, I found in Taiwan. Everywhere where there are still shaman and traditional healers, you find these amazing stories.

Now, let me tell you, sir, what I found in Australia alone. This, that the Australian Aborigine people, who call themselves Coorie, which means “our people”: The Coorie people of Australia believe in a great creating god called Byamie, sir. A Coorie shaman, in fact, several of them, drew me pictures of this Byamie, and one of them showed me a rock painting representing this strange creator god who came out of the stars. And when they placed their drawing in front of me, what they showed was a Chitauli. I recognized it from my African initiation. It had a large head. It had large eyes, which were stressed by the artist. It had no mouth, and it had long arms and incredibly long legs. Sir, this was a typical depiction of a Chitauli which I knew from my own people in Africa.

I asked myself “Why?” Here I am in a country many thousands of miles away from Africa, and here I am seeing a being known as the Biamai or Bimi, who is a creature with which I, the African, am familiar.

Amongst the Native American people, sir, I found, for example, amongst certain tribes in America, tribes such as the Hopi people, and those people who stay in those buildings called a pueblo, I found that these people-they have got what are called Katchina creatures, where people wear masks and disguise themselves as certain creatures. And some of these Katchinas are very, very tall, with a huge round head.

Exactly as we have in Africa, I found similar creatures in America. In Africa we call these creatures Egwugwu, or, we call them by another name, called Chinyawu. The Katchina of the Native American people, and the Chinyawu of our people, are identical beings. Now, why should this be? When were American Native people and Africans in contact? When? This is one of the greatest mysteries of all time, sir. It is one of many things that I found throughout the world which left me utterly amazed.

There ARE such creatures, and the sooner skeptics amongst us face up to this fact, the better it shall be. Why is human-kind not progressing? Why are we running around in a great circle of self-destruction and mutual-destruction?

People are basically good; I believe this. People don’t want to start wars. People don’t want to destroy the world in which they stay, but there are creatures, or there is power that is driving we human beings toward self-annihilation. And the sooner we recognize this, the better.

Just now, I live in Africa. Here are my people. Here is my home. But I see Africa being destroyed in wars that make no sense whatsoever to me as an African. I look at India which, like Africa, suffered the scourge of colonialism by the French, the English, and other European powers. But India, through her independence as a country, has achieved the things which we, Africa, have failed to achieve. Why?

India has exploded the atomic bomb and is today one of the feared nations of this world. India has launched satellites into orbit. India, although she has the same problems as Africa has - a burgeoning population, religion as well as tribal strife - although India has got an incredibly poor section of her population, as well as an incredibly rich one, she has achieved things that Africa has failed to achieve.

Now, I ask myself "Why? Why?" Because India was established by people from Africa, and I don't think, sir, as the Black races about this. This is a fact that, thousands of years ago, people from Africa laid the foundation of the greatest civilization of India, as well as other countries in Southeast Asia. There is overwhelming archeological evidence of this. But, why is Africa drowning in war, in disease, and in hunger? Why?

Many times, sir, I sit in my hut and I cry when I see diseases like AIDS destroying us; when I see senseless wars destroying those countries in Africa which had thrived for thousands of years.

Say, Ethiopia is a country that has been free for thousands of years. Ethiopia was once the school of all of Africa. Nigeria was once a great country with a long tradition of self-government - long, long before the White man came to Africa. But today, all of these countries and many others are being destroyed.

Today, sir, there are parts of Africa which have been totally depopulated by war and by the disease called AIDS, a disease which shows every sign of being a man-made disease. I ask myself, "Who or what is destroying Africa, and why?"

Because there are tribes in those villages I lived in, who assisted my search for knowledge, before the Second World War and after. But today these tribes no longer exist anymore. They are gone, dispersed, totally exterminated in senseless wars that gain the Black people nothing.

I am in South Africa now. Here I was born, and here I was to die. But I see my country falling apart like a rotting mango. South Africa was once a powerful country. She had a powerful army. She had huge industries, which were producing everything from locomotives to little radios. But today my country has become a drug-sodden, crime-ridden piece of rubbish. Why? A country doesn't get destroyed almost overnight, unless there are definite forces which are determined to obliterate it.

I recently saw, sir, the destruction of another country inside South Africa. The country is Lesotho. This country, Lesotho, is inhabited by some of the oldest and the wisest tribes in South Africa. Amongst them is a tribe called the Bakwama. The Bakwama people are so ancient that they actually describe to you a mysterious land of huge pointed mountains, a mysterious land ruled by a great god, who had the head of a human being and the body of the lion. [One immediately thinks of the Sphinx in Egypt.]

The Bakwama call this country Ntswama-tfatfi. This land that they name Ntswama-tfatfi means "the land of the Sun-hawk". The hawk is the bird of prey in Heaven-you know? Now, these Bakwama people did, in South Africa, know about the land of Egypt where they say their ancestors came from. And they call this mysterious land of the gods, "the land of the Sun-hawk, or the Sun-eagle", which is exactly how the Egyptians portrayed their country, sir. They portrayed it as "the land of Hor", the god Horus in Greece.

Now, when Princess Diana died, in 1997, I was one of the first Black people to suspect that Princess Diana had been murdered, and I will tell you why this thing happened, sir. Because, about a year or 8 months before Diana died, there died a king in Lesotho, King Moshoeshoe II. King Moshoeshoe II's death was detail-for-detail identical to Princess Diana's death.

Consider this please, all of you who might find my words incredible: Princess Diana died in a tunnel, but the king of Lesotho died in a ravine. He had gone far away to investigate a problem in his cattle ranch. It was found that he was overdue, and when the people went to search for him, they heard from various boys who were looking after the cattle in the Basotho-land mountains, that the boys had heard what sounded like a rifle shot, and when the men went to look where the rifle shot had sounded, they found the king's car off the road and deep in the ravine.

They went down their and they found that the king of Lesotho was in his car. He was strapped in a safety belt, but he had a terrible injury at the back of his head. And they found that the king's driver was dead at the steering wheel. But, the two men who were the king's bodyguards, who were riding in the king's vehicle in the seat directly behind the king, had escaped without a scratch. One of the men entered the car and pulled out the dying king. The king apologized to them for messing-up their hands with his blood, which was a tradition, that a dying king must thank the people who are trying to get him out of where he is. And he must apologize to them for putting them into trouble, because anyone who handles the sacred blood of the king is in spiritual trouble of some kind after that.

Then, when the king's car was brought out of the ravine, it was found that there was a hole, like a bullet hole, in one of the tires of the car. And that car's tire was mysteriously removed, afterwards, when the king's car was stored not in a safe place, but in a yard outside where anybody could get at

it. And, when an autopsy was conducted on the body of the driver of the king's car, it was found that the man had been so drunk as to not have been able to drive the car at all. And third, the man who had driven the king's car and who died at the wheel had not been the man who usually drives the king's car.

Now, sir, do you see this mystery now? The death of the Lesotho king matched that of Princess Diana, which was to follow it. In many other amazing details than I have detailed now, and so the nation of Lesotho was reduced to a wretch after the king's death, when rioting took place as a result of a general election which provisional party members prospected and controlled.

Today Lesotho is an economically moribund nation. And Lesotho is a country which was the place of a strange experiment - an experiment which consisted of the building of a huge dam, whose purpose was to supply South Africa, and not Lesotho, with large quantities of water. And we have recently heard ugly rumors emanating from that country, that somebody was bribed to facilitate the building of this huge dam where the water of a small nation is being used to supply, to supplement the water supplies of a highly industrialized nation.

There are many strange things, sir, which have taken place in South Africa, and are taking place, as well as in other parts of Africa, which make no sense to me as an African. There are wars which take place in Africa, where after an African country has gained its independence from the colonial power, then a force of rebels pick up weapons against that country's government, but instead of the rebels fighting the government to the bitter end, what happens again and again is that the rebel forces split into various groups which end up fighting not only the government in power, but also each other. And the result is that, in several African countries, the country is so destroyed that, no matter which party wins, the people lose. The United Nations are caused to be called in, in order to create some semblance of peace. In other words, Africans have now started fighting wars which bring about not victory, but the destruction of themselves, as well as their people.

I would like to draw your attention, sir, to the senseless tide which is still raging in the Sudan, as well as other parts of Africa. I would like to draw your attention, sir, to the longest and most terrible civil war which is destroying the southern parts of the Sudan. I would like to draw your attention, and that of your readers, sir, to the terrible war which is destroying Angola. And one part of the world, to the East of Southern Africa, has been so raped by many years of war that there are now places where you don't even hear a bird-thing. All living forms of life have been wiped-out in that place. Now, why?

And then, I have found that these countries that are being destroyed by senseless wars which are totally out of character for us Africans, and I speak as an African, are those countries which, had they been left alone, could have supplied the whole of Africa with food, with water, and with valuable minerals. I am told, sir, that under the surface of Angola, under the plains of Angola, are deposits of coal which are without equal in this world. I am further told that in parts of Angola there are deposits of oil which are second only to those reserves of oil which are in the Middle East.

The Sudan is a country which I visited several times during, and even after, the Second World War. In the Sudan there was so much food that you received free food from the villagers, as you traveled through the Sudan. Today, southern Sudan is a starvation-torn, battle of rage hellhole where children die of diarrhea in the bush while the vultures and buzzards wait on the branches of trees to feast. Africa is being systematically and deliberately destroyed by a power of such relentlessness that it is continuing the destruction even now. But, this power is getting desperate.

Martin: Excuse me. Did you say there was coal in Angola or gold?

Credo Mutwa: Coal, sir, coal. There are diamonds in Angola, sir. And I have learned from reliable people that there is more oil under Angola, in certain places, than there is in certain parts of the Middle East.

Is this what Africa is being destroyed for? Is this what our nations are being slaughtered for - for coal under the surface, for diamonds? If so, who is this intelligence that is behind this? Are people less valuable than minerals? Are people less valuable than oil?

Because, sir, genocide, worse than anything that Hitler ever committed upon the Jewish people, is taking place in Africa NOW, and the people of America don't seem to care a damn. Why? We are the best friends that the United States has got. We are the best people. We buy American products. Our children want to look like American children. Our kids wear jeans, sir, and they even speak with American accents, because you American people are our role model. Why are you allowing us to be slaughtered? Why? Why?

Not only are we being killed by war, sir, we are being killed by drugs. There were no drugs in South Africa during the days of the apartheid government. Now, under our democratic government, our country has become one drug-sodden cess pit. Why?

Today, sir, and I speak as a traditional shaman, one of my purposes is to try and help people with a drug problem. Sir, I can help a young African who is abusing marijuana or hashish. I can help a young African who is dependent upon Dakwa. But, sir, I am useless, my skills are rubbish and I fail again - and so do many like me - to help young Black people who are addicted to a new type of drug which is called "crack". It is a hard-looking drug. It's like hardened chocolate when you see it, and this thing is so addictive that no shaman can help a young victim of this drug.

I am asking the people of the United States of America, I am asking my Black brothers and my Black sisters over there, why are you allowing the country which is your mother to be exterminated?

I don't care what skeptics say, sir. Please forgive me when I really get hot under the collar. I don't care what skeptics say, but there IS a force destroying Africa and I am not buying the nonsense that it is the bankers of the IMF and other big banks. You don't kill the goose that gives you the golden egg, so why would the bankers want to destroy Africa? There is another force behind these people, a terrible, alien force, which does things behind the scenes which - and the sooner we recognize this, the better - sir, it is very common for human beings who are in trouble to blame forces other than those inside themselves. But, I have studied the situation in Africa since the end of the Second World War, and before, and I have evidence that points to an alien force at work in Africa. What, who is wiping out Africa's oldest tribes? Please, sir, let me tell you a thing that cuts my soul. May I please?

Martin: Please, continue.

Credo Mutwa: Please, I'm sorry to talk so much. Please forgive me. I belong to the Zulu nation, a nation of warriors, a nation of wise people. My people, sir, have never been studied by White anthropologists thoroughly, but the Zulu people knew things that, if I were to share with your readers, they would be amazed.

Let me show you this. The Zulu people KNEW, amongst many things, that it is the Earth which moves around the Sun, and not the other way around. They said, to explain this thing to the initiated, that the Earth is a feminine creature and the Sun is a male creature, and, therefore, the Earth is the mobile one who dances around the Sun - the beautiful princess who dances around the fiery king who is the Sun. Our people knew that the Earth was a sphere. Our people knew about germs and their function. When the White man came to Africa, where did this incredible knowledge come from? I do not know. The people of America and the people of Europe say that it was Albert Einstein who came out with the idea that time and space are one and the same thing. My answer to that is, "No!"

My people, the Zulus, knew that space and time was one thing. In the language of the Zulu, one of the names for space is umkati. And the Zulu name for time is isikati. Now, our people knew that space and time were one and the same thing, hundreds of years before Einstein's birth.

And furthermore, our people believed, like the Dogon people, that there are 24 planets in our part of space which are inhabited by intelligent creatures of various states. And, this knowledge has never been recorded in any book, and I and my aunt are the only surviving high sanusi [shaman] in South Africa who are the keepers of this knowledge. My aunt is still alive. She is about 90-something years old, and I am now close to dead, suffering from diabetes - a terrible killer of African people nowadays.

And, what I am trying to tell you is that, although my people had this tremendous knowledge, which has never been written down in any book, the

Zulu people today, a huge percentage of them, are victims of HIV or outright AIDS. And it has been calculated, sir, in the next 50 years, fully three-fourths of the Zulu people in Natal are going to die. And I am the keeper of sacred objects which I inherited from my grandfather. I am, from my mother's side, a direct descendant of the last true Zulu king, Dingame. And, my duty should be to protect my people from anything that threatens their existence. Look, please, sir. Anyone who studies humanity with love, with understanding, and with care, recognizes the fact that there is a shining God which is struggling to be born within each and every one of us. We are trying to fight back, although many of us are not yet aware of this. We are developing an attitude of wanting to protect our planet, no matter who or what we are. There are chiefs in Africa who fine you very heavily if they see you destroying a tree unnecessarily. This thing was common in the past, but it disappeared with the coming of the White people; but now it has come back again. Man is becoming, is struggling to become a more advanced, more caring being, and the aliens are not going to take this lying down. They are going to cause us to kill each other, again. And I am worried about what is going to happen. Sir, I can show you many strange things that African people did to protect themselves against the Grey aliens. The things that our people did were not the result of superstition. They were the result of terrible personal experience. One day I hope to share with you, sir, the story of how I got "taken", we say. We believe, sir, that the Mantindane ("the tormentor"), the Greys, are really servants of the Chitauli. And that they, contrary to what White people think - White people think a wrong thing, sir, many - that the Mantindane are experimenting with us. They are NOT. I repeat, they are not. Anyone who has been through the hells of these beings will tell you that there is nothing experimental in what they do. There is a cold, cold, cold-blooded resolve, and they are not doing what they do to us for themselves, they are doing what they do to us for greater creatures than they are. Please, sir, can you give me a little time to share with you, briefly, what happened to me?

Martin: Oh yes, absolutely, please. We have all the time you need.

Credo Mutwa: Sir, it was an ordinary day, like any other day. It was a beautiful day in the eastern mountains of Zimbabwe, which are called Inyangani. These are mountains to the East of Zimbabwe.

Now, I had been instructed by my teacher to go and find a special herb which we were going to use in the healing of a certain initiate who was badly ill. And my teacher, a woman called Mrs. Moyo, was Ndebele, from Zimbabwe, once known as Rhodesia.

I was looking for this herb, and I was not thinking about anything, and I had no belief whatsoever in these creatures. I had never encountered them before, and although we African people believe in many things, I was mighty skeptical, even about certain entities that we believed in at that time, because I had never encountered anything like that before.

And all of a sudden, sir, I noticed that the temperature around me had dropped, although it was a very hot African day. I suddenly noticed that it was now cold and there was, what appeared to be, a bright blue mist swirling all around me, getting between me and the eastern landscape. I remember wondering, stupidly, what this thing meant, because I had just begun to dig one of the herbs I had found.

Suddenly, I found myself in a very strange place, a place that looked like a tunnel lined with metal. I had worked in mines before, and where I found myself appeared to be a mine tunnel which was lined with silver-greyish metal.

I was lying on what appeared to be a very heavy and very large working bench or a working table, sir. But yet, I was not chained to the table. I was just lying there and my trousers were missing, and so were the heavy boots that I always wore when I was out in the bush. And all of a sudden, in this strange, tunnel-like room, I saw what appeared to be dull, heady-looking, grey, dull-like creatures which were moving toward me.

There were lights in this place, but not lights as we know them. They seemed to be patches of glowing stuff. And there was something above the far entrance which looked like writing, that writing against the silver-grey surface, and these creatures were coming at me but I was hypnotized, just as if the witchcraft had been put upon my head.

But I watched the creatures as they were coming towards me. I didn't know what they were. I was frightened, but I couldn't move my arms or my legs. I just lay there like a goat on a sacrificial altar. And when the creatures came towards me, I felt fear inside me. They were short creatures, about the size of African Pigmy. They have very large heads, very thin arms, and very thin legs.

I noticed, sir, because I am an artist, a painter, that these creatures were built all wrong from an artist's point of view. Their limbs were too long for their body, and their necks were very thin, and their heads were almost as large as full-grown watermelons. They had strange eyes, which looked like goggles of some kind. They had no noses, as we have, only small holes on either side of the raised area between their eyes. Their mouth had no lips, only thin cuts as if made by a razor.

And while I was looking at these creatures, sir, in amazed fascination, I felt something close to my head, about my head. And when I looked up, there was another creature, a slightly bigger one than the other, and it was standing above my head and was looking down at me.

I looked up into its eyes and I was totally hypnotized, and you know, I was spellbound. I looked into the thing's eyes and I noticed that the creature wanted me to keep looking into his eyes. I looked and saw that, through these covers over their eyes, I could see the creature's real eyes behind this black, goggle-like cover. Its eyes were round, with straight pupils, like those of a cat. And the thing was not moving its head. It was breathing; I could see that. I could see little nostrils moving, closing and shutting, but sir, if anybody says to me that I smelled like that creature, really, I would konk him one on the face.

Martin: (Laughter)

Credo Mutwa: The creature smelled like nobody's business. It had a strange smell, a throat-tightening, chemical smell, which smelled like rotten eggs, and also like hot copper [sulfur], a very strong smell.

And the creature saw me looking at it, and it looked down at me and, all of a sudden, I felt a terrible, awful pain on my left thigh, as if a sword had been driven into my left thigh. I screamed in pain, horrible, calling out for my mother, and the creature placed its hand over my mouth. You know, sir, it was like-if you want to know how that felt, please sir, take the leg of a chicken, a live chicken, and place it against your lips. That was how the creature's hand felt upon my mouth.

It had thin, long fingers, which had more joints than my human fingers have. And the thumb was in the wrong place. Each one of the fingers ended in a black claw, almost like certain African birds. The thing was telling me to be quiet. And how long the pain went on, sir, I don't know. I screamed and I screamed and I screamed, again.

And then, all of a sudden, something was pulled out of my flesh, and I looked down and saw my thigh covered with blood, and I saw that one of the creatures - there were four of them, other than the one standing over my head - they wore tight fitting overalls, which were silvery-grey in color, and their flesh resembled the flesh of certain types of fish that we find in the sea off South Africa. And the creature standing above my head appeared to be a female. It was somehow different than the others. It was taller, bigger, although it didn't have breasts like a woman, it appeared to be feminine. And the others appeared to be afraid of it, I don't know how I can describe this.

And then, while this terrible thing was going on, another of the creatures came up to me - it walked sideways, in a slightly jerking way, as if it was drunk - it walked up along the table, to my right side, and it stood next to the one standing above my head. And before I knew what was happening, this creature stuck something that was like a small, silver, ball-point pen with a cable at one end, it pushed this thing, coldly, into my right nostril.

Sir, the pain was out of this world. Blood splattered all over. I choked and tried to scream, but the blood got into my throat. It was a nightmare. Then, it pulled the thing out and I tried to fight and sit up.

The pain was terrible, but the other thing above my head placed its hand upon my forehead and kept me down with very little force. I was choking and trying to spit out the blood, and then I managed to turn my head to the right to spit out the blood, which I did, and then what the creatures did to me, sir, I don't know.

All I do know is that the pain went away, and in place of the pain, strange visions flooded my head, visions of cities, some of which I recognized from my travels - but, cities which were half-destroyed, the buildings having their tops blown away, with windows like empty eye-sockets in a human skull. I saw these visions again and again. All the buildings that I saw were half-drowned in a reddish, muddish water.

It was as if there had been a flood and the buildings were sticking up out of this great flood, partly destroyed by a disaster of some kind, and it was a terrible sight. And then, before I knew it, one of the creatures, the one standing next to my feet, drove something into my organ of manhood, but here there was no pain, just a violent irritation, as if I was making love to something or someone.

And then, when the creature withdrew the thing, which was like a small, black tube which it had forced into my organ of manhood, I did something which produced a strange result, and I did not do it intentionally. I think it was my bladder opened, and I urinated straight into the chest of the creature which had pulled the thing out of my organ.

And if I had shot the creature, it would never have reacted as it did. It jerked away and nearly fell, and then it recovered and staggered away like a drunken insect, and left the room. I don't know whether my urine did it; I don't know. But that is what happened.

Then, after a while, the other creatures went away, leaving me with a dull pain in my nostril, with blood on my thigh, and the table wet with urine. And the thing standing above my head had not moved. It just stood there with its right hand touching its left shoulder, in a strangely beautiful and feminine way. It stood there looking at me. There was no expression in its face. I never saw any of the creatures talk or make any sound of any kind. All I do know is that they appeared to be mute.

And then, out of somewhere there arrived two other creatures, one of which was made entirely out of metal. Even in my worst nightmares, I still see this creature. It was tall. It was big. And the area in which we were was too small for it. It walked with a slight stoop, moving forward, and it was definitely not a living thing. It was a metal creature, a robot of some kind. And it came and it stood near my feet, its whole body clumsily bent, looking down at me. There was no mouth. There was no nose. There were just two bright eyes, which seemed to change color, and seemed to move somehow, like the crackling of an electrical device.

And then, behind this huge, bent creature, came a creature which surprised me. It was very, very, very, very swollen, sir, in appearance. It had pink skin. It had a blondish, very human body. It had very bright, blue, slanting eyes. It had hair which looked like nylon fiber of some kind. It had high cheekbones and an almost human mouth, with full lips and a small, pointed chin. The creature, sir, was definitely a female but like an artist and a painter, which I am, and also a sculptor, I noticed that the creature was totally out of proportion. It was wrong.

First, its breasts were thin and pointed, and set too high upon its chest, not where a normal woman's breasts would be. Its body was powerful, almost fat, but its legs were too short and its arms were too short in proportion to the rest of its body. And it came towards me, looked down at me, and before I knew what it was doing, somehow it mated with me. It was a horrible experience, sir, even worse than what had been done to me before. But even now, the trauma of that day had affected my life even now, exactly 40 years later.

And after that, when the creatures had gone, leaving only the one creature which had been standing about my head, the creature standing about my head shook me by the hair, it gripped me by the head and forced me to stand off the table and to get off the table. I did that, and such was the state that I was in, that I fell onto my knees and hands, onto the floor.

And I noticed that that floor was strange. It had moving patterns in it, which kept on changing and shifting-purple, red, and greenish patterns, on a metal-grey background. And the creature pulled me by the hair, again, forcing me to stand up, and it pushed me roughly and made me follow it.

Sir, it would take too long for me to describe what I saw in that strange place, as the creature pushed me, roughly, from room to room. Even now my mind can't grasp what it was that I saw. Amongst many things that I saw were huge cylindrical objects, made of what appeared to be glass of some kind. And in these object, cylinders, which reached from the roof to the floor of the place we were going through, was what appeared to be a sort of a greyish-pink liquid. And in this liquid I saw small editions of the alien creatures floating round and round, like disgusting little frogs, inside this liquid.

I couldn't understand what it was that I was being shown. But then, in the last room I was led through, I saw people, and other strange creatures, which, even now, my mind can't make head or sense out of, lying on the table. And I passed a White man, a real White man, who smelled like a human being, was smelling of sweat, urine, excrement, and fear. This White man was lying on a table like the one I had been lying on, and I looked into his eyes and he looked into mine as I went by.

And then I found myself out in the bush. I found that my trousers were missing. There was a terrible pain in my left thigh. There was a pain in my penis which was starting to swell, and when I tried to pass water, the pain was excruciating. I took off my shirt and I used it as a loin-cloth and I walked through the bush.

I first met a group of young Rhodesian Black people who guided me to my teacher's village. And when I arrived outside that village, I smelled so horribly that every dog in the village came yapping and snarling to tear me to pieces. And it was only my teacher and her other students and the villagers who saved me on that day. My teacher and the villagers were not at all surprised by what I had to tell them. They accepted it, sir. They said to me that what had happened to me had happened to many other people before, and that I was lucky to return alive, because many people have disappeared in that part of the land, never to be seen again - White people, Black people, and so on.

Sir, I'm cutting a very long story short. In the year following, 1960, I was delivering parcels in the city of Johannesburg. You see, I was working in a curio shop, when a White man shouted at me to stop. I assumed that the White man was a secret policeman who wanted to look into my identity documents. And when I tried to produce the documents, he told me, angrily, that he didn't want to see my stinking documents. Sir, he asked me this question: "Listen, where the hell have I seen you before? Who are you?"

I said, "I am nobody, sir; I am just a working man."

He said, "Don't bullshit me, man; who the hell are you? Where did I see you before?"

And then I looked at him. I recognized him - his long, straggly, golden-brown hair, his ridiculous mustache and beard. I remembered him - his blue eyes blood-shot and naked-terror, shining upon his eyes, and his skin as pale as that of a goat.

I said, "Meneer", which is the African's way. "Meneer - I saw you in Rhodesia in a certain place underground." And if I had hit that White man with my fist, he wouldn't have reacted the way he did, sir. He turned away and walked with a terrible expression, and he disappeared on the other side of the street.

Now, roughly, this is what happened to me, sir, but it is not a unique experience at all.

Since that time I met many, many, many people who have had the identical experience that I said, and most of them were traditional Black men and women who can neither read nor write. They were coming to me to seek my help as a shaman, but I was, myself, looking for somebody wiser than I to tell me what had happened to me, exactly.

Because, sir, when I get caught by the Mantindane, you become so traumatized, your life becomes so changed, you become so embarrassed and ashamed of yourself, you develop a self-hatred which you cannot understand, and there are subtle changes in your life which make no sense to you.

One: You develop a strange love for humankind. You want to shake everybody by the shoulders and say, "Hey, wake-up people; we are not alone. I know we are not alone!"

And, you develop a feeling that your life is no longer your own; and furthermore, you become compelled with a strange edge to move from place to place, to travel. You become worried about the future; you become worried about people.

And another thing, sir, which I hoped one day you would send people to me to see for their own self: you develop knowledge which doesn't belong to you. You develop an understanding of space, an understanding of time and creation which makes no sense to you as a human being - it is a state, after your terrible torture, after substances have been removed from you, some kind of exchange takes place where you suddenly know things that the Mantindane would know, which ordinary human beings do not know.

But, sir, I know that this sharing of God often happens even when for example, at one time, in 1966, in South Africa, sir, I was arrested and rather savagely interrogated by the security police. It was that time when every Black intellectual, no matter who he or she was, had a visit from these really nasty guys, who put you to torture, sometimes, who used to put electrical devices on you, and ask you questions, and so on.

Sometimes, when these "human beings" were torturing you, you often used to sense what they were thinking. Somehow, when you are being tortured by human beings, not by Mantindane only, there is a transference of thought. For example, when a particularly nasty secret policeman was coming to beat you, you KNEW what he was thinking, even before he burst into the room in which you were held. You knew that he was coming, and you knew exactly what he was thinking and what he intended to do to you.

So, this is why I say the strange things that flood my mind. And what flooded my mind on that day were visions from the mind of the Mantindane.

Since that time - I am a man of only very limited education - I found it hard to speak, let alone to write English. I take long to say things which people of better English would say in few words. But, my hands are capable of making things which nobody ever taught me.

I make engines, rocket engines that actually work. I make guns, of any type I wish, and all people who know me will tell you this and, Mr. David Icke, sir, might show you pictures of what I've done around my new home. I have made large robots out of scrap iron, and some of these robots are going to work. I don't know where I acquired this knowledge from. And since that terrible day, the visions I have seen since I was a child, and the ordinary impressions which I have as a shaman, have grown much more intense.

I don't know why, and I want to know the reason why. But I can tell you, sir, that these creatures, which people wrongly call aliens, are not aliens at all.

Over many years of looking into this thing, trying to understand it, I can tell you this: that the Mantindane, and the other kinds of alien beings that our people know about, are sexually compatible with human beings. The Mantindane are capable of impregnating African women.

And I have come across many cases of this during the last 30 years or so. For example, according to our culture, abortion is regarded as worse than murder. And if a tribal woman from a rural area in South Africa is found to be pregnant by some unknown person, and then her pregnancy disappears, that, sir, relative to that woman, accuses her of having committed abortion, and yet she denies this, of course.

And because of the fight that results between her and her relatives, the husband's relatives, then she challenges these people who are accusing her to take her to a sangoma; that is a person like myself. The sangoma will sometimes examine the woman and, if the sangoma finds that the woman had been pregnant, and had somehow had her fetus removed - a thing which, when it is done by the Mantindane, results in specific injuries to the woman which anyone with experience can recognize - then, the sangoma knows that the woman is telling the truth.

Also, the smell which clings to people who have been through the hands of the Mantindane, that meticulous man which is unforgettable, always clings to all women who have been impregnated by the Mantindane, no matter how much perfume or powder they try to use.

So, that is why many such cases land on the doorstep of my life. Sangomas bring such people to me in large numbers, because they think I am the best one to help in such problems.

So, in the last 40 years or so, I have received many women who have actually been impregnated by the Mantindane and their pregnancies mysteriously terminated, leaving the woman feeling defiled, feeling guilty, and rejected by her family. It becomes my duty to convince the family of the woman's innocence, to try and heal the terrible spiritual and mental, as well as physical-trauma that the woman has undergone, and to otherwise help her and her members of the family, and forget what happened.

No, sir; if these aliens are from a far away planet, why are they able to impregnate women? And why did that strange creature, which was naked, with red pubic hair, which climbed over me on that working table, why did it have an organ which, though slightly different from that of a normal woman, was still a recognizable female organ?

The creature's organ was in the wrong place. It was slightly more in the front, where that of normal woman is between the legs. But it was recognizable, and it looked like a female organ. It had hair like a woman's organ.

So, sir, I believe that these so-called aliens don't come from far away at all. I believe that they are here with us, and I believe that they need substances from us, just as some of us human beings use certain things from wild animals, such as monkey glands, for certain selfish purposes of our own.

I believe, sir, that we should study this dangerous phenomenon very, very, clearly and with objective minds.

Far too many people fall into the temptation of looking upon these "aliens" as supernatural creatures. They are just solid creatures, sir. They are like us; and, furthermore, I'm going to make a statement here which will come as a surprise: the Grey aliens, sir, are edible. Surprised?

Martin: Please continue.

Credo Mutwa: I said, sir, the Grey aliens are edible.

Martin: Yes, I heard that and I'm anxious to...

Credo Mutwa: Their flesh is protein, just as animal flesh on Earth is, but, anyone who ingests Grey alien flesh comes very, very close to death. I nearly did. You see, in Lesotho there is a mountain called Laribe; it is called the Crying Stone mountain. On several occasions, in the last 50 years or so, alien craft have crashed against this mountain.

And one last incident was reported in the newspapers not so long ago. An African who believes that these creatures are gods, when they find the corpse of a dead Grey alien, they take it, put it in a bag, and drag it into the bush, where they dismember it and ritually eat it. But some of them die as a result of ingesting that thing.

About a year before I had the experience from the Inyangani Mountains, I had been given, by a friend of mine in Lesotho, flesh from what he called a sky god. I was skeptical.

He gave me a small lump of grey, rather dry stuff, which he said was the flesh. And he and I and his wife ritually ate this thing, one night. After we had eaten this thing, sir, on the following day, exactly, our bodies erupted into a rash which was like nothing I had experienced in my life before.

Our bodies were so full of the rash and urticaria, it was as if we had small pox. We itched, the itching was horrible, especially under the arm-pits and between the legs, and the buttocks. Our tongues began to swell. We could not breathe. And for a number of days, my friend, his wife and I were totally helpless, secretly attended by initiates who were studying under my friend, who was a shaman.

I came very close to death. There was bleeding from nearly every orifice in our body. We passed blood, much blood when we went to the toilet. We could barely walk, barely breathe. And after about 4 or 5 days, the rash subsided, then the peeling of the skin took its place now. Our skins began to peel, in scales like that of a snake shedding its skin.

Sir, it was one of the most terrible experiences I had undergone. In fact, when I began to feel better, I think that my being abducted by the Mantindane was the direct result of my having ingested flesh from one of these creatures. I had not believed that what my friend was giving me was flesh from a creature. I assumed it was some kind of root or herb or whatever. But, afterwards, I recalled the taste of the thing. It had a coppery taste, and had the same type of smell that I was to encounter in 1959.

And, after the rash went down - while I was still peeling and we were smeared from head to foot with coconut oil by the initiates, every day - a strange change came over us, sir, which I am asking all people of knowledge who would read this in your country to try and explain to me. We went crazy, sir, utterly crazy.

We started laughing like real loony tunes. It was ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha, day after day-for the slightest things we started laughing our heads off, for hours, until you were nearly exhausted.

And then the laughing went away; and then a strange thing happened, a thing which my friend said was the goal which those who ate the flesh of a Mantindane wanted to achieve.

It was as if we had ingested a strange substance, a drug, a drug like no other on this Earth. Suddenly, our feelings were heightened.

When you drank water, it was as if you had drunk a wine of some kind. Water became as delicious as a man-made drink. Food began to taste amazingly. Every feeling was heightened, and it's indescribable - it was as if I was one with the very heart of the universe. I cannot describe it any other way.

And this feeling of amazing intensity of feeling lasted for over 2 months. When I listened to music, it was as if there was music behind the music, behind the music. When I painted pictures - which is what I do for a living - and when I was holding a particular color on the tip of my brush, it was as if there were other colors in that color. It was an indescribable thing, sir. Even now I cannot describe it. But let me now, sir, go to something else.

The Mantindane are not the only alien beings that we Africans have seen and know about, and have got stories to tell about.

Many, many, many centuries ago, before the first White-man came to Africa, we African people encountered a race of alien beings which looked exactly like the European White Man who were going to invade Africa in our future.

These alien creatures are tall. Some of them are rather well built, like athletes, and they have slightly slanting blue eyes and high cheek-bones. And they have got golden hair, and they look exactly like the Europeans of today, with one exception: their fingers are beautifully made, long and like those of musicians and artists.

Now, these creatures came to Africa out of the sky, in craft which looked like the boomerang of the Australian people. Now, when one of these craft comes down to land, it creates a whirlwind of dust, which makes a very large sound indeed, like that of a tornado. In the language of some African tribes, a whirlwind is zungar-uzungo.

Now, our people gave several names to these White-skinned aliens. They called them Wazungu, a word which loosely means "god" but literally means "people of the dust-devil or the whirlwind".

And, our people were familiar with these Wazungu from the start. They saw them, and they saw that some-in fact, many-of these Wazungu carry what appears to be a sphere made of crystal or glass, a sphere which they always playfully bounce like a ball in their hands. And when a force of warriors tries to capture a Wazungu, the Wazungu throws this ball into the air, catches it in his hands, and then disappears.

But, some Wazungu were captured by Africans in the past and forcibly kept prisoner in the villages of chiefs, and in the caves of shamans. The person who had captured the Muzungu, as he is called in singular, had to make sure that he kept the glass-globe well-hidden from the Wazungu. So long as he kept the globe hostage, the Muzungu could not escape.

And when Africans saw the real Europeans, the White men from Europe, they transferred to them the name Wazungu. Before we met the people from Europe, we Africans, we had met White-skinned Wazungu, and we transferred the name Wazungu to the real Europeans, from the aliens.

Now, in the Zulu language, we call a White man Umlungu. Now, the word Umlungu means exactly the same as Wazungu, “a god or a creature which creates a big whirlwind underground”.

In Zaire, called now the Democratic Republic of the Congo, White people are called Watende or Walende. This, again, means “a god or a White creature”. And, the word Watende not only is used to refer to the pink-skinned alien, but is also used to refer to the field Chitauli. In Zaire, when shamans talk fearfully about the lords who control the Earth, they refer to them not as Chitauli, but they refer to them euphemistically as Watende-wa-muinda - that is, “the White creature which carries a light” because at night the Chitauli’s forehead eyes glow like red lights in the dense bush. They glow like the rear lights of an automobile in the dense bush. So, a Watende-wa-muinda “the White creature of the light”, that is what the Chitauli are called in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

There are over 24 other alien creatures, sir, that we Africans know about, but I will tell you briefly, now, about only two.

Sir, in the country called Zimbabwe, where I had my encounter in 1959, there is also another creature. This is the most amazing creature, and I saw it once, and so did several other people, some Black and some White, who were with me. This creature is a huge creature, and shaped exactly like a gorilla, but it is unlike a gorilla, which often walks on its feet, as well as on its knuckles. The creature I’m talking about, sir, stands about 8 feet or 9 feet high, and is built exactly like a gorilla, but its body is very powerful. Its shoulders are very wide, its neck is very thick. It is covered with thick, rough fur, like no other wild animal in Africa.

It is a humanoid creature, with thighs and legs and feet, as well as arms and hands which look exactly like those of a human being, only covered with a heavy mat of dark-brown fur. This creature, sir, is known as Ogo by the people of Zimbabwe. And schools of people have seen this creature, hundreds over the many generations. Some of these creatures have been seen right here in South Africa, in isolated bushy and mountainous places.

And these Ogo are, detail for detail, exactly like what the Native American people of the Northwestern United States call a Sasquatch or Bigfoot.

In fact, I say it is the same creature and we have it right here in southern Africa. It is also exactly the same creature, but with a totally different skin color, as the one that is seen by the people of Nepal on the slopes of the Himalaya mountains, the creature that is called a Yeti.

Now, then, the last creature, sir, a creature which is so well known in South Africa, and elsewhere in Africa, that if you mention its name, people smile. It is called a Tokoloshe. Every African knows what a Tokoloshe is. Some call it Tikoloshe.

It looks like a very nasty looking teddy-bear in appearance, in that it's head is like that of a teddy-bear, but it has got a thick, sharp, bony ridge on top of its head. The ridge goes from above its forehead to the back of its head, and with this ridge it can knock down an ox by butting it with its head.

This creature causes the Black people in certain places to raise their beds on bricks, one brick laid on top of the other one, about 3 feet above the ground. And you find this all over South Africa. This Tokoloshe likes to play with children, and has been seen hundreds of times by school children, in various parts of South Africa, even in recent times.

Sometimes it will terrorize children by scratching them as they sleep, leaving long, parallel scratches on a child's back and upon a child's thighs, scratches that become infected and itch terribly.

About two years ago, a creature like this terrorized a whole school of children in Soweto, near Johannesburg. And the school children called it pinky-pinky. Now, this creature is not only known in South Africa amongst Black people, it is also known, sir, amongst Polynesian people of Hawaii, and other islands in the Pacific. These people lift their huts, their grass houses, on stilts, to the height exactly that Africans lift their bed. When you ask a Polynesian, "Why do you built your huts like this?" The Polynesian will say, "We want to protect ourselves from Tiki."

Now, this is interesting, sir that a creature exactly like the one seen in South Africa is also seen on some Pacific islands, and the name by which it is known in the Pacific, Tiki, is very close to the African word Tikiloshe, or Tokoloshe.

One day I hope to share more of this information with your readers, but my appeal, again, is this: Please investigate! Please, let us investigate! Let us stop being too skeptical. Excessive skepticism is just as dangerous and as evil as gullibility.

Nobody can tell me that aliens don't exist. Let someone tell me, what is the meaning of this hole in my side? Let someone tell me, why is it that after I had been mated to that strange creature, in that strange place, my organ of manhood swelled horribly, and for many years after that I couldn't make love to an ordinary woman, properly. Why? If that was a figment of my imagination, how can a figment of one's imagination leave you with scars and cracks on your male organ, some of which have not healed to this date? Let such people answer me that question.

We must investigate, sir, because there is every sign that the alien creatures sharing this planet with us are getting desperate. Why? Because, you see, there is a great fight shaping up, and anyone who thinks deeply about such things can see this fight coming.

What am I talking about? Sir, until 30 or 40 years ago, very few people cared about the environment. Very few people were concerned about the destruction of the rain forests in Africa and elsewhere. Very few people were concerned when White hunters, who, at that time were regarded as heroes, massacred Africa's animals in the thousands. Very few people were concerned when the great nations of the world, such as the United States, Russia, Britain, and France, openly tested nuclear weapons in many parts of the world.

Today there are people who would spit at a big-game hunter if he showed himself in a hotel and announced what he was. Today a big-game hunter is no longer looked upon as a hero, but rather as a murderer. Today there are men and women, Black and White, who are prepared to risk their lives to save trees, to save animals, and to stop the insanity of testing nuclear weapons.

Sir, what does this tell you? It tells you that, after many thousands of years of being dominated by alien creatures, human beings are starting to fight back. Human beings are starting to care about the world in which they live and in which they find themselves. But, the aliens, the Chitauli, the Mantindane - call them what you will - are not going to take that lying down. They are going to punish us, as they did centuries before.

The aliens once destroyed a nation whose name has come down to us Africans as the nation of Amariri. It is said that the kings of Amariri, this fabulous country which we believed lay beyond the setting of the Sun, were refusing to do what the Chitauli were telling them to do.

The kings, at that time, were refusing to sacrifice their children to the Chitauli. They were refusing to make war on fellow human-beings, in order to sustain the Chitauli, with their god's image.

It is said that the Chitauli brought down a fire from Heaven. They took fire from the Sun itself and they used it to burn that great civilization away. They caused earthquakes and tidal waves and destroyed the great civilization of the Red people of the long green hair, who are said to have been the first people ever to be created on this Earth. It is said that the Chitauli allowed only a few surviving people to escape the destruction of Amariri, and that they are prepared to do this again in the very near future.

I'm worried about what is going to happen in other countries in the world. All these earthquakes, which have caused the destruction of human life in the Middle East and in parts of Africa and India, why does my heart feel frightened when I read about all this? These earthquakes are happening with unnatural regularity now, in Egypt, in Armenia, and one of these earthquakes was so powerful, it went right through the planet Earth and caused a very sacred rock in Namibia, a rock known as the Finger of God, which has been standing for tens of thousands of years, to collapse in a heap of rubble. And when that rock collapsed, I received many worried letters from sangomas who believed that because this rock had fallen, then the end of the world was very, very near.

Is there a question, please?

Martin: I read your poem, your pledge. In your pledge you mention the name Jabulon. Can you explain who that is?

Credo Mutwa: Jabulon, sir, is a very strange god. He is supposed to be the leader of the Chitauli. He is a god, to my great surprise, which I find certain groups of White people, especially, worshipping. We have known about Jabulon for many, many centuries, we Black people. But I am surprised that there are White people who worship this god, and these people, amongst them are people whom many have blamed for all the things that have happened on this Earth, namely, the Freemason people. We believe that Jabulon is the leader of the Chitauli. He is the Old One. And one of his names, in the African language, sir, is Umbaba-Samahongo - "the lord king, the great father of the terrible eyes" - because we believe that Jabulon has got one eye which, if he opens it, you die if he looks at you.

It is said, sir, the Umbaba ran away from an eastern land during a power struggle with one of his sons, and he took refuge in Central Africa, where he hides in a cave, deep underground. And it is an amazing thing, sir, it is said that under the Mountains of the Moon in Zaire is this great city of copper, of many thousands of shining buildings. There dwells the god Umbaba or Jabulon. And this god is waiting for the day when the surface of the Earth will be cleared of human beings so that he, and his children, the Chitauli, can come out and enjoy the heat of the Sun.

And, one day, sir, I had a very unexpected visit while I was living in Soweto, near Johannesburg. I was visited by priests from Tibet.

One of these priests, I'm sure you have met him or you know of him. His name is Akyong Rinpoche. He is one of the leading Tibetan priests in England who was exiled with the Dalai Lama, and he visited me one day while I was in my medicinal village in Soweto. And one of the things that Akyong Rinpoche asked me was, "Do I know of a secret city which is somewhere in Africa, a city made of copper?"

I said, "But, Akyong, you are describing the city of Umbaba, the city of the unseen god, the god who hides underground. How do you know about this?"

And Akyong Rinpoche, who is a very serious investigator of strange phenomena, told me that at one time the great Lama left Tibet with a group of followers and came to Africa searching for this city. And the Lama, and his followers, were never seen again. They never returned back to Tibet.

Now, sir, we have got stories in central and southern Africa about little Yellow men who came to Africa looking for the city of Umbaba, the city from which you cannot return alive. What is amazing, sir - I don't know whether this falls within the orbit of your newspaper, but - there are very, very disturbing stories which I have followed-up here in South Africa, stories which make no sense to me.

Credo Mutwa: Hello.

Martin: Yes, Credo. May I just say that I am very appreciative of your taking this time to talk with me, and I realize it's difficult.

Credo Mutwa: I appreciate the honor that you are doing me, much more than you realize. And I know how White people often treat anyone who talks on the subject that I am talking about, as weird.

Sir, I really shouldn't be exposing myself to public ridicule, as I am, but, our people ARE DYING! Not only do we have problems with drugs in southern Africa, not only do we have problems with crime in my country, which is getting a thousand times more vicious than it ever was before, not only do we have problems with AIDS, sir, but we also have got weird problems which often come our way-problems which, when you study them together, show you that something unearthly is going on in southern Africa. Can I share this thing with you, sir?

Martin: Yes, please.

Credo Mutwa: Sir, according to my culture it is very rude for one man simply to talk to another man without giving that other man the chance to talk back to him. So, out of respect of your paper and of you, I would like to ask you, in your country, the United States, do you have strange stories about underground structures which are built-because we are having similar stories in South Africa, and with us they are having very strange results, indeed.

Martin: Yes, there are many stories of underground - we call them underground bases, actually, and, in fact, in the newspaper I was associated with earlier, we published an entire edition on exposing the locations of those underground bases. Not only that....

Credo Mutwa: There is exactly the same thing here in South Africa, and there has been for a number of years. I was able to confirm one to my own satisfaction, but I have failed to confirm others. You see, sir, a man like me, who walks two worlds - the African mystical world, as well as the modern, down-to-Earth world - must be careful of what he says. But, about 5 years ago, I was living in the little town of Masikeng, a very historical town which was the site of a famous siege by the Boors, in the war of 1899-1902.

It was in this town, sir, that the Scout movement, the Boy Scout movement, was founded by Captain Powell. I'm sure you've heard about him. But, while I was living in Masinkeng, a number of people came to me, ordinary tribesmen and women, sir, some of them totally illiterate. These people complained to me that their relatives had mysteriously disappeared. They wanted me to divine where their relatives have gone to. And, I asked these people, all of whom did not know each other, where did your relatives disappear?

These people had told me an incredible story, and it was this: Not far from Masikeng there is a famous place which I'm sure you have heard about, a place which we call the Las Vegas of South Africa. This is the famous casino/hotel complex called Sun City.

Martin: Yes.

Credo Mutwa: I was told that under Sun City strange mining operations were in progress, deep underground, and that many of the Africans who worked in those mines disappeared and never returned home again, although their paychecks kept on being sent to their family. The men never returned home, as ordinary miners do.

Now, I looked into this phenomenon, sir, and, like a fool, I refused to believe it. And then more stories came my way, because when an African is in deep trouble, he or she always looks for a sangoma to find the reason behind the trouble.

Sir, the other story was this, and this one I found to be a shocking truth, that there was construction across the border from South Africa, in the land known as Botswana. There, the Americans were working with African labor, who had been sworn to secrecy. The Americans were building there a secret airport which can take modern jet fighters. Now, I couldn't believe this. Again, I was told that many had mysteriously disappeared there-ordinary tribesmen, sir, not even educated Black people; ordinary workers have gone missing. And when their relatives try to find out where they had gone, they are met with stone-cold silence.

Now, I wanted to have a look at this thing, and one thing that made me act was that a strange story swept through South Africa, that a South African jet aircraft, a jet fighter, had shot down a flying saucer. And the jet fighter had been scrambled from this secret base.

Now, sir, I decided to investigate because my credibility as a shaman and as a sangoma was at stake. I went to Botswana. It was very easy. You can still cross through the wire and get into that country. The borders are not as heavily sealed in certain places as many people would think.

I went there with some friends and I found that there was such a base in Botswana, not underground, but on the surface. It is an aircraft base, but Black people are afraid of even being seen near there because it is said that you will disappear if you get too close to the place, and the man who took us there didn't want to come near that place. I studied it from far away, and it does exist, and the man said if we got any nearer to the place, we would disappear. Which is a very odd thing, sir, because there are many military bases all over South Africa, and in Botswana, but this particular one fills the local people with deep terror. Why this would be so, I'm still struggling to find out, even now, because there are too many strange things going on in my country, and they are affecting the lives of many of our people very badly indeed.

Now, there is another thing, sir: It is that one of the things that the Chitauli like to do in their underground caves, where many fires are always kept ablaze, we are told, is that when a Chitauli gets sick and starts to lose a large area of skin on his body, it is said that there is a disease that the Chitauli suffer from which causes them to lose large areas of their skin, leaving only raw flesh.

When the Chitauli gets sick this way, a young girl, a virgin, is usually kidnapped by the servant of the Chitauli and is brought to the underground place. There the girl is bound, hand and foot, and wrapped in a golden blanket, and is forced to lie next to the Chitauli, the sick Chitauli, week after week, being well fed and well cared for, but kept bound hand and foot, and only released at certain times to relieve herself. It is said that after the sick Chitauli shows signs of getting better, then the human girl is manipulated into trying to escape. She is given a chance to escape, a chance which is really not a chance. Then, when the girl escapes, she runs, but she is pursued over a long distance underground by flying creatures which are made of metal, and she is recaptured when she reaches the height of fear and exhaustion.

Then she is laid on an altar, usually a rough rock, flat on top. Then, she is cruelly sacrificed, sir, and her blood is drunk by the sick Chitauli, which then recovers. But, the girl must not be sacrificed until she is very, very, very frightened, because if she is not frightened, it is said that her blood will not save the sick Chitauli. It must be the blood of a very frightened human being, indeed.

Now, this habit of chasing a victim was also practiced by ordinary African cannibals, sir. In Zulu-land, in the last century, there were cannibals who used to eat people, and their descendants, even today, will tell you, if they trust you, that the flesh of the human being who has been frightened and made to run over a great distance, while trying to escape, tastes far better than the flesh of someone who was simply killed.

Now, sir, some time ago here in South Africa - and it is still an ongoing process - 5 White girls disappeared. They were school-girls, sir. These school-girls were, every one of them, a highly talented child - either a child who showed signs of developing spiritual power, or a child who was a leader of her class in one particular thought or subject of learning. Five such children disappeared in South Africa. It was a very big story in the newspaper and, at one time, White people came to me and persuaded me to try and trace these children.

And one day a White man brought to me a rubber toy belonging to a White child who had disappeared. And I took the rubber toy in my hands and I noticed that the creature's eyes appeared to move. It was as if the rubber toy, a toy dinosaur, was about to burst into tears. I felt very bad, as if I could stand up and run away.

And then I told this White man,

"Listen to me: The child who held this toy is dead. What are you trying to do to me? This child is dead. I feel it."

And the White man, who was a television producer, took the toy, the school books, and the jersey, and he went away. And, sure enough, the White school child was found dead, buried in a shallow grave next to a road.

Now, other people came to me asking for my help in finding their missing children. Are they dead? Are they alive? Before I could do anything, sir - at that time I still had a telephone in my home - my telephone started ringing and people with very angry voices, White people voices, shouted at me and told me to stop helping those people. They told me that if I don't stop, acid would be thrown into my wife's face, and that my children would be murdered, one after the other.

And, sure enough, sure enough, my youngest son was brutally stabbed, almost to death, one day, by mysterious people whom his friends later told me had been White-skinned people. And so, I stopped, sir.

I am told, reliably, that over 1,000 children disappear in South Africa, almost every month. And they disappear, never to be seen again. Many people, especially in the newspaper field, think that this is the result of child prostitution rackets. But I do not think so. The children - if you check the history of many of these children, they were not ordinary street children, sir. They are school children who stand out in their class, because of certain subjects at which they are good, or, who stand out in their class because of thoughts which they are good at.

Not only that, sir, but ordinary women have disappeared this way, in Masikeng, also, at more or less the same time that the 5 White children disappeared. In Masikeng, two Black school teachers, female school teachers, disappeared in their car and were never seen again. But I don't want to burden you, sir, with this terrible story.

But let me tell you one last thing: After the disappearance of the 5 White school children, the police arrested a priest, a reverend of the White Reform Church, Reverend Van Rooyen. It was said that it was Van Rooyen who was responsible for the disappearance of these poor White school kids. And, he had been assisted by his girlfriend, who hand-picked these children. Before

Van Rooyen could appear in court, a very strange thing happened. He and his girlfriend were shot in their little vehicle, a little 4x4 truck. And, after they had been shot, the truck managed to come to a stop - a thing that a moving truck never does - and I was told, afterwards, by a White woman who knew Van Rooyen, that Van Rooyen and his woman had not committed this crime as the police had said to the newspapers.

They had actually been murdered. Why? Because Van Rooyen was found with a gunshot wound in his right temple, and yet, all of the people who knew him knew that he had been a left-handed man. So, who murdered Van Rooyen and his woman? It is one of the biggest and the ugliest mysteries in South Africa to date.

There is more, much more along these lines, but I won't waste your time with it.

Martin: When we were talking about the Greys, you talked about the Chitauli. You had described them, the reptilians - now correct me if I'm wrong - were you describing them as tall, thin, large-headed, large-eyed beings?

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir. They are tall. They walk with a - you see, the Grey aliens walk with a jerking motion, sir, as if there is something wrong with their legs. But, the Chitauli walk very gracefully, like trees gently swaying in the wind.

They are tall. They have large heads. Some of them have got horns all around their heads. Now, let me express amazement, there exists - that in one of the films that recently appeared in South Africa, a Star Wars film, the latest one, shows a character EXACTLY like a Chitauli, exactly! It's got horns all around it's head. These are the warrior Chitauli.

The royal Chitauli have got no horns around their head, but have got a darker ridge reaching from above their forehead to their back. They are very graceful creatures, we are told, sir, but they have got - their little finger is a claw which is a very sharp, straight claw, which they use to punch into human noses, in order to drink human brains in one of their rituals.

Martin: Now, are they fair skinned?

Credo Mutwa: They are not pink skinned. They are white-skinned, like paper, almost like certain types of cardboard. Their skin is like that, it is the skin, definitely, of scaly, reptile-like creatures. Their foreheads are very large, bulging, and they look highly, highly intelligent.

Martin: Now, it's been said - I've heard that these beings are very controlling and they thrive on "divide and conquer".

Credo Mutwa: Yes, they do, sir. They set human being against human being. I could give you many amusing examples, using some African language, how the Chitauli are said to have divided human beings. They like - do you know who they like, sir? They like religious fanatics.

Martin: (Laughter)

Credo Mutwa: Ones who are burdened by too much religion are very popular with the Chitauli.

Martin: Well, now, I can't help but wonder if the Chitauli are prevalent in the United States because of the large number of underground bases. In the United States, alone, the numbers of missing children are so astronomically high that the White-slave trade does not answer those questions.

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir, I agree. But, I'm sorry, sir, I feel that it is in Africa that something very funny is designed to happen. Let me tell you what happened to me, recently, sir. We still have a little time. I won't be long, one minute or less.

Martin: No, no - that's fine.

Credo Mutwa: When I started talking to Mr. David Icke, and it was (when) Mr. Icke started speaking about me in Cape Town, I received a visit from 3 White people who pretended to be from South America. These people told me that something is going to happen on the 9th of this month, on 9-9-99. They said that this was going to happen in Lake Titicaca, a place which I once visited about 2 years ago.

Martin: A very special place.

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir. And then, these people told me, when we were speaking - these people, sir, speaking through an interpreter - told me that Africa is the country where something is going to happen soon which will decide the fate of all humankind.

And then, we parted on very friendly words, sir, but these people had left me a letter which I did not open until a few hours after they had left. And in this letter was written that I should not attend David Icke's talk, and that a strange person called Alia Czar was watching me. I don't know who Alia Czar is.

And they said to me - these people had said to me when we met - that they were under a great lord called Melchizedek. And, after I'd read this threatening letter, which threatened that if I talked, my wife, who is sick of cancer in hospital, is going to die if I talked. Then, I began to wonder. Who were these people?

Then, because I've been to South America before, I found that the Spanish language with which they were speaking was different from the language, the Spanish which is spoken in South America. These people were using Spanish from Spain, and not the slightly weakened Spanish from South America.

Even now, sir, that threat is still hanging over my head and, may I point out, sir, a strange thing which whoever you will send to me one day will see for themselves: my wife is sick of cancer in the hospital, which is the largest hospital in South Africa, sir. And in one of the x-rays taken of my wife's womb, a strange metal device was seen - of a kind which has puzzled doctors. I spoke to my wife. I asked her, "Who put this object, which the x-rays have seen, in her womb."

My wife said nobody had ever touched her, and nobody had ever inserted anything into her. But this artifact, sir, which is clearly marked in the x-ray, and is clearly indicated with an arrow, is first seen in one x-ray plate, disappears for the next 2 plates, and is seen on the 4th plate again. I've been wondering very, very much about this.

No matter what we may think, sir, there are strange things going on in this world and they require an agent, investigation, and explanation. What is this strange device, which the doctors cannot identify, doing inside the uterus of a 65-year-old woman? My wife is suffering, and I can lose her at any time now, because I can't even get her out of hospital. Who put this device in her uterus, and why? I will never know the answer, not in this world.

Martin: I'm very sorry to hear about your wife having cancer. I just lost my mother last year to cancer and I know that is a very painful struggle.

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir, it is.

Martin: So, I am very sorry that you are going through that.

Credo Mutwa: Through the training as a Zulu step-son warrior, we have got something like the Japanese Samuri which we call the Kaway, which is a Sun warrior. When a Sun warrior, who is trained like I am, undergoes a terrible experience, he must channel the pain caused by that experience into cold, battle anger, in order to overcome the grief he feels.

And, at this moment, sir, I am aggrieved about what is happening in my country; about what's happening to my people; about what's happening to my wife, who is also my half-sister. You see, ours is what was called a sacred marriage between a man, a sanusi, a shaman, and his half-sister.

And, the wife I'm about to lose is my half-sister. Our father is one man, although our mothers were different.

You know, sir, I feel a cold rage that Africa is being destroyed. I feel, sir, a cold rage that my people are being destroyed by forces which, when you study them, you find are totally alien. And, here, let me share with you, sir, one last thing, please, which will make your readers understand why I am feeling what I am feeling now.

As you know, sir, there is AIDS going like a silent fire through South Africa. And, last year, I found, to my horror, that one of my six children, my 21-year-old daughter, is HIV positive. Sir, I feel a cold rage in my heart that we are allowing an alien disease that came from we know not where, a disease which anyone, with any thought, realizes was manufactured somewhere in order to destroy large swaths of humankind. When I look into my daughter's eyes, sir, I feel a chill. I've got two daughters, grown-up, young women, and she is the last. The other one is short and dumpy, and a loving-a lovely African girl with a big backside and big breasts. But this girl, who is dying of this disease, is slender, dark-skinned like my mother, and she is very beautiful, even by European standards - and I cannot look into my child's eyes and see what I read there: a resignation, a why? Why?

If AIDS was a natural disease, sir, I would accept it, because man must live side-by-side with illness in this world. But a child, you spend years educating and bringing-up, suddenly being snuffed-out before your eyes, by a disease made by evil people, I want to tear somebody's eyes out for what I've seen happening. I'm sorry, sir.

Martin: I understand.

Credo Mutwa: We must look into this thing. Is there one last question you would like to ask?

Martin: Yes. I would like to go back to the copper city for a moment. It would seem that this Jabulon would be the equivalent of what, in the West, we call Satan. Would you say that?

Credo Mutwa: I think so, yes, sir. He is the chief of the Chitauli. And, like Satan, he lives in a house underground where great fires are always lighted, to keep him warm. Because, we are told, that after the great war they fought with God, they became cold in their blood and they cannot stand freezing weather, which is why they require human blood, and also they require fire always to be kept working where they are.

Martin: Well it's been said, in the recent video tape that David Icke has put out, that the shape-shifting reptilians, in order to maintain their façade, their cover, their human-like appearance, they must drink human blood. And there is something about the blond gene, apparently. Now, I don't know what...

Credo Mutwa: Yes. Mr. David Icke shared that a little with me, sir. He told me that, repeatedly, golden-haired people get sacrificed by the Chitauli, and then I told him, in my turn, what I know from Africa.

You see, sir, not all Africans have got black hair. There are Africans who are regarded as very holy, as very sacred. These are Africans who are born with natural red hair. These Africans are believed to be very spiritually powerful. Now, in Africa, such people, albeamers or red-headed Africans, were the most victims of sacrifice, especially when they were just entering maturity - whether they were males or females.

Martin: Now, when you were able to see the eyes beneath the Grey alien's exterior, would you say that those were reptilian beings underneath that cover?

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir, exactly. I will tell you why. There is a snake here in South Africa which is called a Mamba.

Martin: Yes, very deadly.

Credo Mutwa: It is one of the most poisonous snakes that you can find. It has got eyes EXACTLY like those of a Chitauli and of a Mantindane. And so has a Python, sir. A crocodile's eyes are very ET-looking, and they don't look as hypnotic and as piercing as those of a Mamba or a Python. If you can image, sir, the eye of a Python, magnified about 10 times, then you have got exactly what a Chitauli's eyes look like.

Martin: Well, it is said, and I believe this to be true, that there is a - for lack of a better way of putting it - there is a war between Light and Dark, Good and Evil, on this planet.

Credo Mutwa: Yes. Yes, sir. Yes, sir. Yes.

Martin: And there certainly is a God in His Universe, a God of Light and Justness.

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir.

Martin: How does your culture, how do you view the intervention of God through His Hosts, through His Representatives? In all things there must be a balance, and that includes on planet Earth - as above, so below. How do you see - for many readers, they can read about this all, and it sounds very frightening and very, almost, hopeless - and yet, there certainly is hope. So, I would like to end this interview on a message of hope.

Credo Mutwa: Yes. Please, sir, there IS hope! Look, first of all, there IS a God above us. And this God is more real than most of us believe. God is not a figment of someone's imagination. God is not something dreamt-up by old men and old women in prehistoric times. God exists, sir. But standing between us and God are creatures who claim to be gods. And these creatures we must get rid of in order to get closer to God.

Sir, I have lived a long and very strange life, and I can tell you that there is a God, and He is intervening. However, we see God's intervening as slow, but wait: Who would have thought that less than 30 years ago, not one person cared about the environment. Who put this sudden Godliness within all of us?

Today, sir, people everywhere in the world are standing up and fighting for the rights of women and for the rights of children. Who has put these ideas into our minds? Not the Chitauli, not any demonic entity, it is God acting in the shadow and making us strong and able to resist these ugly creatures.

You see, sir, God seems to work slowly in our eyes, because God lives in a time-sphere totally different from our own. God is there. God is working. And it is God, sir, who, for the first time in our existence, is making us aware of these things, making us aware that on this world we are not alone, and that we must be soul-ly and solely responsible for our actions, and we must neutralize these alien beings who for years have led us around in circles.

Human beings have never known any real progress, sir, because there have been forces that have been stopping us from reaching our rightful position in the universe, and I mean the Chitauli, I mean the Mantindane, I mean the Midzimu. We must stop regarding these creatures as super-human creatures. They are just parasites who need us more than we need them. And only a fool will ever deny the fact that we are not the only intelligent species of being that this planet has produced.

All over Africa there is overwhelming evidence that once there were gigantic human beings who walked this planet, in the days of the dinosaur. There are footprints in granite, each one 6 foot long by 3 ½ wide, footprints of mature human beings, sir, which date back thousands of years, millions of years. Where did these giants go to? Who knows; the dinosaurs may have produced an intelligent race, a race which deceives us into thinking that it comes from the stars, when in fact it is part of this planet on which we live.

There is hope, and the hope is very bright. A Christ-child is being born in all of us, but like all deaths, the death of the Light-child (the death of the old-self prior to transformation into "Christness") is going to be attended by great danger, as the enemy is going to be driven into desperation. The enemy will make mistakes and we will conquer him in God's sacred name. That is what I believe, sir, and that is what I'm going to hold-on believing until my last breath.

Martin: And that is a perfect place to end this - on that thought, on that note. Now, let me just say, just for you, since 1974, I have seen many, many spaceships, close-up (though not inside nor by abduction). I have experienced-in the mountains of southern Oregon-I have come across Bigfoot footprints...

Credo Mutwa: Ah-hah!

Martin: ...by a river where I was camping. I have heard the Bigfoot in the mountains at night. I have heard their cries...

Credo Mutwa: Ya-ya! You see?

Martin: ...from one mountain to another. These are things I have experienced. I KNOW these things are real!

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir. Then, I speak to a fellow warrior, and I say, "We shall overcome", as the American Marines used to sing during the Second World War.

Martin: Yes, and during the Vietnam War.

Credo Mutwa: We will overcome, we will overcome, but skeptics must stop laughing, and fools must stop calling these aliens, god. There is only ONE God, and He or She or It is the One who created us, and not some impostor who came from somewhere else to hide behind us and to drink our children's blood. Amen, sir.

Martin: Yes, absolutely right. Credo, please know that I deeply appreciate what you have done and the courage of just speaking frankly. It's past time to hold onto these things, and it's time to just speak The Truth. And for those who don't believe or even consider possibilities, well, it's just too bad.

Credo Mutwa: Exactly, and also to confront people with the fact that there is no reason to fear anything. If we go from a perspective of making information available that should be available to every single person on this blooming planet, why the hell are they trying to threaten you to keep quiet? If it's so ridiculous, let it be. Stop assassinating and ridiculing and destroying people by churning-up fear. This is the perspective I come from, and I'm sure David, as well, and obviously you, as well, do too. I don't have fear anymore.

It's time that we speak out and that we acquire a consciousness - a global, common consciousness - and get this thing to the front. Thank you, so much, I really appreciate it.

Martin: Absolutely right. Thank you.

[Rick Martin, May 2001, THE SPECTRUM]

RICK MARTIN: The weekend of April 28 you may have noticed that all the major prostituted print and broadcast media outlets announced yet another AIDS conference of "goodwill" had just ended in Africa. This latest public relations pageant (or pressure-relief valve) was orchestrated in Nigeria, a location of deep and protracted turmoil. All the usual array of participants (from politicians to pharmaceutical companies to medical "experts") promised, with special practiced earnestness for the cameras, to work hard to combat this illness. Meanwhile, The Truth of the matter is far different from the likes of this major propaganda event, broadcast far and wide "coincidentally" with our receiving and sharing of the following heart-wrenching communication. The deep pain and chronic suffering that is a daily experience for many South Africans has never been more vividly described than in my recent phone conversation with Credo Mutwa. Some of you will recall that we presented a remarkable front-page feature interview with Credo Mutwa back in our October 1999 edition of The SPECTRUM. Things have gotten quite a bit worse in South Africa since we last spoke, particularly as it relates to those infected with and dying from AIDS.

On the morning of April 23, I received a telephone call from David Icke's publicist for the United States, Royal Adams, relaying a request from Credo Mutwa to speak with me. I am grateful to both Royal Adams and David Icke for considering The SPECTRUM to be the appropriate conduit through which to share this great Zulu shaman's most impassioned message. I called Credo Mutwa that same morning, and he was as genuine and cordial as I remembered him to be-but with a very serious edge of urgency in his voice. Actually, words fall terribly short at times like these for their inability to convey the kind of intense emotional impact his voice so tangibly carried. It was as though Credo was speaking before the full assembly at the United Nations, delivering, in very measured wording, the most serious and important appeal imaginable. His plea is on behalf of humanity that the genocide (initiated covertly some years ago as part of the depopulation agenda of the dark, so-called "elite" global controllers) MUST CEASE in the land of Africa - which is rapidly becoming a graveyard populated by the walking dead. With that brief introduction to a subject of tremendous moral consequence, let me just move directly into the message Credo Mutwa wishes to be shared. Keep those Kleenex handy.

Credo Mutwa: My call, sir, has to do with the terrible disease which is killing my people, the disease which is called AIDS. My appeal is this, sir: I don't know who the people are who created this disease. But in the last 2 years or so, I have handled many cases. I have handled friends of mine who are dying of this disease. And I know now that this disease, sir, is a man-made one. I wish to appeal to those human beings who created this disease: PLEASE STOP NOW! You have done enough. You have killed enough of the children of Africa. Stop now! Stop! The death of Africa will be the death of the whole world. If it is correct for Dr. Simon Wiesenthal to pursue Nazi war criminals many years after the end of the Second World War, will it also not be just and correct for future Africans to pursue these men and these women who have murdered Africa in this terrible way?

There are questions about AIDS which I want to be answered. AIDS is not just a disease. It is a spiritual disaster to our people. It destroys families, sir. It turns children against parents. It turns lovers against each other. It has turned our society upside-down.

But what chills my blood is the paralyzing that I see amongst our leaders. Men and women who suffered and died for the liberation of South Africa are paralyzed like little rabbits in front of a vicious fox when they have to turn around and face AIDS. I do not know what our leaders are afraid of, who they are afraid of. Are there, after all is said and done, humanoid shadows out there who scare our leaders witless?

And I say, sir, to the pharmaceutical organizations in South Africa: you have done enough! Your sham of a court case has been rebuked for what it is—an act of cheap advertisement for drugs which have been rejected in Europe, in America, and elsewhere.

On top of death, you are dumping more death on Africa. Why? I say, to every human being on this planet, AIDS is not a God-made disease! If it was, I would not be trying to fight it—half-educated, semi-literate, and stupid as I am. I say this disease was made BY people, and I am appealing to those people to stop, now! There are names which are being bandied about by frightened people in South Africa, people who talk in whispers. One of the names that is mentioned is the name of the man called [Dr. Robert] Gallo. I say to Mr. Gallo: Remember your common humanity. You have done enough. Stop now!

[Editor's note: See Dr. Len Horowitz's monumental book Emerging Viruses: AIDS & Ebola: Nature, Accident Or Intentional? for a wealth of documentation placing Dr. Gallo, longtime head of the National Institute of Health (NIH) and National Cancer Institute's (NCI) Section on Cellular Control Mechanisms, at center stage in the AIDS arena. Evidence suggests he created the AIDS virus about a decade before he received a lot of political accolades for having "discovered" it.]

I say to the pharmaceutical organizations: Sir, you are like octopuses. You have got tentacles sprawling all over the world. You play Jehovah [God] with the lives of our people.

But your tentacles can be lopped-off! You are driving African people into a situation where they will have to turn around and attack you with weapons. And if that happens, you will have only yourselves to blame. I am not threatening anyone. I am only articulating the anger that our people convey to me - as they lay dying, in empty shacks, skeletons wasted to nothing, with skins like brown wet paper.

I say: stop now, my brothers, in the name of our humanity! If your aim is to destroy Africa, say so. Let us fight, and at least die with honor. I say: four of my children are gripped by this terrible scourge. I cannot bear the prospect that I will have to bury my offspring before I die. It is unnatural and obscene. I say, again, to those shadowy organizations in America, and in England, and Canada, and elsewhere: STOP!

You have done enough. Turn off the tap of murder. You have killed enough. STOP!

Or allow us the right of all threatened animals to retaliate, with weapons, for what is being done to us. If there are, out there, the children of the serpent, the Chitauri, the walkers in darkness, let them know this: that I, Credo Mutwa, am not a brave man. But when I see my children ravaged by AIDS, when I see my children turning their eyes, turning away from me, I feel the courage of any beast that watches its offspring being slaughtered by a predator. You have done enough. Conspirators, you have done enough! Do you know, sir, let me tell you one last thing before I stop. I, and a White doctor, are saving many of our people-not curing them, because we are not allowed to claim that we have a cure for this disease-but the herbal medicine that we use is making people, who have been condemned to go home and die, come back to life. And I am asking that the South African government and the United Nations, if they are not servants to Dark Forces, they must release this medicine and allow us to combat this scourge, until such a time as scientists can come up with a stronger medicine against AIDS.

I will not allow Africa to die! I am sorry, but I will not allow my people to perish! I am only doing my duty as a father and as a Black man, and as a human being, in a country which is being deliberately murdered. I cannot accept, and will not accept, the fact that in the United States, the magazine called TIME, states that there are only 920,000 people with AIDS in the United States. And yet, in sub-Saharan Africa, there are close to 44 million. This is illogical! And I want to know the reason behind it. I'm sorry, sir, but this is how I feel!

Martin: Please don't apologize.

Credo Mutwa: These conspirators, sir, these ugly entities have shown a dangerous over-confidence, and it is high time we confronted them. I cannot - you know, sir, what happens in South Africa is that a child who has got AIDS runs away from his family and hides himself. And if you, the desperate parent, try to go looking for your child, your child fights you and can hit you with stones and drive you away.

It happened to me, sir.

There are stories which newspapers never dare to print, which are happening in South Africa, centering around AIDS. And the newspapers in South Africa, which are directed by conspirators and liars, do not even try to stop the stigma, which they built-up, against AIDS and its victims. In fact, sir, they are making it worse, with the resolve that people who are suffering from this disease find that they are being rejected by their families. Men die alone, in shacks behind their homes. Women chase their husbands out of their homes. Men murder their wives, sir, because of the spread of AIDS.

I appeal to you, and the editor of The SPECTRUM - please, please, tell the world the hell in which we are living. Please! Like now, I am trying desperately to build clinics in South Africa, with the help of my initiate, Virginia Rathele, and others. But we are being blocked and frustrated at every turn. We are threatened.

My house has been broken into 3 times, and the seeds of the precious and endangered plant, which we use in helping our people, were stolen. But I was able to find more, and I intend to find a piece of land - God knows where and how - to plant them, so that this plant, which is on the brink of extinction, should come back and save our people, which it is doing. I appeal to the world, sir, and to all decent human beings, that the stranglehold that the Chitauri, the Reptile People, have over humanity, should be broken once and for all. The death of Africa will lead to the death of the entire human race.

People must be aware of that, please. Thank you, sir. But, please, can you please tell me, sir: What should a half-educated man like me do? You know, sir, I expected my kids to bury me when I die. But now it seems it is going to be the other way around. What father can see his children being slaughtered in this way? What parent can allow such an ugly thing? What should a parent legally do against these monsters who have unleashed AIDS?

Everything points to the fact, sir, that AIDS is a man-created disease. In fact, I was telling Mr. David Icke, only a few moments ago, that I have traveled widely through Africa, as you know, and I can tell you one thing that scientists who study AIDS cannot tell you: That people who die of AIDS, sir, immediately after death, show signs of people who have died of arrow poison-you know, as if they'd been shot with a poisoned arrow. They don't die, merely, of a disease, as would happen in the case of tuberculosis or cancer. Their lips are discolored in a way that I have seen happening with people who had been hit by poisoned arrows. What is it in AIDS that behaves like an arrow poison?

And, another thing, sir: It is said that AIDS began as a disease of homosexuals. But wait. In Africa, most homosexuals do not penetrate each other, sir, as they do in Europe. African homosexuals do the sex act between each other's thighs, not in each other's, you now, back passage. So, how does it come that these people get AIDS, when there is no physical contact with the body fluids between them?

Another thing: How does it happen, as I have seen now many times, that you find a family of four - a mother, a father, and two children. You find, sir, that the parents are healthy, but the little kids have got full-blown AIDS. Can someone, kindly, explain this to me, this phenomenon which I have seen in many parts of southern Africa?

Another thing: You find a man who has got full-blown AIDS, and a wife who is free from AIDS, and these people have got a child who is totally free from AIDS. How can one - can anyone on the Earth who reads your paper, sir, kindly explain this amazing phenomenon to me?

What, other than sexual intercourse, what is another thing that is spreading AIDS? I suspect there is something else, but the doctors disagree with me when we talk at conferences. I suspect there is another way by which AIDS spreads through people. Is it an insect, as I suspect, or is it a what?

I don't know. Please, let wise people out there help me, because these conspirators and their running dogs, these people who work in shadows, are, literally, destroying Africa. And if Africa is destroyed, other races of humankind will follow - one of them being the Black Americans in America. They won't survive the destruction of Africa.

What is the idea behind Africa's depopulation? I read a chilling book not so long ago, a book written about the "great" [The word should definitely be contained within quote marks, to depict the actual, opposite meaning of "respect" for this very prolific, now deceased member of a very major family among the so-called "elite" controllers. Credo knows very well that about which he speaks so humbly!] White man, Bertrand Russell. Russell stated that, one day, the Western nations would have to decimate Black people, using war, famine, and disease. And this has happened.

I say, please, you Russell followers, please, you racists and Malthusians, you have done enough harm! Stop now! Stop! In the name of our common humanity, and in the name of the Intelligence that obviously exists behind the Cosmos, the Intelligence which human beings call by the cheap name, God, please stop now!

Stop, please! Stop!
Thank you very much, sir.

AIDS in South Africa

There was someone whose name, if I remember correctly, was Santana or Santanaya (George Santayana) - a person of great wisdom indeed. This Santana or Santanaya spoke the following words: "If people fail to learn from history they will always repeat history's mistakes."

Upon this planet all living entities - be they birds or animals or even human beings - are given an important ability by the Creator, which is to learn from experience and on learning, to survive the angry night and the roaring storms of existence upon this world. But many of us, supposedly civilized human beings, appear to be losing this very important God-given talent. We no longer appear to have the capacity to learn. We take it for granted that we are intelligent beings. We take it for granted that we know many things - but the fact is that we know nothing or next to nothing and that we seldom learn, we human beings, from experience.

When things happen we tend to forget them and because of our having forgotten them we tend to make mistakes - mistakes that cost us our lives mistakes that cost us our happiness, mistakes that even threaten the existence of the very earth, which has nurtured and cherished us for so many millions of years.

Today a hideous pandemic known as Aids is sweeping through South Africa today we are told that four million people, our brothers and sisters, our neighbours, our fellow tribesmen and tribeswomen are already contaminated by Aids and are living with it. Hundreds of people have died since Aids appeared in South Africa some 20 or 21 years ago. The bony hand of Aids has snuffed out hundreds of our brightest stars, our young intellectuals, our young leaders, and the number of deaths is increasing fast.

For some reason Aids, which was said to be a slow killer has become even more vicious than before and is killing our people with amazing speed. Today every person who dies of an illness is immediately suspected of having died of an Aids related illness. But that is not all. The name Aids carries with it a stigma a brand of shame so dark and terrible and intense I can only liken it to the kind of stigma that societies in Africa and in ancient Israel placed upon the shoulders of those unfortunate people that suffered from leprosy.

A lot of empty lip service is being paid in Sa today to the fact that everybody should fight to remove the stigma that is attached to Aids. But actually very little is being done to bring this about and the entities that caused this terrible stigma namely the newspapers and other news media are doing next to nothing to de-stigmatise Aids. They started it all and they should put it right. When Aids first appeared it was said to be a disease of drug-takers and homosexuals. People who are looked down upon by holier-than-thou sections of our society.

Suddenly we were told that Aids was a heterosexual disease, apart from being a homosexual one, and that it attacked even those people who thought that they were leading clean and God-fearing lives. It is the news media that should correct this dreadful mistake for they were the instruments of it spreading when this disease first came to existence. It is spoken by our people in this proverb that he who has farted inside the chieftain's great house should find perfumed herbs to burn in the fireplace and take away the smell - and this proverb I throw at the feet of newspapers, not only in this South Africa, but in other parts of the world as well.

You started this rot, you farted in the chief's house - now please find perfumed herbs and burn them to take away your stench. I am an old man, closely approaching my eightieth year and over my head the angry years have passed like water over the wall of a dam. I have seen many things and I can tell you from my experience as well. You started this rot, you farted in the chief's house - now please find perfumed herbs and burn them to take away your stench. I am an old man, closely approaching my eightieth year and over my head the angry years have passed like water over the wall of a dam. I have seen many things and I can tell you from my experience that what we are seeing in South Africa is really something new but rather a repetition of history brought about by people who have failed to learn history's lessons.

Today in South Africa we talk about the disease called Aids, which we are told there, is no cure for. We are further told about how expensive are the medicines for combating Aids are and lastly, we are told about Aids orphans - Oh, I have seen them - the pathetic little waifs, the scatterlings left upon the cruel road of history by a disease that knows no pity. I have seen children already marked by the claws of Aids -children who will not see their fifty years of life.

Children who will be torn away from the arms of our motherland by Aids and hurled into the dark night of death without every having known what life really is and what life is about. I have seen wasted little children, many of them hardly more than skeletons - children whose mothers and fathers have already died of Aids. I have seen this and much more. I have seen the horrible impact that Aids is having on our people's family life. I have seen how Aids is separating men from wives, child from parent. I have seen that and much, much more, but within my swollen heart bloated with old age a voice, a grave voice from yesterday keeps on saying to me. "Mutwa, you have seen all this before.

Your country and your people have gone through much of this before. Much of what we see happening in South Africa today is not new but has happened before and the people of our country failed miserably to learn from that."

What am I talking about? There was once a time in the 1920's, 1930's and 1940's when Tuberculosis was just as deadly a killer of our people as Aids is today - in those days Tuberculosis was known as Consumption and any black person who was told by doctors that he or she had Consumption reacted exactly as black people who are told that they have got Aids do today. The person knew in those days before streptomycin and other magic anti-Tuberculosis drugs that a sentence of death had been passed by some angry god over him or her and that he or she must silently and with as much courage as possible await the dark Angel of Death's coming.

There was once a time in my country's history when diseases such as Gonorrhoea, Syphilis and other sexually transmitted diseases, which had been brought into Africa by people from Europe, were as deadly and incurable as Aids is today. If Aids today has created thousands of Aids orphans then, my friends, so did Gonorrhoea, Syphilis and Tuberculosis. Those people who are complaining about how expensive anti-Aids drugs are should listen to what I have to tell them now. In olden days there were crude medicines, which were used against Syphilis, Gonorrhoea and such like diseases. Most of these medicines were in the form of pills - ugly, round black coloured things, which were made of mercury. I remember them well.

These pills were priced right out of the lives of grass-route level Africans. I remember that some unscrupulous white doctors of those times used to demand two cows for a tinful of these mercury pills. Pills, which eventually drove the user mad - pills which tanned the teeth of those who used them over a time as black as those of goats. Very few of our people could afford these mercury tablets.

Even more expensive, were much later preparations created for the combating of venereal disease. I remember one such preparation known as 606 or Salvasan. These tablets were out of reach of our people and many, many people died horrible deaths, hideously disfigured by Syphilis, hideously mutilated by Gonorrhoea because they could not afford those silver bullets of those times. In those days, as is the case today, people were filled with a massive hysteria regarding diseases such as Tuberculosis and sexually transmitted diseases.

It is one of the most brutal facts of our country's history that in those days, if a farmer learned that one of his black labourers had contracted either Gonorrhoea, Syphilis or even Tuberculosis that while farmer became frightened that these diseases would, somehow be transmitted to members of his own family and he used to take the black man or woman away from his farm on the pretext of taking him or her to "a good doctor" in a nearby town and when the farmer and his worker reached an isolated spot the farmer used to order the worker to get off the wagon and to walk the rest of the distance - giving him a meaningless letter supposedly to be taken to the great doctor in the town and the farmer would stop his wagon and let the black person climb off and then he would wait for him or her to walk some distance away towards the imaginary source of help and when the person was still within rifle range the farmer used to draw his gun and shoot the worker dead, drag him or her into a clump of bushes and return home.

On so many occasions was this thing done almost all over South Africa, especially in Natal and in the Eastern Cape and the Northern Transvaal that our people began to develop a cold distrust of going to seek the help of doctors when they found themselves the victim of either Tuberculosis or venereal disease. It became a tradition for our people to believe and, rightly so, that if he or she sought the help of a doctor, he or she would not return alive but would be finished off somewhere along the road.

Today, there are still thousands of Zulu people, Xhosa people and people of other tribes who firmly believe that if they go to a clinic or seek the help of a doctor when they have got either Tuberculosis or venereal disease that they will be finished off. I have met hundred of such people and this belief which is still as strong now as it was over sixty years ago or more is one of the things that are making our battle against Aids a hundred times more difficult than it otherwise would have been. In the olden days, there was something, which our people used to call ingane kaNodndwa, which means the child of a prostitute. This child of a prostitute was often the offspring of a woman who had suffered for years from Gonorrhoea and who then died after giving birth to this child. Usually such children were born blind, which was a strange characteristic I observed of children whose mothers suffered from this scourge.

The child was born weak in body and in mind and was sometimes covered with sores and when having reached the age of walking, unable to walk properly. In those days it was quite common for a woman, while walking along the street to be approached by a strange woman, a prostitute, and given a child wrapped in blankets, "here" would say the prostitute, "I give you this child, please bring it up in memory of me". In those days our people still believed very firmly in their sacred traditions and their belief in the traditional black religion had not yet been destroyed by the foreign creed known as Christianity. In those days our people regarded children as very sacred beings indeed - so much so that in no African tribe or community did you find an orphan.

All orphaned children were immediately adopted, handed over to relatives and brought up with dignity and love by people who still believed that the greatest duty of all human beings was to cherish, protect and nurture children. In those days things such as sexual abuse of children were totally unknown. In those days were believed that there was no greater luck that could befall a person but for that person to be given a living breathing child by a total stranger. I know many sangomas who, in their younger days, had been given children by prostitutes in Johannesburg and who brought up these children as their very own. One of the greatest sangomas, who once lived in Johannesburg, was a Sangoma known as Dorcas Danisa.

Dorcas Danisa was a true psychic like Mr. Uri Geller she could bend spoons and other metal objects and one day when she was still a young woman way back in the 1940's Dorcas had been approached by a destitute woman who had made a living out of selling her body and who was now riddled with syphilis and no longer able to earn a living. This woman approached Dorcas Danisa which a boy child who was deformed.

The boy was crippled, paralyzed from the waist down and Dorcas brought up this boy as her own child - saw to it that he had proper schooling and when

Dorcas died, this boy now grown into full manhood inherited Dorcas's estate. Very, very few people knew that he was not her natural son, but a son by adoption - given to Dorcas by a strange woman well over thirty years before. When a child was born deformed, when a child was born blind, the offspring of a prostitute our people used to cherish that child, bring it up as their own, and see to it that it grew into a mature, happy and respected human being.

But today, with our traditions destroyed and our religion shattered, black people have become utterly cruel and selfish and vicious towards those they should be assisting. Today our people run away from those of their countrymen and women who have been traumatized by Aids and Tuberculosis.

Children orphaned by Aids are treated worse than beasts. In Westernized and Christianized communities of today children suffering from Aids, weakened by HIV are beaten, ostracized, ill treated and forced to scavenge for scraps of food in dirty dustbins. I have seen it many times and I have wondered why our people have changed so much within one man's lifetime. We have become a nation of extremely cruel people towards our own kith and kin and the reason for this is that we have thrown away our culture and our religion like so much rubbish and accepted falsehoods shouted at us from the pulpits of deceivers and the altars of liars.

Today, if you want to adopt a suffering child, you have got to go through a whole hell of bureaucracy - you got to answer a thousand questions - you have got to travel many miles from this office to than one. Things are not being made at all easy for us African people to do what we feel is our godly duty towards those of us who are suffering. Sometimes in the darkness of the night when I lie unsleeping, lost in thought, I despair for the future of the black people. I despair for the future of my country. But at the same time, man is a winged creature, a creature given spiritual wings by the gods and these wings have one name and that name is Hope.

No matter how dark the night or how angry the storm a human being must keep his wings of Hope unfurled and strong otherwise he shall fall out of the skies as id Icarus and perish upon the rocks far below. It is true that there is darkness over South Africa, it is true that there is despair in the land at this moment but what we are facing is a disease like any other - a disease made worse by the high rate of unemployment in our country. A disease made worse by the fact that our people are starving. You can never fight a deadly disease like Aids if you are torn apart by hunger - if you are torn apart by unemployment, but there is hope, a very faint hope for the people of South Africa.

We must believe in that Hope otherwise we are a nation of dead things. There is a Hope that Aids can be defeated - there is a hope that the economic situation of our country can get better. One of the most amazing things that I have found in my long and bitter life is this - that it appears as if God prepared this world for the coming of animals and human beings and for the meeting of any emergency that may arise - that there isn't a disease on this planet that has a cure and man has but to look around carefully and find it. There is a plant growing in the veld in South Africa, especially in the Cape.

This is a plant with rather a strong smell - a beautiful plant that looks like a delicate fern - a plant with bright red, strange looking flowers, flowers that taste almost like honey when you eat them. This plant's name is Sutherlandia Frutescens - a plant that was known for thousands of years for its healing powers by Bushmen, Koi San and Koi Koi, Hottentots as well as Bantu people. This medicine was one of seven medicines that our traditional healers called xxxxxxxx, the final medicines, medicines which must only be used when the entire nation is in danger as it is now. This medicine, Sutherlandia, is safe to take and has been used by our people for thousands of years.

Hope for South Africa. - No matter how dark the night may seem to be, No matter how angry the thunder storm, there is always a ray of light that can pierce those thunder clouds and that can make the night turn into day. No one can deny there is AIDS devouring our people like a dragon in this land. There are the people who say that AIDS does not exist and that it is not the fearful thing that we take it to be. I would like to ask these people most respectfully: what is that, what is killing our people out there in the countryside? I have held many AIDS victims in my arms some of them have died in my hands. I know that there is something out there killing our people. I know that this thing is as real as you and I. There is an African saying that says: the poor woman who refuses to see the rapist and who shut her eyes to his ugly presence will not however escape his presence - and we can not fight AIDS by saying it is not there. It is there. We cannot, we dare not, the reality of this disease, which has such a serious impact on our society, which has a disastrous impact on our families. Although this disease is so evil it can be defeated. Just as other diseases in the past were eventually defeated.

People should realize that what we are seeing is actually a repercussion of history. In my younger days diseases such as gonorrhea/syphilis and TB were as terrible and incurable as AIDS is today and they were eventually defeated. People today complain about anti-aids drugs and in the past I heard people complaining about anti-venereal diseases medicines in the 1930s.

There was a time when an African with TB all had left to do, was to go home and die exactly as the case with AIDS today. But people must never forget that the greatest disease people have is their minds and that if we put our minds together we can defeat this ailment. In the darkness today that is South Africa, in the darkness, as death and misery there is however a faint green ray of Hope in a plant called Sutherlandia Frutescens. This plant was known for hundreds of years by the Khoi-Khoi and Khoi Sun as well as African people. It was the plant in older days was the weapon against diseases such as cancer to TB and other diseases. It was also a sedative and a tonic amongst the untold story of Africa.

Credo: "I wish to appeal to the world. First, I am not a quack or a charlatan or a sensationalist. I am an old man who has seen much. I wish the world to know that there is a faint ray of hope that emanates from South Africa.

It is a plant which is almost on the point of extinction, a plant called 'Suderlandia Fructosate'. This plant works miracles on people who have the terrible disease called Aids. And it is so miraculous that the miracles are seen within a week or a fortnight. A person, who was lying down on the point of death, when given this plant, rises and has much energy and is free of depression and has a good appetite. And I feel that as a nation as a matter of world emergency because the big scientists have not produced a viable safe treatment for aids. I say that this plant should be planted by all caring governments, by all caring organizations and that it should be given to human beings free of charge."

Steve: "Absolutely. You know what I think is important though Credo, that people understand what to do with the plant."

Credo: "They don't do nothing sir, you are going to laugh about this. You plant the plant okay, but then you take the little leaves from it and you put them in a tea cup and you pour much boiling water on it. And then you let the cup stand there, like tea you know, and you just drink, the patient just drinks."

Steve: "The leaves and the red flower?"

Credo: "Yah."

Steve: "Mix them together? Do you need to dry them first?"

Credo: "No you can take them straight from the garden, because if you dry them too much they somehow lose some of their good spirit. Now this is all you do. Now, there are good doctors I'm working with who are making pills out of this medicine. But you know sir, I feel we are faced with a national emergency, a world emergency.

You know sir, what I say is this. I can't cure the people of Africa without curing the people of the Caribbean, because Aids is running around the world. If I cure the people here and they get better, more Aids will come in and eat the same people whom I tried to cure. So the whole world must be cured. Look, can we say this? Nobody will arrest us or anything?"

Steve: "Well yes, I mean it's not against the law to say this, it's in our rights to speak."

Credo: Thank you sir. I will tell you why. Originally the plant of 'Suderlandia' was all over South Africa. And I will tell you what used to happen. There was a funny little grayish brown bird, which used to feed on 'Suderlandia's and this bird was very edible. And starving people used to hit it with katties (slingshots) and kill it. Now the bird is gone almost. And now... so the land here is difficult to cultivate.

Steve: The seeds are not being spread.

Credo: "Yah, yah. What is happening is you need to take a fine sandpaper and sandpaper each little seed. The seeds are very tiny, tinier than grape seeds. And you sandpaper each seed and you plant it in a small blompot (flower pot). And you allow it to grow until it is about maybe four inches, three inches high. Then you take it and you plant it in the big veld (grassland). You can make a big garden, maybe twenty acres or so and you plant there. They just grow. There are farmers who have already planted them but they are too few. This is a world emergency and we must not be selfish. In the last few years or so there has been many claims made by people about plants and herbs, which they say are beneficial in the fight against aids. Some of these claims have proven to be false and at best have proven to be exaggerations. But in South Africa there is plan, which is on the brink of extinction. This plant is called by white people in English 'Suderlandia Fructosate'. This plant is also called by the Afrikaans people 'kankerbos', which means cancer bush or 'kalkoenbos', which means turkey bush. Now this plant was known in South Africa and other parts of Sub-Saharan Africa for thousands of years. It was an anti-depressant, it was appetite booster, it was also and still is a dramatic booster of the human immune system. For many years African people and Xhoi-xhoi people and Xhoi-san people as well as Bantu people used this plant in the fight against cancer, and it was very effective there, and it still is. And they used it also in the fight against diseases like tuberculosis before there was streptomycin and other drugs to fight tuberculosis. In the old days when ordinary venereal disease like gonorrhea, syphilis and others were as incurable as AIDS is today, our people used this plant to fight those diseases. If they had not had this plant, the black people of Southern Africa would have been destroyed just as the Australian Aborigines were destroyed, and other races of aboriginal people in other parts of the world were brought to extinction by diseases brought in from Europe. Now, we have found... me and a group of doctors, doctors like Dr Nigel Gerica , Dr Ben van Wyk, Dr Albrecht, Dr Mayeng. We looked at this plant and we found that it was having dramatic impact in creating a better quality of life. People with full-blown aids, people who had been sent home to die. Not only did we, the five of us, use the plant to help many people to a better quality of life within the space of a month or a fortnight. There is a lady in a hospital in Zululand, a white lady who has saved many, many people who have been condemned to die of Aids in this hospital. Then I also have my student, Virginia Ratele, who has saved many people who were condemned to die of aids. She has done this in her tribal village near the town of Kuruman. There is something very strange that is happening now. I and Virginia, who live amongst the mountains of the Magaliesberg, are being terrorized and threatened by white men who are very professional in the way they do this. They are able to neutralize the security lights and the alarms with which the house in which we live are fitted. They are able to break in through the doors even though we put devices in the keyholes to stop people from doing so. These are not your run of the mill thieves; they are professional men who know exactly what they are doing. I feel that all of human kind is facing an emergency, and that all greed and selfishness should be swept away, and this plant should be made available to nations in the world. The way the plant grows, I know it can grow in Nazareth, in the United States, India and in China and in other places where Aids is rampant. I do not claim that this plant, dramatic as the results are is the cure for Aids. I say it is a stopgap, which must be used by all human kind in order to halt the disease of Aids. Until such a time as the pharmaceutical scientists can come up with a real cure, a cure which is not at all toxic. I say that this plant 'Suderlandia' is not at all toxic. It was even used by men such as President Paul Kruger of the South African Republic of 1899 or thereabouts. And Paul Kruger who used this plant lived to be a very old man, and at one time Paul Kruger tried to send a consignment of 'Suderlandia' to save the life of a German Prince who had cancer of the throat. But the ship that sailed from Mozambique was too slow and arrived too late to save the prince. I say this that the United Nations should take over the growing of this plant because we are faced with a world emergency. We are faced with a disease which devastates all of human kind without thinking. And we have got to stop Aids not only in Africa but in other parts of the world too. This disease has got to be stopped; it is not a natural disease. I have dealt with Aids now for the last five years and I now firmly believe, I Credo Mutwa, that Aids is a manmade disease. The way it behaves in the human body is like no God created ailment ever does. The disease shows a Satanic intelligence and I appeal to all people throughout the world, that here in South Africa is a faint ray of hope, which is however to be drowned by greed, by selfishness and cowardly secretiveness. I say that this plant belongs to all humankind. It belongs to the little children dying of Aids; it belongs to the men and women who are ravaged by this ailment. And I believe firmly that scientists will be able to create a cure for Aids out of this plant. And I am making this worldwide appeal because our government appears totally indifferent to this offer, which I am making freely for all humanity. Our government does not seem to be able to take the one step, to have this plant planted throughout South Africa as a matter of national emergency. One 'Suderlandia plant' is capable of treating 10 people, and we need plantations of this plant. And I say that this plant should not be the plaything of greedy businessmen. It should not be the plaything of thieving pharmaceutical organizations that steal Africa's treasures and lock them up in computers and call them their intellectual property. I say this that this plant belongs to all the humankind, and that the greedy organizations leave it alone. We do not need a disease like Aids to reduce the population of the world. I am told that this disease was created specifically to destroy Africa and I now believe this. After more than five years of dealing with this disease. And I say this. I will not allow Africa, a misunderstood and misrepresented nation, a misunderstood and misrepresented continent, to perish, to suit the designs of conspirators. I say that Africa must live, I say that India must live, China must live, and even the United States must live. There is hope, a little ray of hope, a green ray of hope, emanating from South Africa, and I call on all human fellow human beings to make it larger, to spread hope throughout the world. I beg to remind all that there was once a time malaria devastated whole communities throughout the middle east, throughout Africa and elsewhere. And out of South America there appeared a ray of hope, which grew, larger and larger. That ray of hope was called the bark of the Cinchona tree, quinine. And quinine saved thousands of lives, which would have otherwise been swept into oblivion. I say that people should not look upon me as a quack or a crank. I am a researcher, self-taught. I am a writer of books, which have sold worldwide. I am an inventor and a historian and a traditional healer. And I say please, those who don't believe me come to South Africa and look at this plant yourself. I say that no organization has the right to call this plant it's property, none. And I say let hope for humankind be lighted from the southern tip of Africa to overspread the whole planet. If AIDS were created to reduce the human population, then it is a self-defeating thing. The only way to make people breed less is to end war in the world. When there is war shaking continents people breed more. People breed out of fear. People breed out of insecurity. You, the hypocrites of the United Nations, you the liars within the walls of the United Nations, you, I challenge you to create a safer world and not a world rotten with disease.

The Living Lakes Conference

(Living Lakes Conference, October 2, 1999, US Forest Service Mono Lake Visitor's Center, Lee Vining, California, USA. The following text was transcribed from an audio recording. The speech includes Zulu words for people, places, and things that are spelled phonetically in italics.)

As we say in our country Bash-on-e-payg which is a completely asexual way to address those who we respect. I stand before you as a man who is stunned and shaken by what he has seen, what he has heard, and what he has experienced. First of all, did you know, you who live around Lake Mono, that your lake joins together Africa and the Native American people? Did you know that the most amazing word I heard when I arrived here was the word Inyo? Which is said to mean the dwelling place of the creator, or rather, the place of creation. Did you know that that word occurs in Africa as a reference to the sacred organ of a mother? Did you know that the word Mono is a name for something delicious and nutritious that you eat? Perhaps one day if I return this way I shall share more of these things with you.

Shumenitch-y means "the one," and no matter who we are, no matter in which part of the world we dwell, we are one. We are one with each other. We are one with the earth. We are one with the moon, the sun. We are one with the stars. Please, please remember that. It is useless to conserve entities such as water and trees if you have severed yourself away from those entities. You cannot conserve something which you do not feel within you. You cannot conserve something which is not part of you.

When I was initiated for the first time in 1937 into the mysteries and knowledge of Mother Africa I was ordered by my teacher, who was my aunt, to go outside and fill a small clay pot with water. Then she said to me, "Look into the water--what do you see?" I was caught in a trap because an initiate is not supposed to have an ego. An initiate is not supposed to refer to himself. I said, "Aunt, I see a person in this water." She said, "Who is that person?" I did not dare say it was me. I said, "It is the person I know who is the son of my mother, the only son." And she said, "Yes, you are in this water, and the water is in you. Until you know that, that you and the water are one, you must not even drink the water, you must not even think about it, because you have cut yourself off from it."

Respected ones, no matter where you go in Africa you will find African people referring to water by a very interesting name indeed. In the language of the Swahili people in Kenya, water is called ma-gee. In the language of my people the Zulu's, water is called amanze. And in the language of the Besutu people of Esutu in a small kingdom in South Africa, water is called mazte. And all of these words mean one thing no matter where you go: the fluid of creation, the thing that did something, the thing that caused something to be.

In olden days Africans used to risk their lives in protecting water. In olden days our people used to severely punish anyone they caught urinating into a stream or a river. There are some ants which you find in my country, they are called ma-the-bella ants. When you hold one in your hands it looks as fat as myself, and it fights like nobody's business. And if you were caught, wise guy, making water into the water, one of those babies was taken, and made to bite you on your thing, closing the hole for several hours, and it will be the biggest lesson you will ever learn.

Africans used to say that no punishment is too severe for somebody who murders nature. There are trees in South Africa and in other parts of Africa which you are not allowed to cut. And sometimes this thing is carried to such extreme ends even now, that one day, I, Credo Mutwa, was brought before a chief and accused of murder. It was a really serious charge, and after a trial which lasted for three days. I was acquitted because I pleaded that I was guilty but insane. The holy person whom I had murdered had interfered with my dinner, which in the Credo Mutwa book is a mortal crime. Now, who was the holy person? It was a fly, an ordinary housefly. In South Africa, there is a tribe called the Bahune-bamata who even today will charge you with murder if they find you hurting a fly.

Honorable ones, our people believe many strange things regarding water. They believe that water is a living entity. That water has got a mind, that it remembers. The reason why a lake forms where it is, the reason why a river flows through where it flows, is not because it happens to be the right place for water to flow--no! It is because in that place where the river flows, there is an energy, an invisible spirit that moves like a snake, under the ground through the fine sand and which moves in the direction opposite to the one down which the river flows. If this great fire snake, as we call it, this unseen energy, if it dies, then the river dies too. We are told that lakes form where they form because there is an agreement between the water and certain types of rock.

In the language of my people, the Zulus, a lake is called Icibi. Now this word icibi gave birth to the verb icibella which means, "to patch." If there is a hole in a cloth and you put a patch on it, that patch is called icibi, and you, icibella. Now why do we say that a lake is a repairer? We believe that a lake controls the life forces of all living things around it. A lake controls the life forces of every bird, every fish, every tiny creature that you find in water, and it also controls and stimulates the life forces of bigger animals up to and including human beings that they are of the same. And each time there is an illness in the land, our kings used to prevail upon the tribespeople to go closer to lakes, to get into that field. There is an invisible field of power all around a lake. If you take off your clothes and moisten your skin slightly and walk into that field, you will feel a tingling. That is what we call the spirit of the water, the icibi, the repairer of life.

Our people believe that there is a music, a sort of communication that goes on between streams, and rivers, and lakes. If you destroy a lake, say about 20 miles away from another one, this music is cut off and the lake that you have destroyed dies, and so does another lake which has been in communication with it.

Ladies and gentleman, many, many times in Africa, when I started fighting to preserve what I thought was sacred, I was often snarled at, ridiculed, and even beaten up as a superstitious heathen. But I was only preaching what my grandfathers had preached. I was only preaching what our mothers had taught us: that water is sacred. It is the life-blood of the great mother. It should not be dammed or in any way interfered with because if that is done, the water dies.

Our people say that water is the first thing that happens to you. It is also the thing that happens to you throughout your life. And it will be the last thing that will happen to you. When you are born, you are bathed, and thus, you are married to the spirit of water. When you leave, you take-in water and you become one with it. You drink, you wash, and you clean your clothes. You drink in the spirit of water whether you like it or not, or whether you believe in the spirit or not. Our people also believe that when you die, you are bathed with water, not to clean you up, because who needs to clean something that has kicked the bucket in the first place? But you do need to be bathed so you can quickly go into the village of judgment and advance to reincarnation. We say that a dead body which has not been bathed will not be able to reincarnate.

Our people further say that water has got ears. We have a proverb amongst my people that says: he who makes love to another man's wife on the bank of a river must be careful not to utter loud and stupid noises. Because why? Because water. If there is a fierce emotion near a stream, that stream somehow records it. And guess what will happen? What you did near the river will be heard by every person in the surrounding villages one day. And you will wonder how they got to hear about it.

In South Africa there is a range of mountains called the Devaterbergh Mountains. There are many springs and fountains of water, and there were many more in the past. And when you come to the water mountains and you sit alone in total solitude, you are going to hear clearly the sounds of ancient battles which were fought in that area. You will hear horses screaming, sabers clashing, and you will hear warriors shouting and people dying in pain. You will hear that because water has got ears.

Ladies and Gentlemen, there is much I could share with you. But our people say that he who talks too much makes people tired. I am not here to make you tired. I am here to tell you this: let us by all means conserve the beautiful song of nature. Let us regard each lake and each river. Not simply as an interesting stretch of water across whose expanse spoiled millionaires will zip around in their powerboats--no! Let us feel the water, let us hear the water, and let us be one with the water.

Accompanying me is my ritual wife, Nobella. Nobella is capable of finding water. Nobella is what is called a dowser. In Europe she would be honored and here in the United States, but because of rapid death of the black culture in South Africa a person like Nobella stands great chance of being burned to death as a witch. She can find water, and I sometimes play tricks upon her. I will sometimes lead her blindfolded to a place where I know there is a great sewage pipe that passes under the ground and she will find this, and very angrily, and she is a Mantebella with a very fiery temper. She will be furious that the water under her feet is dead and is not sinking to her breasts. Now what does that mean? It means that sewage water is water that is now so overloaded with dead matter that it has died itself. It has died as a living entity. It only lives as a liquid entity that is taking this rubbish to wherever it is going to go.

Ladies and Gentlemen, please, let us bring back the earth. Let us accept one thing which our mothers accepted and our grandfathers knew: that the earth is a living entity where everything is joined to everything else in eternal marriage. And if you destroy something in one part of the world you create a chain of destruction that destroys things somewhere else.

Let me tell you two last things please. One, it is this, that I am told by the great storytellers of our tribes, that fresh water is not native to our earth. That at one time, many thousands of years ago a terrible star, or the kind called Mu-sho-sho-no-no, the star with a very long tail, descended very close upon our skies. It came so close that the earth turned upside down and what had become the sky became down, and what was the heavens became up. The whole world was turned upside down. The sun rose in the south and set in the north. Then came drops of burning black stuff, like molten tar, which burned every living thing on earth that could not escape. After that came a terrible deluge of water accompanied by winds so great that they blew whole mountaintops away. And after that came huge chunks of ice bigger than any mountain and the whole world was covered with ice for many generations. After that the surviving people saw an amazing sight. They saw rivers and streams of water that they could drink, and they saw that some of the fishes that escaped from the sea were now living in these rivers. That is the great story of our forefathers. And we are told that this thing is going to happen again very soon. Because the great star, which is the lava of our sun, is going to return on the day of the year of the red bull, which is the year 2012.

Well. I'm glad I won't be there to see the fun. My wish is this: that there may be blessing over everything that you have done, over everything that you are going to do. May whatever power there is beyond the stars strengthen your efforts, because each lake that you bring back to life is a whole world saved.

Thank you.

News for the Soul

(Source: www.newsforthesoul.com/icke-june25-2005.htm Radio show with the guests David Icke and Credo Mutwa)

Credo: Who, however, are so afraid of our, our advance in certain fields of human being that they do everything in their power to suppress us. Just as the Western nations knew who the Africans really were, knew what the Africans had done, but they deliberately kept the knowledge away from the Africans. For example, far beyond England are islands far beyond the ...? and on those stone fragments, the people of those island say that those were erected by black men, but the English people arriving in Africa pretended not to acknowledge the effect. But to the North west of the country, islands that were once visited, the African was denied his own true identity, just like some alien entities are denying us the truth about ourselves and the importance of ourselves, pushing us into fear.

And they are actually blinding us. What am I saying, then? When we were young children, we were being forced to be vaccinated. We had to go to the local admission station where we were vaccinated, and our grandmothers protested against it, saying the children were being spiritually blinded. And it turned out to be true. Many Africans that were given these scaremongering vaccines became spiritually deaf and blind. They no longer saw nature's spirits. Only parents who protected us, who used to apply maze to cause blisters, so that when the officers saw them, they thought we had been vaccinated, so in fact, they did not give us vaccines. We were prevented from being spiritually blinded.

Host: What is in [the vaccines] that is cutting us off from our spiritual world

Credo: All I can say is that any disease vaccines, especially a thing called "Yellow fever" - which you can't travel to certain countries without being given - these people become spiritually affected. Another thing that affects these people is that when you want to a trading store, the shopkeeper used to give you what is called bonzeelsa. These are lumps of food that are given to children. They became addicted to this food, and these people became spiritually blind. I remember in the 1950s we were told not to buy it. We would accept it, and were told when we went out into the bushes to throw it away. This is sheer cold, ugly superstition. This is part of a strategy that is being pursued now by whatever powers that exist. It would be interesting for Icke to hear that today, out of anger, I went to a lawyer to seek advice over something that is happening to me, in terms of the AIDS pandemic. It should be known by all of humanity and not hidden under a blanket.

Icke: He is talking about vaccines making it much more difficult to get into a multidimensional level - this sugar, in our food and drink. What they must do to hold us in the five sense reality is to prevent us from moving out of this mode. We are being bombarded so we find it much harder to see who we are, so we look only into the physical world to see who we are.

Groups of countries are played off against each other is a common technique. We are desperate to survive on paying the mortgage and worrying about conflict so we do not challenge the system. Those who do fight need to realise that they are all facing the same problem: society being held in spiritual servitude. It's all about disconnecting us from the full magnitude as to who we are. We are only droplets of the ocean. Once we wake up to how the manipulators' power is falling. They are starting to panic - this chitahauri. The agenda for centralised global dictatorship - fundamental to this is closing us down spiritually - the next few years are going to be a very interesting time to be here. He predicted the Kennedy assassination and 9/11. Doing this is possible if we are unlocked spiritually.

Host: How do you do this, Credo?

Credo: I don't know. It's a gift. I don't like it. I am not proud of it. It has made a misery of my life. All I know is that everyone throughout my family - and other black people - have had this gift. But because the Christians do not like it, we hide it. We try to suppress it. In other words, we are helping the enemy to help enslave us out of fear. I have heard many white people boasting about their psychic power. They shouldn't. It is a horrendous responsibility. It is something all humans used to have. It is not an enjoyable experience, honourable lady. It only shows that this universe is more mysterious than we like to think. It is not really something that one ought to boast about. It is showing how the universe is falling. Once everybody could see into the future. Africa is full of prophets who made predictions. One black woman predicted that black men would rule south Africa again. Her predictions were so disturbing to the British empire that they ordered the arrest of this black woman. She was raped in a lunatic asylum and she died for this. They put her in an asylum. This wonderful woman even named Mandela before he came about. The obsessive fear about prophets haunted the British through their private consultations. I wish that you, honourable one, I wish that human beings would go back to what they used to be. We full from a godly state to a slave state. We fled from people who once sailed the seas to people who are frightened of their own shadows today. We must go back to that time and understand man should fall no more. Man and woman should go back to the days of those human beings that raised great pyramids in Egypt and Peru. These were human beings that used their God given talents. We should go back to that. Africa needs to go back to that time and be an agent of peace on this planet.

Icke: I realise why Credo thinks his powers are a curse. When the British went into these societies - whether it be the Native Americans, Central America, South Africa, Australia - wherever they went, one of their key goals was to destroy the knowledge their. They killed the Shaman, which is why his knowledge went underground into a network of secret societies. They wanted to destroy that knowledge. They were terrified of it because it holds the knowledge that could set us free. We are not Credo Mutwa or David Icke. We are infinite conscious. They have to destroy our amazing infinite knowledge, as well as putting crap into the food and vaccines. If we did not have the potential to be that God-like entity then they would not have to work so hard to suppress our infinite selves. I've used this analogy before: if you put the ball in the tank of water, just like we should be infinite. To keep the ball in the bottom of the tank, you have to hold it there. If you leave it, it will go to the bottom of the tank naturally. Over time we have been bombarded mentally, physically and spiritually to hold us at the bottom of the tank. Uncovering the methods of suppression should not be ignored. Every time I talk to Credo about the African experience, it is such a microcosm of how the humans have been held down. But I KNOW, that now is the time that we are in the true time of transformation.

Host: Do you have a recommended list of safe foods?

Icke: I do. I think we can cope with a certain amount. What happens when it gets overwhelmed - what I call the Norton Anti-Virus - the immune system, when overwhelmed, we get in a situation when we get in trouble. I eat non chemical food and eat purified water. I keep chemicals out of my body. When travelling around, I can cope with it - hard to ignore McDonalds. So it can cope, but then I make it healthy most of the time, when I'm at home. I saw my son, playing football, and the stuff in the coke was like a chemical formula, and they were all just washing it back like nothing. It is no wonder we are seeing increasing behaviour problems among children - because they're being poisoned. They are being chemically re-wired. So what do we do? We give them even worse drugs, so off we go in this downward spiral. The great problem is not juvenile delinquency, it's adult! Most of the delinquents are in government. We do this by not forcing stuff on them, but giving them the info they need. The parents pour this crap on them, and wonder why they behave like they do. I feel for these children, because there are some incredible children being born now, being able to retain this multidimensional state. They are targeting this children because they know they then have the adults that become. We need to protect them from what is being done.

Host: OK, let's talk about throwing the bones. Explain. You said that's important.

Icke: I believe in not imposing on other people. If you like something, keep doing it as long as you don't affect others. I think that's a good philosophy. They gave a great energy. Credo starting reading them. To him, it was a storybook. Credo, how does it work?

Credo: I don't know. But all one has to do is - I don't know the English word - we must go deep into a certain part of the human body where there is a broad tower residing in every part of the human. This is in all of us, where all fear is banished. When you are in this golden place - where you see up, down, future, present, where you see everything- where there is full love and you see all eternity. I can not describe it, only calling it the golden cave. You are one with everything. Then, you feel that when the things talk to you. Even now, there are Christian priests, even those of the Roman Church, tell the children not to listen to what we do. These, they say - certain things - not to even drink the medicines we drink, because these are the devil's... The God knowledge in all of goes on even now. One The words that David Icke just said made me cry. Something is happening in Southern Africa that should be investigated by all human beings that care about humanity. South Africa has been brought a kind of GM (Genetically Modified) corn. This maze, mam, is highly poisonous. It makes human beings highly violent. It is the ingredient of junk food that our children are forced to eat. South African governments have rejected this. So, to get around the problem, it has been falsely labelled as (translation): "This is just normal maze". It came not from Africa, but from America. It was brought by the slave raiders to Africa. It made people huge, big massive, but dumb, weak-minded and extremely aggressive. Some of the most aggressive tribes in Africa- my own people, the Zulus – became very warlike, because they adopted this alien graze. But in this battle against AIDS – that the last true heroes of Africa are fighting – we say that you should not eat maze, but eat the ancient graze, most anciently known to Africa. By eating it, health increases dramatic. They increase in size and become not self-hating. This kind of human hating goes on still now. I am a painter of pictures and I am the only black person in all of South Africa that casts his own wax in metals. But did you know that I am not allowed to sell any of this, because I portray things – that I appear as if I portray things that certain powers do not want to see exist. There is a war against the ancient knowledge of humans, the winged mind. My aunt is gone – 104 years. My wife Cecilia – she died with a mysterious needle. And my sister is dead. I was told a falsehood that she had died in a car accident, but there was no car near where she died. Why? Mary protested against the crime of the Catholic Church, which discourages SAFE SEX BEING PRACTISED BY AFRICANS!! Why does the Catholic Church allow of this, she said. And she paid for it with her life. I wish that this wife could be exposed in all of its disgustingness. All these people are dying. I feel angry. How can people feel so blind to these hostile alien entities disguising themselves as alien invasions?

Host: David?

Icke: Wow, just hearing Credo talk there. Everything he says connects to the same subject of human knowledge. Me and Nicole [the host] talked about this silent cave, the golden cave, where you go to see beyond what most can see. What he was saying about GM food and maze was amazing. What I've been saying for years is that GM food is designed to genetically modify US! It PLAYS WITH OUR DNA! For some reason they are targeting the black people, for some reason, particularly in Africa. When you read PNAC, it is just like reading the last 5 years of the Bush administration. It talks about the need to invade Iraq, Iraq, North Korea and Iran – known as the axis of evil. You follow this document and the course of what is going on now. It also talks about creating weapons that target specific genotypes. They are targeting them with AIDS. What is AIDS? You don't die of AIDS. You die of the immune related disease, as it break down your system. It is a concentrated attack against the African immune system. Instead of doing this, you should go along the lines of improving the immune system. You need to find the solution for this. Credo found a solution for this which proved to be incredibly successful. But this is difficult to implement, because the people in power need to fight against this. We are faced with a series of coldly calculated actions. If we can remove the powers that create these things, they will go away. I must emphasise this: I'm tired of hearing people coming from the spiritual direction, that are in complete denial of what is going on in this planet which they do not think are very pleasant. The real reality is not running away from what we don't like. We need to remove what is denying and removing the spirituality of everyone else. We need to actually get involved in changing the world instead of allowing it. Just my opinion.

Host: And what would we go about changing?

Icke: Fighting is no good. What the matrix wants us to do is fight. It takes two to fight. As someone said in sixties, what if we had a war and no one turned up? It's about removing the source of it. As Ghandi said, it's about not co-operating with the system. If we would not touch the aspartame-ridden soft drinks and refused to touch GM food and refused to take part in wars of conquest – but are about further imprisoning – then there would be no war to conquest. George Bush and Tony Blair are not out fighting wars. They are in their office smoking cigarettes. There should be a law that anyone who declares war should have to go on the frontline. We are cooperating with our own imprisonment. This is why staying rural is so key. We need to stop buying their crap, and if we did, the corporations would have no one to sell it to. If we stop cooperating, the system would fall.

Host: I want to open up the floor for Credo. What is the most important message that you want to get out to the people?

Credo: I cannot and do not have the right to dictate to people what they have the right to do and not do. I say to all the world – my brothers and sisters – whether you are white or black or brown, we are in great danger. Too many people, as Icke said – these should be written into stone – we human beings are blinded. We refuse to see certain things and are conditioned not to see others. For example, the conspiracy is not simply a dream in the minds of deranged people. I never believed such a thing myself. I used to think that it is just white people talking. I am not a victim of my own ignorance. Look at the world. Look at India and look at Africa. India underwent the same form of spiritual undermining that Africa went through. However, India has today recovered its dignity as a people and a nation. And for some reason that I can't understand, India has been allowed – I SAY, ALLOWED – has been allowed to possess nuclear weapons. It has been allowed to possess huge iron wegs. There is even an Indian that I saw in a picture who works on steel in a large scale. However, Africa – whose mind is the same as India's – is entrenched in endless, engineered wars from outside. They gain no one anything. And today I see a new danger for Africa. There is now talk – emanating from the West – that terrorists have now entered terrorists. In other words, Africa is now the next country to fall victim to Western open neocolonisation, where Africa's people will be wiped off the face of the Earth. The Western nations will allow war, famine and disease to run rampant in Africa. What we are seeing now is that Africa is going to be sterilised, in wars in which Africans will carry the blame. Same with diseases. And yet these wars, famine and disease come from outside. We must understand that we stand in danger from mortal danger. Among the people that talk to me, people say that there is more oil underground than there is in the entire Middle East. There is also a metal that carries in its hands the future of all the oil-producing nations of the Middle East. That metal is platinum, which Africa will be destroyed over. We have already lost my children. I weep tears which will be wiped off my eyes by no one. We are being destroyed. An enemy has declared war upon us. We are being killed by AIDS and by wars that I appeal. Please, look at the truth. Do not go into denial, by brothers and sisters. Nations are being dessimated in front of you. Open your eyes. Do not let the children of the reptile destroy us. We can win. Open your eyes.

Icke: Africa has been destroyed in terms of its history. Tony Blair, one of the great manipulators of the war in Iraq, and Afganistan and what have you, he has now said that his desire and passion is to save Africa. When he says something – you reverse it. So he means he wants to finish it off. He wants to destroy Africa. These guys want to destroy Africa’s knowledge and profit from its resources.

The solution is people waking up. It is also mentally waking up and seeing what is actually happening. It’s like a veil. A lot of that veil is denial. You just don’t want to look at it. It’s a version of “shut up, don’t want to hear it”. At the same time, knowledge is being destroyed to keep that ignorance perpetuated. We need to get information around the suppression of the mainstream media. We need to wake up from our hypnotic slumber state. We are trying to do this – me, you, Credo and others. I realise the challenge of this. Our own prison wardens will hand over the keys to us. We’re going to see some incredible changes. Some of them terrible and some of them incredibly inspirational.

Host: Thank you all for joining us on newsforthesoul. Perhaps we can do this again sometime.

Credo: Amen to that.

Icke: That was so powerful that interview, Nicole. I could feel it has an energy about it. I could feel it. This is why we’ve been brought together.

Host: Exactly.

The Theft of the Necklace of Mysteries

DAVID ICKE (DI): Hello. I'm at the home of Credo Mutwa, a fantastic man who it's been my privilege to know for a very, very long time. A Zulu Sanusi ... what some people know better as a shaman, but it's a high shaman. This man is a library on legs when it comes to African knowledge, and anyone that's read my books, or seen my talks, will see how much information this man has to share with the world. And one of the artifacts which has been highlighted many times in my books, because I think it's so significant, is something called the Necklace of the Mysteries. It's the one with all the symbols hanging from it, which tell the story of humanity and the story of Africa. The extraterrestrial figure and the human women figure, and the interbreeding between the two, all that story that I've told many times, thanks to Credo sharing it with me. Well, I have to tell you, this ... necklace, which is mentioned five hundred years ago in accounts and Credo says is a thousand years old or more, is now no longer with him. It was taken away from him, in Swaziland, by people who ... tortured him, in effect, pulling his fingernails off, or trying to, and some threatening to kill him. Well, Credo survived, thank goodness, but the necklace is still with these thugs, and whoever was behind and orchestrating these thugs. If you have any information about its whereabouts, would you please contact me at an email address, DavidIckeContact@aol.com, it's all one word, DavidIckeContact@aol.com, and let me know any information you may have about the whereabouts of this amazing, amazing artifact. And now, let's hear Credo tell the story of what happened, and how important this necklace is to him ... and indeed, the story of humanity in general. Credo, could you tell us the story of what happened, from when it all started. Tell us what happened, from the start, leading up to now.

CREDO MUTWA (CM): Yes sir. I was repeatedly phone called by a young man, who really was pestering the life out of me. This young man said he kept on having dreams about how I should take him to Swaziland. About how he had great ancestors, whom he wanted the help of. He phoned us every night until I got very angry. And then, he got himself friends who pestered me, on his behalf. And in the end, they said, it has been said by white people that I am a traitor, who takes black knowledge, and hands it to white enemies of the black people. I said, 'That's nonsense.' The insinuation even went on that I was not even a Zulu. And tribalism and racism is rife in South Africa today. People can be killed like dogs, if their lineage or tribe, or family are in doubt. I said to this young man, 'What do you really want with me? What do you want?' He said, 'I want to see you. I want you to give to us the necklace of secret knowledge.' I said, 'You are mad. I'm not going to part with that thing. I don't know who told you about it.' He said, 'But you are showing it to white people. We, who are black like you, you discriminate against.'

And that's how it started, sir. I decided to confront these people. It turned out that there were many. I decided to confront these people, and foolish quixotic donkey that I am, I took the Necklace of the Mysteries, and the Walking Stick of the Grandfathers with me.

DI: And you got on a train to Swaziland.

CM: Yes, sir, I went there. And they met me there. And they ... took me to their home. I did not know that I was going to face a mob, sir. I did not know that I was going to be put on trial like a criminal. That is where they started taking my nails from my hands away.

DI: They were pulling your nails off?

CM: Yes.

DI: What happened?

CM: You know sir, it was just sheer, bloody cruelty. They wanted to see. In fact, these people had been sent to kill me, by some white people. White people who had offered them a lot of money for this necklace. It was a nightmare. But circumstances saved me beyond the terrible pain I was going through.

DI: You were telling me someone sat on your hand, and then someone else was pulling...

CM: I was sitting...

DI: ...your fingernails off.

CM: ...I was sitting on the chair, sir, when this boy sat up on my arm. It was a, you know these wicker chairs.

DI: Yeah.

CM: And this one sat on my arm, and suddenly I felt a terrible pain. He was pulling my nail with a pliers. But he broke the nail in two places. I said, 'You want to kill me, don't you? That's what you brought me here for. But let me tell you that I am a Sanusi. I am a descendant of Ungoza. I'm a descendant of Sifele. I am a pure-blooded Zulu. And I am not afraid to die.' 'Let me tell you, that you, who are pulling my nail out of my fingers, you are sick. There is something sick about you. You are very, very close to death.' He started screaming, saying 'What?! What?!' I said, 'You are close to death.' I could see shadows in his eyes. I could see something else. I smelled a strange smell: the smell of a person who is on the last stage of AIDS. I said, 'Touch another nail in my finger, and you are going to die, shitting like a dog. Go on, do it.' Then there started an angry, an angry uproar. Some said I should be stabbed to death. I said, 'Stab me to death, within two hours, one of you will die, and that is you.' He started screaming, and he ran out of the house, and he ... it was just a uproar, sir. I wish you were there to see. People were quarreling with each other now. Some said, 'Let this man go. Can't you see he's got an evil spirit? How did he know that you, you are going to have such a stomach ache? How did he know that you have got caught AIDS?' I said, 'I can see. Kill me. I'm not afraid. I have no friends here. Go on.' They took the necklace. I was too weak to carry it out. They took the necklace and the stick, and on the following morning, I was very, very sick. A group of the women escorted me to the station. I was put on the train, they tried to be nice to me, but I just was ... I was out of this world. I no longer knew what was happening, or what was happening.

DI: And they kept the Necklace of the Mysteries.

CM: Yes, sir.

DI: The necklace of the knowledge.

CM: Yes, sir.

DI: And you've never had any idea where it is since then?

CM: No. Because I have not left here since then, sir.

DI: What does that necklace mean to you?

CM: Sir, these necklaces ... are the Bible of the black people. These necklaces are ... we learned from them. Things that you don't learn in any school to ... to white people. These necklaces are alive, sir. They were made by women. That is why they consist of copper. Copper is a female metal. That is why they consist of the green stone, jadeite, which was also handled by women.

DI: And it's very old, isn't it?

CM: It is, sir. It is.

DI: I think you told me once you thought it was at least a thousand years old.

CM: Yes, sir. Yes, sir. Yes.

DI: And what effect has it had on you? I mean, how has it made you feel, since ... because I know we've talked about this many times...

CM: I am broken. You know, Mr. David, my heart is broken, sir. I felt I did a stupid thing, and I should have paid for it with my own life. Imagine taking a thing like this into the hands of drunken swine.

DI: But you didn't know that, did you?

CM: No. I thought they were royal people. I thought they were good people. I thought they were adult people, Sangomas and Inyangas. But they were young hooligans.

DI: And what... You told me that there was a white person in the background. Are you...

CM: Yes, sir.

DI: What was that about?

CM: I don't know, Mr. David. But I can draw that white man.

DI: What was he doing? What was he...

CM: He was with them. They appeared to be having some kind of a drinking or whatever thing. But that white man, sir, he ... he wasn't just a white tote. He ... he had purpose behind him. And I noticed another thing: it was he who appeared to be crazy about the necklace. He seemed to be freaking out, if you know what I mean.

DI: And he seemed to be orchestrating it, did he?

CM: Yes, sir.

DI: And they, they didn't seem to like me, for some reason, you were telling me.

CM: Sir?

DI: They didn't like me, for some reason.

CM: Yes. They asked me, where are you. I say, 'I don't know. Angazi. [Zulu for 'I don't know.'] I don't know where Mr. David Icke is.' They said, 'But doesn't he write to you?' I said, 'You can search my post office. I don't even own a cell phone. I've only got a real phone.'

DI: And what was their problem with me, then?

CM: I don't know, sir. But somehow, the way they were afraid of you. That's very funny, Mr. David. I asked, 'Have you ever seen Mr. David Icke?' They said, 'No.' I said, 'Then why are you shit-scared of him for?' He didn't answer me.

DI: I was the 'White Satan,' wasn't I, according to them?

CM: Sir?

DI: The 'White Satan,' wasn't it, they called me?

CM: Yes, you white devil.

DI: The white devil.

CM: Mmh.

DI: Because, I guess, you're sharing information with me, and it's only supposed to be for one group of people instead of for the world.

CM: But sir, there's something that really, really worried me. I only thought about that afterwards. Mr. David, these people, the black people looked ordinary black people, sick looking. But that white man ... no, sir. Let me ... let me try and work out. He looked... he was smaller than you, and he looked not quite man-like. You know?

DI: How do you mean?

CM: He looked... what's the, what is the English word ... he looked like a fairy, Mr. David Icke.

DI: Mm-hm.

CM: He looked not normal [unclear, sounds like 'jigjig'] real man. He was something between a boy and a man. You know, he had protruding teeth. And when he spoke, he seemed to twist his mouth in a certain way. He was not sexually normal. I'm not a judge of white people, but there was something very odd about that man.

DI: What would you say now, to the people that have the Necklace of the Mysteries? What would you say to them?

CM: I say, 'You have stolen something that comes from the old gods. You have taken something that even I have no right to. I was given this thing as a custodian of it. I swore ... you have taken this thing, like thieves in the night. Within a short while, something interesting is going to happen to all of you. I see one of you dead under a blue car. It is you, with the protruding teeth. You, who never spoke, who spoke with a hissing sound on his, on...' as if his teeth were a bit drunk.

DI: And if they want to avoid that, they bring it back.

CM: They had better bring it back. They had better bring it back. This I swear by my mother's breasts. The Necklace of the Mysteries belongs to no one. Not even I, who am the keeper of it. 'Bring it back. You were sent to take it away. You were sent by someone. Who it is, I don't know, but I will dream about them, and I will know who they are. You called me a sellout, a traitor, who licks the backsides of white men. You are the traitors.'

If you know ANYTHING about the theft of this priceless, ancient artifact, of inestimable value to the story of Africa and the human race – but very likely now in the hands of white man who are only interested in money... please contact DavidIckeContact@aol.com in full confidence.

Baba Vusamazulu Credo Mutwa on Barack Obama

Zulu shaman, or sanusi, Credo Mutwa, has written a poem to express his thoughts on what he sees as the true nature of Barack Obama and the agenda for Africa and the world that he represents.

* * *

An actor walks upon the floodlit stage of lifewearing a mask of an angel beneath a demon's gown.

Pretence smiles upon the crowded hall of life holding out hope as bright as it is false.

Son of a woman in whose veins flows the blood of ancient Ireland and dark Africa's plains.

You are Obama, nick-named the standing king, You are Barack, oh, son born to deceive

The suffering hoards of Africa look up to you, See a black saviour where nought but a Judas strides.

An entrapper of nations, bringer of dismal war behind the robes and the nylon wings of hope

Oh, may those who look upon you, see you as you are. May those who hope in you behold you as you be

A prince deceitful to bring down Africa's shrines

A siren who leads Africa's ships onto rocks of obliteration.

Your rule my lord will not be one of peace

Your reign my king will not be one of smiles

Even as we speak in caves both dark and dank Enraged fanatics plot your dark demise They will put around your head a bloodwet martyr's crown.

Oh black Kennedy following the one before. May God forgive thee and thy fiery spouse

As you walk in silence from the stage of life. Barack Obama, blessed son, Oh standing king.

Challenging Times Ahead

Credo Mutwa is a Prophet that foresaw the Twin Tower attack on 9/11. He predicted that President Thabo Mbeki would not see out his full term. A very good friend and colleague of Credo's - David Icke - says that he is a genius. As David has stated; an African man who is extremely knowledgeable and talented with Art, Poetry and amazing Sculptures. His stories of our true history and where we actually came from are astounding.

Credo mentioned that Southern Africa birthed Egypt, and not the other way around as has been stated. We come from the stars and South Africa has many ancient sacred sites which are long lost and forgotten that existed more than 100,000 years ago.

He said that Southern Africa will determine the outcome of humanity and that Africa holds the key to our salvation. He also mentioned that 2010 and 2012 will be very important years; it will bring great challenges to us human beings. How we respond and act towards these challenges will determine the outcome. Sadly, he feels that at the moment, we are not doing too well to overcome these challenges and stated that he would rather not be here to see this transformation, as this will be a time of great suffering for his people. Credo said that the present President of South Africa, Mr. Jacob Zuma will be the last black President of South Africa. If this is true, then something dramatic has to happen in South Africa for this to actually come to pass. Can it be changed? "Yes, but I cannot see it change by the way we are carrying on at the present moment".

Credo Mutwa and the Alien Agenda: UFOs and Alien Abduction in the Eyes of a Zulu Shaman

© By LOUIS PROUD

The Zulu sangoma (a shaman or healer) and high sanusi (clairvoyant and lore-master) Vusamazulu Credo Mutwa is recognised by many as one of the most distinguished African traditional healers around today. He is, in fact, the spiritual leader of the sanusis and sangomas of South Africa.

As well as being a successful artist, author and historian, Mutwa is also an outspoken victim of alien abduction, having allegedly been in contact by entities his people call the mantindane ('the tormentors'), which are similar in nature to what we in the English speaking world call 'the grays'. Stories of UFOs and alien beings make up a big part of African tribal culture, he says.

AWAKENER OF THE ZULUS

Mutwa was born on July 21, 1921 in the South African province of Natal. The name Vusamazulu means 'awakener of the Zulus', and was appointed to Mutwa during his initiation as a sangoma. Mutwa means 'little bush man', and Credo means 'I believe'. Born out of wedlock, Mutwa was considered "an illegitimate child, a child of shame." Because his mother, who was descended from a long line of medicine men and women, refused to convert to Christianity, Mutwa's parents separated shortly after his birth. Thus he was primarily raised by his Roman Catholic father, who frequently travelled from place to place, working as a builder.

Mutwa claims that much of the knowledge he now possesses – of art, science, medicine, engineering and so on – can be attributed to the fact that, when he was child, he was taught by "strange companions." These "little people," he says, some of whom were blue in colour, used to make their presence known to other children as well. In fact, "all African children used to see such things." Thanks to the help of these beings, he says, he was often more knowledgeable than some of his teachers at school.

When, in 1937, Mutwa was brutally raped by a gang of mineworkers outside a mine compound, he experienced "a great shock and trauma," remaining ill for a very long time. He developed a feverish condition, accompanied by nightmares and visions, which caused great pain and debilitation, and which, he says, almost killed him. It also caused him to become highly psychic, and he was sometimes able to read the minds of those around him, as well as perceive auras. The treatment he received from European doctors and Christian faith healers didn't help at all.

Shortly afterwards, Mutwa was brought to his mother's village in Zululand, where his grandfather, Ziko Shezi, a sangoma and warrior – "whom my father despised as a heathen and a demon worshipper" – brought him back to health using traditional African methods. Mutwa was told by his grandfather that the illness he had undergone "had actually been a sacred illness which required that I had to become a shaman, a healer." Mutwa agreed, and, having renounced Christianity, was initiated into the shamanic path by his aunt Myrna, a fully fledged sangoma. Mutwa's 'spiritual sickness' had been part of the initiatory process of becoming a shaman, and is a common aspect of shamanic traditions all over the world.

Sadly, when his father and stepmother learned that he had become a 'heathen', they immediately disowned him, telling him "never to set foot in their home again." Virtually alone and homeless, Mutwa began to travel "for knowledge, in search of clarity of mind and in search of the truth about my people." He journeyed all over the country, meeting, and studying under, a number of traditional healers. His first destination was Swaziland. He then made his way to Mozambique, and later, Rhodesia (now called Zimbabwe). At the end of this not only physical, but spiritual, journey, he realised his life's purpose – to help preserve the culture of his people, and to help mend the problems in his country, of drugs, unemployment, crime, disease and poverty. Mutwa's first book, Indaba, My Children: African Folk Tales, was published in 1964, and is considered a classic. His other works include: Africa Is My Witness (1966), My People (1971), Let Not My Country Die (1986), and Zulu Shaman: Dreams, Prophecies, and Mysteries (1996).

Very much a cosmic thinker, Mutwa claims that many of humanity's difficulties can be explained by the negative influence of manipulative extraterrestrial beings, particularly the mantindane, who "share the Earth with us. They need us. They use us. They harvest things from us." It's about time, he says, that we acknowledged the alien presence on this planet. "We are being watched, we are being explored and investigated, and we are being controlled, and yet there are those among us who refuse to accept this fact," he explains in Zulu Shaman.

A WORLD RULER BY ALIENS

The late, great John E. Mack is among one of the first UFO researchers in the West to interview Mutwa. He has also been interviewed by the Australian UFO researcher Bill Chalker, the author and historian Zecharia Sitchin, as well as the controversial conspiracy theorist David Icke, who once called him "the most amazing and knowledgeable man it has been my privilege and honour to call a friend, a genius." Supposedly, many of Icke's speculations about 'shape-shifting reptilian aliens' – whom he believes to be the true rulers of this earth – have been confirmed by Mutwa. According to Mutwa, when he talks about extraterrestrials and other topics of this nature he often feels "caught between, on the one hand, Western thought, including the Christian religion, and African thought, which accepts these things without question."

Mack first met Mutwa in 1994, during a short trip to South Africa, the main purpose of which was to investigate the Ariel School incident in Zimbabwe. "Credo seemed a noble, even regal figure with his colourful robes and heavy metal adornments of the sangoma, which seemed as if they ought to weigh him down," writes Mack in Passport to the Cosmos. During the interview, Mutwa spoke a great deal about his traumatic alien abduction experiences – experiences that Mack, a world-renowned expert on the subject, found difficult not to take seriously.

Mutwa views the world as a mysterious and frightening place, controlled by alien forces that possess far more knowledge than – and are intellectually and technologically superior to – humanity. Some of these beings, he says, are wise, benevolent and wish to help us. But the same cannot be said of the mantindane, who are just as selfish and power-hungry as humans. They preserve humanity, he says, in order to protect their own self-interests, because they are "obsessed with self-preservation... This wish to play God over lesser beings is with us and with them. Throughout the cosmos vice is the same."

Some of these beings, says Mutwa, have covertly and profoundly influenced all human cultures and civilisations for millennia. They have aided our evolution and helped us survive by providing us with knowledge – of science, farming, medicine and so on. "Throughout Africa we are told that these mysterious beings taught human beings many things," writes Mutwa. "They taught human beings how to have laws, knowledge of herbal medicine, knowledge of arts and knowledge of the mysteries of creation and the cosmos as a whole."

Some of them – the mantindane in particular – are "part of the Earth," and should not be considered foreign. "We and the mantindane are one and the same stupid race," says Mutwa. "Far from these creatures being aliens, they are our future descendants. I am sure of this." Out of all the different types of alien beings that have been in contact with humanity, the mantindane are apparently the most important to Africans, who fear them greatly. Mutwa described these entities to Mack as troublesome and "parasitic," claiming that they "instil superstition, sow discord, and may even cause disease."

A DIFFICULT LIFE

Given the fact that he has led such a difficult life, it is perhaps not surprising that Mutwa's world view is less than optimistic. Over the years, he's been a victim of violence on a number of occasions, and has lost many loved ones. In 1960, his fiancée was shot dead when South African police open fired on a crowd of people to which she belonged. In addition, his first-born son was knifed to death by a group of black activists, "murdering people under the banner of the mass democratic movement."

During the Soweto riots of June 16, 1976, Mutwa was attacked by a group of thugs who stabbed him repeatedly. "I could feel the knives going into my body," he says. "The thing that always helps me happened then. I split into two, and so

I escaped the pain.” Looking down, he saw his own body, a “bloodied mess that looked like me.” He was apparently pronounced clinically dead. On another occasion, Mutwa was almost burnt alive when a group of thugs doused him in gasoline. In Africa it’s widely believed that when a person is killed in this manner, their soul is destroyed along with their body, preventing them from reincarnating. Mutwa remembers this incident as one of the few times in his life when he felt genuinely terrified.

Unbelievably traumatic though these experiences must have been, nothing compares to Mutwa’s 1958 alien abduction episode – assuming it actually took place, of course. The incident has been detailed in a number of books, including Passport to the Cosmos, Bill Chalker’s Hair of the Alien (2005), and Mutwa’s semi-autobiographical Zulu Shaman (also known under the title Song of the Stars).

CAUGHT BY THE GOD OF THE MOUNTAINS

It all started in the bush, in the sacred Inyangani Mountains of Rhodesia, while Mutwa, at the time a sangoma apprentice, was busy searching for a particular type of herb, which he planned to use as medicine. All of a sudden the temperature dropped, says Mutwa, even though it was a very hot day. He was then engulfed by a bright blue mist, which, he says, “was swirling all around me, getting between me and the eastern landscape.” A moment later, he found himself in what looked like a mining tunnel lined with silver-greyish metal.

The next thing he knew, he was lying on a table of some sort. His boots and trousers were missing. He was approached by a group of grey-skinned creatures, with “very large heads, very thin arms, and very thin legs.” He wanted to flee, but could not move, as his arms and legs were paralysed. “I just lay there like a goat on a sacrificial altar.” On closer inspection, he noticed that the creatures were short, “about the size of African Pigmy.” They looked, he says, identical in appearance to the ‘gray aliens’ (or grays) commonly reported by abductees in America and other Western countries.

Mutwa noticed that what appeared to be the creatures’ eyes were actually black, goggle-like covers. Their ‘real’ eyes were “round, with straight pupils, like those of a cat.” At least one of the creatures – the one closest to him – had a potent and very unpleasant odour, “a throat-tightening chemical smell, which smelled like rotten eggs, and also like hot copper [sulphur].”

Credo Mutwa with bronze sacred ceremonial objects.

Mutwa was then subjected to some kind of operation on his left thigh, which caused him to scream out in agony. An abundance of blood flowed from the wound. Next, one of the creatures stuck a silver, pen-like object up his right nasal passage; then yanked it out. “The pain,” he says, “was out of this world.”

The pain subsided, however, when one of the creatures – who was bigger and taller than the others, and who possessed an air of authority – placed its hand on Mutwa’s forehead. Mutwa could ‘sense’ that the creature was female, despite the fact that ‘she’ lacked breasts and other feminine characteristics. Staring at Mutwa intently, it projected visions of destruction into his mind. He saw cities being destroyed by floods, fires and other natural disasters.

One of the creatures pushed a small, black tubular instrument into Mutwa’s penis. As soon as the instrument was withdrawn, Mutwa’s bladder opened, and he urinated straight into the creature’s chest. It then “staggered away like a drunken insect, and left the room.” A moment later, two other creatures entered the room, one of whom appeared to be a large, metallic robot. Its eyes were bright, seemed to move, and seemed to change colour. The other creature, which was naked, had pink skin, blue eyes, high cheek-bones and looked almost human, yet its body was swollen and strangely out of proportion. Something about it reminded Mutwa of a doll, for it looked and felt “totally unnatural.”

The creature mounted Mutwa “like a crazy Zulu girl,” and proceeded to have sex with him. But the experience was not at all pleasant – much the opposite, in fact. The creature’s body was cold, bony and lifeless, and Mutwa felt as if he were making love to a machine. To make matters worse, it attached something to his penis that made him ejaculate “too much.” It then left the room, leaving Mutwa alone with the tall, female creature. His penis “was burning as if I had put it in scalding water.”

Gripping him violently by the head, the creature forced Mutwa off the table he was laying on, and he fell to the floor, landing on his hands and knees. He was then led roughly from room to room. One of the things that most captured his interest, and which, he says, is still “haunting my dreams,” was a collection of huge cylindrical objects, filled with greyish-pink liquid. They contained “small editions of the alien creatures floating round and round, like disgusting little frogs.”

Mutwa witnessed other human beings being “tortured” by the aliens, one of whom was a white man, “smelling of sweat, urine, excrement and fear.” As Mutwa walked past him, they looked deeply into each others eyes. Incredibly, Mutwa claims to have run into this very same man about two years later, while delivering parcels in the city of Johannesburg. He was working at a curio shop at the time. The man asked Mutwa where he had seen him before, to which he replied, “in Rhodesia, in a certain place underground.” As though the realisation was too much to bear, the man turned away and walked off quickly down the street.

The next thing he knew, Mutwa was once again in the bush. His mind was hazy, and it took him a moment to realise that something terribly wrong had occurred. He felt a pain in his left thigh, as well as his penis, which was starting to swell. He noticed, moreover, that his shorts and trousers were torn, and that his boots were missing. Clinging to his body was the god-awful stench of the place he had been earlier. Coating his skin was a fine, grey powder. He began to stagger home, making his way along a bush track.

Mutwa eventually encountered a group of locals, who guided him back to the village, where his teacher, Mrs. Zamoya, informed him that he had been missing for three days. She believed his story straight away. She told him that he had been “caught by the God of the mountains,” and that many other people had similar experiences. He was lucky to have returned alive, she said, “because many people have disappeared in that part of the land, never to be seen again...”

While staying in the village to recover, Mutwa was bathed every day, so as to wash away the tiny droplets of blood that continued to ooze from the pores of his itchy skin. He found a scoop mark on his left thigh, about a half-inch in diameter, which remains there to this day. Most unpleasant of all, however, skin started to peel off his penis. It also developed sores. This condition did not go away completely, he says, which is one of the reasons his first wife left him. Mutwa was eventually taken to Mrs. Zamoya's 'Solace Mission' in western Rhodesia, where it took him several months to make a full recovery.

THE 'SKY GODS'

It would appear that the alien abduction phenomenon is alive and well in Mutwa's homeland, just as it is in many Western countries, for he claims to have met numerous abductees like himself. During his long career as a sangoma, Mutwa has been approached by countless African women who insist that they have been impregnated by the mantindane and other alien beings. In each case, the pregnancy has mysteriously terminated, as though the foetus has been stolen. Because, says Mutwa, many of these women have been accused of committing abortion – which, in Africa, is regarded as an act “worse than murder” – it has been his job to “convince the family of the woman's innocence, to try and heal the terrible spiritual and mental – as well as physical – trauma that the woman has undergone.”

According to Mack in Passport to the Cosmos, many African tribes believe that the mantindane and other alien beings harvest sperm and ova from unsuspecting human victims. The Masai warriors, for instance, fear that the mantindane are able to drain a man's semen, which is why they go into battle wearing codpieces to protect their genitals, whereas the women of the tribe wear certain ornaments to protect themselves from being sexually molested by these entities.

“Once a mantindane has dealt with you,” says Mutwa, “you become afraid of making love to a woman...These beings scar you for the rest of your life.” Flawed though the mantindane may be, Mutwa points out that they are “part of us, part of our lives,” and that “they are moved by a desperate need.” Mutwa calls the mantindane “solvers of great problems.” Their technology, he says, may be “several million years ahead of ours.”

Whether or not one accepts Mutwa's claim that the mantindane and other alien beings are sexually compatible with human beings – or that such entities actually exist – it cannot be denied that these matters are a very big part of African tribal culture. The “sky people,” or “sky gods,” says Mutwa, have visited Earth for thousands of years, arriving from the heavens in “magic sky boats.” The Pygmies, the Kalahari Bushmen, the Ovahimba of Namibia, the tribes people of Zaire, and of course the Zulus – all of them accept the existence of extraterrestrials, and even believe that humanity is descended from such beings.

The stars are revered by Mutwa’s people, who consider them more important than even the sun or the moon. The word ‘Zulu’, in fact, means ‘people from the stars’. It is from the stars that much knowledge and wisdom has originated, they say. The people of Botswana, explains Mack, “call a star naledi, which means ‘light of the spirit’, and have carved in wood, painted on rocks, or even scratched on metal ‘the so-called UFOs,’ the ‘magic vehicles’ in which the mantindane and the star gods of the various tribes travelled.”

In addition to the somewhat sinister and repulsive mantindane, Mutwa speaks of another significant alien race – one that UFO enthusiasts and conspiracy theorists in the West call ‘the reptilians’. “Some say that these creatures were like crocodiles, with crocodile like teeth and jaws, but with very large round heads,” he says. Anyone who’s read Robert Temple’s impressive and scholarly The Sirius Mystery (1976) would be familiar with the enigma surrounding the Dogon people of Mali, west Africa, who possess advanced astronomical knowledge of the Sirius star system, and who claim that they gained this knowledge, many thousands of years ago, from the Nommo, a race of advanced reptilian or amphibian beings who hail from Sirius (more specifically, Sirius A). Throughout Africa, says Mutwa, these mysterious, reptilian gods are known by other names as well. “In West Africa, in the land of the Bumbara people, these amphibian or reptilian sky gods are known as Zishwezi... In West Africa again, these creatures are called the Asa, which means the mighty ones of magic...”

FACT OR FICTION?

What, then, are we to make of Mutwa’s claims? Was he really abducted by alien beings? Or was his story a fabrication – either completely or partially? And what about his people’s beliefs that we are “descendants from gods who came out of the skies thousands of years ago,” and that these beings “share the earth with us,” and exploit us? Should this information be interpreted literally?

According to Mack and Chalker, both of whom looked deeply into Mutwa’s story, these questions are difficult to answer with a simple yes or no. The truth may lie somewhere in the middle, they say. In Passport to the Cosmos, Mack points out that Mutwa and other indigenous people with whom he has discussed the UFO phenomenon and other related matters, do “not sharply distinguish material or literal reality from mythic truths.” He adds, moreover, that certain ideas of Mutwa’s, “like the dominant role of the mantindane and other extraterrestrial or star beings in human cultural history, seem related to tribal myth and legend.” Chalker is of much the same opinion as Mack. ““Oral material’ like Credo’s is very difficult to judge,” he says.

Given the kind of life he’s lead, it’s a miracle that Mutwa is still alive to this day. Now eighty-six or thereabouts and suffering from diabetes and asthma, his health is continuing to worsen at a rapid rate, and it’s fair to assume that he probably won’t be alive for very much longer. He claims that the ‘alien knowledge’ he has divulged in recent years, which he once pledged never to reveal, was supposed to be reserved for initiate sangomas like himself only. He decided to ‘break ranks’ and ‘reveal all’, however, because he lacks a successor onto whom he can pass his unique and sacred knowledge – knowledge he has earned during a lifetime of initiations. Plus, he insists, this information is too important to be withheld from humanity, and is needed in this time of great global crisis.

Introduction

I was born in Zululand on the 21st July 1921 according to my father. When my father met my mother, he had just lost his wife and a number of children in a terrible influenza epidemic, which had spread through Southern Africa, killing thousands of people in the years 1918 and 1919. Thus my father was a widower with three surviving children.

When my parents met it was in the year 1920, and my father was a builder and a Christian, and my mother was a young Zulu girl who practiced the ancient religion of the Zulu people. I am told that my parents were deeply in love with each other and wanted to get married, but the white missionaries forbade my father from marrying my mother until she became a Christian.

My mother's father was a crusty old warrior who had taken part in the bitter wars that the Zulus had fought against the English, and he coldly refused to allow his daughter to come under the yoke of what he called the "religion of our enemies." I cannot allow my child to become a Christian," my grandfather was said to have said," These Christians are a race of thieves, of liars, and murderers, who stole our country from us at sword point and at gunpoint. I would rather die than see a Christ worshipping Christian within the stockade of my village. Never!"

Caught between catholic missionaries on one hand, and a stubborn old Zulu warrior on the other, my mother and father had no choice but to separate. Although my father already suspected that my mother was pregnant. A great scandal broke out in my grandfather's village when my mother's pregnancy was discovered. My grandfather chased my mother out of his homestead and she was taken by one of her aunts to her own village and there she gave birth to me, an illegitimate child, a child of shame. In those days there was no greater shame among the Zulus than for a girl to give birth out of wedlock. A great stigma was attached to this thing. After a time however, my grandfather allowed my mother - whom he loved dearly to return, back to his village and he insisted that she was not to see my father again.

It so happened that when I was about a year old, a younger brother of my fathers, who had heard about my birth come up from the Natal South Coast to my mothers village and asked my grandfathers permission to take me away, permission that my grandfather angrily granted. "Remove this disgrace from my home, Christian fellow!" he said to my fathers brother," And tell your brother that if I ever set eyes on him, I will make him suffer bitterly for what he did to my daughter. I will seize him and kill him very slowly indeed. Tell him that. I was taken to my father's home in the South of Natal, on the northern bank of the Umkumazi River, and there I grew up. And it was while growing up that it was discovered that I was something of a visionary and a prophet. A talent, which together with an artistic inclination, to draw and to sculpt, the woman who now brought me up, my fathers new wife, did her uttermost to suppress.

I did not attend school until I was well within my 14th year of life. And because my family now kept on travelling, as a result of my fathers building profession, which took him from town to town, we became a family of travellers, who never stayed long in one place.

In 1935, my father found a job, a major building job, in the Transvaal and he brought us all from natal to join him where he was building. I attended school on and off in different schools, and then, in 1937 I went through great shock and trauma, when I was seized and sodomized by a gang of mineworkers outside a mine compound. This caused me to be ill for a long time.

And although I was taken to white doctors, I could find no help until my fathers brother, the same one who had taken me away from my maternal grandfather decided to take me back to my mothers village in the hope that I would find help there. And I did. My grandfather, a man whom my father despised as a heathen and a demon worshipper helped me and brought me back to health, where Christian doctors had failed. I, still a Christian and a confessing catholic, had not believed at all that my grandfather would be able to help me. And I was greatly surprised when he did, and I began to wonder were not the missionaries wrong when they called people such as my grandfather ungodly heathens. If my grandfather had been a stupid heathen savage, as white missionaries loved to call people like him, how is it that he had been able to help me?

It was here that I began to question many things that I never questioned before. Where our ancestors really the savages that quiet missionaries would have us believe they were? Were we Africans really a race of primitives who possessed no knowledge at all before the white man came to Africa? These and many, many other questions began to haunt my mind. And then one day when he was sure that I was fully returned to health, my grandfather told me that the illness that had been troubling me for so long, had actually been a sacred illness which required that I had to become a shaman, a healer. And when the old man said this to me, I readily agreed to undergo initiation at the hands of one of my grandfather's daughters, a young sangoma named Myrna.

When they heard that I had become a sangoma, both my father and my stepmother, told my maternal uncle that I was never to set foot in their home again. And so I found myself on my own, a youth without a home, without family and so I began travelling. First I went to Swaziland and then the land of the Basotho, and I developed a wanderlust that was to be with me until today. I was not travelling for enjoyment, however I was travelling for knowledge, in search of clarity of mind and in search of the truth about my people.

Sometimes I would find jobs for a few months and then move on. Sometimes I found myself travelling with missionaries, the very people in whom I no longer believed. Sometimes I found myself travelling with miners, returning home from the Johannesburg gold mines. I came into contact with men and women of countries that I had not known about before. I learned things that

I had not known about before. I experienced things, which only those that walk the path of the healer in Africa experience.

If a strange thing was happening in the place that I happened to be, I became one of those who were summoned to that place to help using Africa's ancient wisdom and knowledge in that situation. I found myself amongst amazing and strange people. I found myself amongst men and women, possessing knowledge that was already ancient when the man Jesus Christ was born. I heard stories from the lips of storytellers that went back to the remotest of the remote times. Stories that very few had ever heard before.

As the years past, I became filled with a fanatical obsession; I realized how rapidly Africa was changing. I realized to my shock and sorrow that the culture of my people, a culture that I had thought immortal, was actually dying. Very, very soon the Africa that I knew would become a forgotten thing. A thing of the past and I decided to try and preserve somehow, what I could of my people's culture. How was I to do that? Friends advised me to write books. One friend advised me to build living museums in which I would preserve the dying culture of my people, and I struggled very hard to bring these things about. I wrote books, and I tried to borrow money from banks and organizations supposedly established to help black people who wanted to establish businesses.

Again and again, I was disappointed until, after long years of struggle. In 1975 I succeeded in obtaining permission and funds to build the first living museum, for the preservation of my people's knowledge, religion and culture, in the centre of Soweto. Many black people misunderstood the purpose of my having built this living museum. They falsely accused me of cooperating with the apartheid regime and of quote-"glamorising the Soweto ghetto"

But I did not see myself as a politician, I saw myself as a healer, whose duty it was to preserve the greatness of his people, regardless of which government happened to be in power in South Africa. I saw myself as a healer whose purpose it was to create job opportunities for my starving people in Soweto, regardless of whether we were ruled by the apartheid regime or the A.N.C government. I believed firmly that knowledge was about politics and that a race that did not know its true greatness, will never obtain full freedom. And I was saddened by the fact that our people were making huge sacrifices, fighting for freedom when they did not know their full greatness. I said to my now late wife, Cecilia, and myself that if our people gain freedom under these circumstances, that freedom would be an illusion and a fraud.

Years of careful investigation had taught me the European powers that had colonized Africa had done more than just beat our people into submission with artillery and rifles. They had done more than simply sow confusion amongst our people by introducing many conflicting versions of the Christian religion amongst the people. They had deliberately so brain washed our people, that Africans had lost all self-knowledge, self-love, self-respect, self-pride and self-dependency. If you rob a people of all these things you turn them into a race of robots, forever dependent upon you. And even if you stood up and walked away from these people, and said tot them that you were giving them back their freedom, they would stand up and follow you wherever you are going for their minds were still your slaves even though their bodies were now free of your chains.

I believed then as I believe now, that the African has never really gained freedom and independence. Which is why our people have not been able to achieve what nations such as India and the tiger Nations of South East Asia, which were once also colonized by the white people as we were, have today achieved. For example today India is a nuclear power feared and respected by all nations on earth. India is admired for its great culture and its ancient religious philosophies as well as its other philosophies. While Africa is a downtrodden casualty of history forever dependent like a whipped slave upon her former oppressors.

This breaks my heart as a black man, I who, over many years of travelling through my motherland, have discovered that there was a time when we, the black people now held in contempt by many races were once masters of the world. When we, now derided as a nation of savages incapable of ruling itself were once the tutors of the early world, I feel great bitterness, when I see how far we have been made to fall. We whose sons and daughters once walked tall in the Americas, not as slaves but rather as civilizes and rulers. I wept when I found out that we were once the founders of some of the world's oldest civilizations.

We were there in Sumeria, we were there in India, we founded great kingdoms in Cambodia, and the first man to be saluted as emperor of China was one of us, a son of Africa, a black man. Buddha was a black man from Africa, his earliest statues confirm this. Krishna was a black warrior. The goddess Kali, is depicted as an African woman. Even the bible states that Nimrod was a great man in the eyes of the Lord and he was the father of Cush, who founded the great cushite nation. I weep even now when I see Africans slaughter each other in the streets of South Africa, now supposedly a free nation. I weep even now when my people hunger and suffer in the veld in South Africa.

I weep even now when Euro centric education is being fed to our children. Fed in order to make them Afrofobes, creatures that hate and despise their motherland, which look down in contempt upon their own people, because this is what all European educated black people to do. They despise Africa and all she stands for. And they are in contempt of the culture of her people. They are still even now doing the colonialists dirty work for them, because if you want to destroy the culture of a nation, you must brainwash the youth of that nation and make them do your dirty work for you.

There is not a single university in Africa, even now which teaches our people the truth about themselves. There is not a single school in South Africa even now which teaches our people about what it means to be an African. Our children who will stone a Sangoma to death, who will burn an Inyanga to death with a petrol soaked car tire even now, do not know, and were never taught that Africans were once kings of the Americas. They were founders of the amazing Olmec Civilization, whose breath taking relics craved in eternal stone still amaze visitors in museums to this day.

Our children who would gladly spit at the face of a sangoma, who hate the traditional dress of their people, would gladly put on a highland kilt, not knowing that amongst the founders of the Scottish nation were black men and woman and that the surnames of some of these Scotsmen, confirm this. Sholto-Douglas, what does this word mean? What does this Surname mean? Sholto-Douglas. It means Behold the black man. Black knights once fought for the kings of Scotland, and the Danish people who are fraudulently represented in the history books as blond and pink skinned Nordics, had large numbers of black men in their ranks. When Alfred slaughtered the Danes, in England so many years ago, amongst the warriors that he slew were dark skinned men, whose ancestors had come to Denmark from Africa thousands of years before. All these truths are hidden from our children.

Our political leaders, fail to create United Nations in Africa. Our political leaders live on a razors edge in Africa everywhere. They sit on shaky thrones from which they can get kicked off by any armed thug carrying the rank of colonel or general. Why? Because you can never build a viable nation on the cesspit of self-ignorance and self-despite. I have seen many African leaders at first sight, I have spoken to some of these men and all of them have one thing in common, they are simply white men in black skins. And this is why they fail again and again to create a peaceful, progressing and prosperous Africa. They are still slaves of their long departed colonial masters. Look at what is happening in South Africa now. Look at the confusion and the crime, the disunity and the epidemic political killings. What do all these things tell you? That our people lack self-pride and self-knowledge and therefore can never be politically united ever.

I have suffered in the cause of my battle against shadows. When you are fighting against ignorance you suffer just as much as you if you were on a battlefield under gun fire. I have lost people I love; I have lost a woman I love years ago in 1960 to the guns of the white man. To the guns of the oppressive regime In was falsely accused of being a supporter of. I lost a son, my first-born son, Innocent, to the knives of black activists, murdering people under the banner of the mass democratic movement.

I came close to losing another son to the spears of the Inkatha freedom party, God have mercy upon us! I have been cheated by whites who took advantage of my ignorance and stupidity and who robbed me of millions of rands of money I made out of my books. Even as I am talking to you now there is a white woman, who deceived me into signing away everything that I wrote, everything that I painted, and everything that I sculpted. I have suffered, and am still suffering. Even now there are white men that have set my own children, my sons against me. A born again Christian preacher of lies brain washed my daughters mind and stole her away from me, saying, you must not talk to your father , he is a devil worshipper.

I am not seeking anybodies sympathy when I am telling you this; I just want you all to know who and what Credo Mutwa is. I am one of the scums of this earth, a creature dejected and ridiculed by university professors. Professors who later came sneaking into my home seeking the very information that they ridiculed me for revealing. I am a black man who has every reason to be bitter and angry. But somehow I cannot get myself to be angry. You cannot be angry at the ignorant. You cannot but pity the self-destructive.

Many years ago I was fortunate enough to find a woman who loved me, a woman who became my wife and the mother of my seven children. This woman was a strong and godly woman whose quietness, hid a person of steel, this woman gave up drinking, gave up dependence on alcohol out of the love of her children, and of love of fool and the cretin that she married. Today I stand alone, a man rejected by the world. A widower who lost his wife a few months ago under extremely sinister circumstances. My wife went to hospital supposedly suffering from cancer of the uterus, while I was away, and x-rays showed a strange metal device inside her womb.

Nobody knows what this device was. Nobody knows how it had got into my wife's uterus, but before my wife passed away, I received a threatening letter warning me not to talk to a man named David Icke or else my wife would die. I did not take that warning seriously, and my wife died within two weeks after I had received it. I have every reason to be angry with the frot that is called western civilization. I have every reason to be angry with the various foreign religions that enslave our peoples minds and blinker their vision. I have every reason to be angry with education systems that rob our people of their true worth, of the truth about themselves. This is my friends is Credo Mutwa.

I am a sculptor, who has created large sculptures in various parts of south Africa. I am a painter who has painted pictures that were afterwards stolen from him, by exploiters. I am the writer of books, whose books fill the pockets of others with money, and not his own. That is Credo Mutwa. I have used the knowledge that I acquired over many years of investigation and travel, I have used that knowledge to create job opportunities for my starving people. The villages that I built in Soweto, and which were destroyed by misguided youths.

The villages that I built in Mafekeng, and the village and the statues that I built in the Eastern Cape, placed bread in the hands of my starving fellow South Africans. I made jobs where there are none. I made livings for my people where there had been none. I believe that a truly democratic country, is a country that uses the spiritual talents and the heritage of its people to feed the hungry and clothe the naked. But what has been my reward? I have been scorned; demonise lied about by conspirators, who delight in setting black against black, by gullible blacks that swallow any garbage white newspapers feed them. If you speak about the international conspires, that is the government behind many countries governments, people laugh at you for a fourteen carrot lunatic, but there is such a thing and it is ruining my people even now.

The Aids epidemic which will soon wipe out great tribes, such as the Zulus, my people, is no accident, neither is the flood of drugs that is sweeping over this once beautiful country. The soaring crime wave is no accident. The epidemic of political killings which are almost a daily occurrence in some parts of South Africa is no accident either. All these things are planned by someone and carried out by someone on behalf of that someone.

They tell us that the high incidence of rape in South Africa is a macho thing. Rubbish! It is deliberate, it is planned, and most of the woman that is raped in South Africa is raped for black magical purposes. Children who disappear; where do they disappear to? In South Africa today, criminals have got more rights than law-abiding citizens. A criminal will kill your father, in the morning, be arrested in the afternoon and be released on bail on the following morning to come back and kill you who helped the police to put him behind bars. Today in South Africa, as in Prohibition era, America, the distinction between the police and the criminals is getting dimmer and dimmer by the day. And all this is no accident.

Africa My People

There are many shameful things that are being done to Africa and her people by Western nations these days. These shameful things are also being done to African people by Western researchers as well as ordinary writers, who deliberately by pass my Motherland, driving her into isolation, and treating her as though she was not part and parcel of humankind. These writers and these researchers deliberately overlook many important facts about our people, and some time go out of their way to deliberately merely skim the surface of African knowledge, overlooking the rest, and passing on to nations and races which they favour.

There was a time when I wondered, why this was being done? But now I know, too late, the cold blooded satanic purpose behind all this. The black man of South Africa must be denied his identity to make it easier for people with sinister agenda's to turn him into a puppet, spiritually and physically dependent on the west and its rapacious and exploitive ways. The black man must be made to look down upon himself and the other nations too, must be made to look down upon him in contempt. I know as a keeper of my peoples oldest traditions, that sometimes when an animal, be it a goat or an ox, is about to be sacrificed to the ancestral spirits, it must be driven into isolation, kept apart from the other animals, before it is slaughtered. And Africa today is being slaughtered.

The wars that are tearing her apart, the thing that is called Aids, that is raging like wild fire through the plains and valleys through my motherland, are all part of the arsenal of murder that is being employed by certain organizations and nations, in order to bring about Africa's destruction as a race. When I say this, I am not paranoid; I am a man who has studied a number of terrible facts that are to be seen in Africa for some years now. Africa is being destroyed. There are those in whose interests it is that this, the Mother Continent of humankind must be depopulated through war famine and disease and sent into oblivion along with the great knowledge that it's people possessed. I have taken an oath that even if Africa is ultimately destroyed, as the great prophets once foresaw that it would be, the shiny fruits of its children's mind would not perish.

Hundreds of books and magazines have been written and published about Native American people and their undeniably great cultures that they once possessed. Hundreds of books have been written and published in the west about the Hindu people of India, their religion, their sciences and their great philosophies. But nobody ever wants to write anything worthwhile and in depth about Africa.

For example it is a well-known fact that Native American people in Central and South America possessed deep knowledge about the universe, about the constellations, about solar as well as lunar eclipses. It is also well known that these people possessed great calendars of great sophistication and great accuracy. But the fact that African people of various tribes of Eastern, Central, Western, and Southern Africa possess the same knowledge has

They treat the ones they talk about as if they were not part and parcel of the African continent at all. Nowhere is this more evident than when European scientists talk about Egypt. They deal with the Egyptians as if Egyptians were a totally separate race from the rest of Africa, and yet anyone that knows Africa well will tell you that Africa is interconnected. That the various people of our Mother land are inter connected as are the gears and flywheels of a clock, and to see the people of Egypt apart from the rest of Africa is a fraud, a delusion, a crime. The people of Egypt were an African people, not at all removed from those in Nubia, in Ethiopia and in those African regions far to the South of Egypt.

For example anyone that knows Africa well will tell you that the many half-human, and half-animal gods that the Egyptians worshipped had their origins deep in Central as well as Southern Africa and that these gods are still being worshipped by the people of Africa even now. Here is yet another example of how the western investigator deliberately distort facts about Africa. There are writer that write about the khoi San people in Southern Africa- the Bushman people. These writers deliberately view the Khoi san as if they were an entity completely isolated from the rest of the African people, and yet I can tell you, I who have Khoi san blood in me, that the cultures of many black nations in Southern Africa were intimately interconnected with the Khoi san cultures.

The same thing is done when writers write about people such as the pygmies in Central Africa, the Wat-wu. One writer even went as far as to say that the Wat-wa were not an African race and I ask myself, where the thundering hell this white fool thinks the Wat-wa comes from? On which far island does he find them? Anyone that knows the culture and the language of the Wat-wa will tell you that this culture and language are interconnected with the cultures of other people in that part of Africa, where the Wat-wa, or Twa are to be found. This deliberate separation of Africa, the creation of some of the separate races and tribes has resulted in great disaster for the people of Africa as a whole.

For example, for many years, the Belgium's committed the crime of dividing up the people of the Burundi and Rwanda into two separate races. The Watutsi were believed to belong to the Nileotics, and the Bahutu were seen to be Bantu. But anyone who knows the history of these people will tell you that the Watutsi and the Bahutu are not so separate a people, they are simply two divisions of exactly the same people, and these two divisions had lived in peace for hundreds of years until animosity was stirred up between them by the Belgium colonists to suit their own sinister agenda. Before Africa vanishes under the clouds of endemic civil wars, before my motherland disappears under the fog of Aids and other man made diseases, designed for the extermination of my people, I Credo Mutwa, want to correct these blatant injustices.

I Credo Mutwa want to expose these crimes, shameful crimes of the intellect. And as a first step towards correcting this injustice, I want to tell you that it was not only the Mayas, the Incas, the Aztecs and other people of Central and South America who possessed amazing knowledge about the mysteries of the Universe. It was not only these people that possessed knowledge about solar as well as lunar eclipses, as well as the Earth's movement though space. Our people of many tribes in Southern, Eastern and Central Africa possessed this knowledge. And they passed it on from generation to generation in various ways, but mostly orally.

Before human beings were created on this planet, there had existed a very wise race of people known as the Imanyukela. These people had come from the constellation known to white people as Orion, and they had inhabited our earth for thousands and thousands of years. And that before they had left our earth to return once more to the sacred Spider constellation, they made a great evacuation under the earth, beneath the Ruwensory Mountains- the Mountains of the Moon. and deep in the bowels of Mother Earth, the Imanyukela built a city of copper buildings.

A city with a wall of silver all around it. A city built at the huge mountain of pure crystal. The mountain of knowledge. The mountain from which all knowledge on earth comes. And a mountain to which all knowledge on earth ultimately returns. This old woman told me that her grandmother had told her this story while she was still a virgin of some fifteen years or so and under going initiation into the mysteries and the culture of the Bahutu people. The old woman went on to tell me that many generations ago, there came to the land of the Bahutu, a group of little yellow skinned men, who wore colourful robes and strange brightly coloured hats.

These men she said had come in search of the great city of knowledge which they had heard many, many years ago, stands in the earth under the Mountains of the Moon - the Ruwensory Mountains. This story remained in my mind and was one of the many, many strange stories that I had heard during my long, long travels through Africa. And then much to my amazement, in the year 1975 there arrived at my home in Soweto, a friendly bright priest from Tibet.

The priests name was Akyong Rin Poche, whom ever today I still regard as a great friend of mine, is a man who sparkles like a glass of precious champagne. He is a man, unlike most Tibetan monks whom I have met in my life, who looks at life through the mask of humour. He is a man who ever is smiling. A man whose ever word is perfumed with humour. A man who laughs readily. A lovely and lively fellow human being. I was honoured to talk to this man in one of the huts that formed the museum village that I had built in Soweto, and Akyong Rin Poche nearly knocked me over by asking me a question that caught me totally by surprise, and which brought back memories of bygone years in a green and half forgotten Central African country. "Do you know anything," he asked, "About the city of copper, which is said to be somewhere in Central Africa?" For a few moments I was stricken Dumb by astonishment.

And the I replied, " Yes, honourable Rin Poche. In the days I was travelling through the land of the Watutsi and the Bahutu, the land that was then known as Rwanda Urundi, I heard a story about this mysterious city, and I also heard that this city lies deep under ground - under the Mountains of the Moon." Akyong Rin Poche threw another surprise at my feet. He told me how in olden days a great Lama led a group of fellow monks on an expedition into Central Africa in search of this mysterious city, and that Lama and his followers were never heard from again. I was stunned, here was an African story being confirmed by a man from Tibet.

I was totally flabbergasted, and I thanked God that many years ago I had set myself the task of recovering that I had learned through my long journeys through Africa. Today Rwanda and Burundi are countries in grip of death. Tens of thousands of people have been slaughtered. Scores of tribes have been decimated and scattered, never to be reformed again. And great quantities of knowledge have been lost forever. This is the agony of Africa. This is the shame of my motherland.

In many western countries, when an old person dies it is simply the death of an old human being who has gone through life and whose days on earth now come to an end. But in Africa, the death of an elder - an old man or an old woman, becomes a supreme disaster because in the mind of that elder often carries knowledge passed down from parent to child. Knowledge that is not only valuable to Africa and her children, but to human kind as a whole. No matter where you go in Africa, no matter how deep into the interior of the dark continent you tread, you will find very ancient stories which are incredibly similar.

You will find African tribes and races who will tell you that they are descendants from gods who came out of the skies thousands of years ago. Some however say that these gods came to them from the sea in magical boats made out of reeds or wood or copper or even gold. In some cases these gods and goddesses are described as beautiful human beings whose skins were either bright blue or green or even silver. But most of the time you will find it being said these great gods, especially the ones that came out of the sky were non human, scaly creatures, which lived most of the time in mud or in water. Creatures of an extremely frightening and hideously ugly appearance. Some say that these creatures were like crocodiles, with crocodile like teeth and jaws, but with very large round heads. Some say that these creatures are very tall beings with snake like heads, set on long thin necks, very long arms and very long legs. There are those that tell us that these gods who came from the skies travelled through the land in magical boats made of bright metal, silver, copper or gold. Boats which had the ability to sail over water or even to fly through the sky like birds.

It is further said that some of these sky gods carried their souls in little bags which hung from their belts. These souls being in the form spheres of crystals clear material. Spheres which could float about in the air, and which emitted a dazzling light. A light which could illuminate an entire village at night. We are told that some very brave African chiefs used to hold these great gods hostage simply by snatching their little shiny soul globes away from them and hiding them in holes deep in the ground.

Throughout Africa we are told that these mysterious beings taught human beings many things. They taught human beings how to have laws, knowledge of herbal medicine, knowledge of arts and knowledge of the mysteries of creation and the cosmos as a whole. We are told that some of these gods had the ability to change their shapes at will. They had the ability to assume the shape and the appearance of any creature that there is on earth whenever they had good reason to do so. A sky god could even turn itself into a rhinoceros and elephant or even a stork, a sky god could even turn turn itself into a rock or even a tree.

We are told that some of the gods used to travel through the sky in swings made out of brightly coloured lengths of rope. The Wutwa, people of the forests of the Congo, told me about one such god, who swung through the sky on a swing whose ends were attached to the clouds in the sky and who could go anywhere, no matter how far away, and come back before sunset on his magical swing.

In Africa these mysterious gods are known by various names, in West Africa, in the land of the Bumbara people these amphibian or reptilian sky gods are known as Zishwezi. The word zishwezi means either the swimmers or the divers or the gliders. It was said that these sky gods could dive from above the clouds down to the top of a mountain whenever they felt like it, they could also take deep dives into the bottom of the ocean and from there fetch magical objects and then bring them to the shore, placing them at the feet of the astonished black people.

In West Africa again, these creatures are called the Asa, which means the mighty ones of magic. It is from this word asa, a word that speaks great magical power that comes the name Asanti, which means a king, but literally means, the child of asa and as you know Asanti gave birth to the word, Ashanti.

In the land of the Dogon people we find the famous Nommo, a race of reptilian or amphibian beings who were said to have come from the Sirius star to give knowledge and religion to the black people of Dogon. Incidentally, scientists have never explained the meaning of Dogon; it means God Almighty and the Dogon people know themselves as the children of the God Almighty.

There are tribes in various parts of Africa which regard themselves as God's chosen people. These tribes call themselves by a name which means god. In South Africa there is a tribe that calls itself the Tonga, and another very large group which calls itself the Tsonga. And in Zimbabwe there are two tribes, one of which is called the Batonga, and another that is called the Tongaila. The name Tonga, Tsonga or Donga means people of god and you will find these people living in some of the holiest and most spiritual places in Africa. For example, the Matonga people of Northern Zululand live in the area of the sacred St Lucia Lake which is believed by the Zulu people and other tribes in Natal to be the place where, hundreds of years ago, the great earth mother arrived in a boat of reeds, accompanied by her son and his two wives.

And she came to give laws, culture, religion as well as healing arts, and other mysteries to human beings. It is said that the great earth mother was a huge woman, very, very fat with bright green skin and so was her son and his two wives. There once existed in Zimbabwe a very sacred place called Kariba Gorge, which is now covered by a huge lake as a result of the damming of the Zambezi River at this place. In Kariba Gorge there lived two remarkable tribes, the Batonga, which means people of God, and the more remarkable tribe whose name is the Tongaila.

Tonga as you know means God, but the word Ila also means god, thus the Tongaila people are called the people of the God Ila- the wise old god, who

according to some stories created the earth and everything in it. The Tonga and the Tongaila used to tell me that not only are the chosen people sent by God to guard the Kariba Gorge, but they are also in yearly touch with the great gods who come from the stars, whom they call the Bananaila, the children of Ila. Now let us go to West Africa for a while, in the land of the Dogon, there, one is told that when the Nommo arrived from the sky in their fantastic sky ship, there were several of them, thirteen or fourteen of them.

And they created a lake around their sky ship and every morning they used to swim from their sky ship to the shores of the lake and there preach to the people who assembled in large numbers around the lake. It is said that before the Nommo departed, returning with a great noise back to their home star, they first chose one of their number, killed it and cut its body up into little pieces and then gave these pieces to the assembled people to eat in the first sacrificial ritual of its kind on earth. When the people had eaten the sacred flesh of the star creature and drunk its blood mixed with water, the Nommo took the lower jaw of their creature and by some incredible fact of magic brought the whole creature back to life again. We are told that this is the way that the Nommo taught our people that there is no death and that behind every death there shall be a resurrection.

And also that an individual must sometimes sacrifice himself or herself for the good of the community. It is the Nommo, we are told that taught the people of Africa about the mysteries of reincarnation, about the belief that, that which goes away, gone off on the wings of death, will always come back again on the fragrant wings of life. In the land of Nigeria, we hear of how the great mother goddess, Mawi gave birth to human beings after having created the world, and that after a number of centuries, people on earth became filled with selfishness and other forms of negative behaviour and the great mother who was now in the land of the gods, sent down her daughter, Gabato, to earth to once more place human beings upon the path of righteous.

It is said that Gabato arrived on earth in the mouth of a great serpent with all the colours of the rainbow, And this serpent, crawled all over the earth, and such was its size and so great was its weight that wherever it went it created gorges and valleys and canyons. What I found was very astonishing, was that in many countries of the world, amongst the aborigines of Australia, and amongst the native people of the Americas, as in Africa, you find belief in the rainbow serpent. And you also find belief in the feathered serpent.

In the Americas, in South and Central America mostly, the feathered serpent is called Quetzalcoatl, and amongst my people, the Zulus, we find belief in a serpent called Yndlondlo. The Yndlondlo is said to be a huge mamba or a huge python, whose neck is covered in greyish blue feathers, like the feathers of a blue crane, and at the top of the serpents head grow three feathers. One green one, one red one and a white one which look like huge ostrich tail feathers. The Yndlondlo, like the (South) American Quetzalcoatl, is associated with God the Son

A mystery that has fascinated African's for thousands of years. Seen in cross section, this rather dull looking crystal shows a cross like pattern in it. It shows a pattern of the kind that our people of olden days used to call the perfect cross, or the cross of the sun. Before I tell you more, I wish you to know that the thing known as a cross was not brought to Africa by missionaries, knowledge of the cross in its many forms, was here in South Africa from the remotest of remote times.

It was already known to the mystics of Africa long, long before the Christian religion was established in Europe, and further more, the various types of cross were used by African healers and mystics for either good purposes, or evil ones. Africans believed that the cross, either made of wood, ivory or metal was a powerful object, possessed of great magic, capable of unleashing powers of healing, or renewing or powers of destruction and killing.

There were three types of cross that Africans used for healing, there was the T-shaped cross known in Western mysticism as the tau cross, then there was the proper cross of the kind we are told Jesus was crucified upon. A cross with a long stem and short arms. Then there was the unsaid cross, known to white people as the Ankh, which many western thinkers wrongly assume to have been only known to the ancient Egyptians. This ankh was actually known by our people as the knot of eternity, or the knot of eternal life, and it was used even by Khoi San people, for purposes of healing.

The greatest users of the ankh, were the almost extinct Khoi Khoi or Hottentot people. The Khoi Khoi said that the unsaid cross represented their great sun god, Heitsie-Ibib. The zulus, Xhosas and the Swazis and other Ngoni speaking peoples of South Africa also believed in a sun god, who died each evening to be reborn again each morning. Who died each winter and was reborn again each spring.

They believed that this beautiful son of God the Father and God the Mother whom they knew by various names, had lost his left leg in a savage fight against a terrible dragon, some say a gigantic crocodile which walked on its hind legs, its rear legs much, much longer than its fore legs. The symbol of this handsome God of the sun, this hero God and bringer of peace, was also the unsaid cross, Which the Zulus called Mlenze-munye. The Swazis knew him as Mlente-munye. The name Mlenze-munye or Mlente-mmunye mean the on legged one. The one with one leg. And incidentally, when Africans saw the cross which missionaries often hung around their necks, they immediately recognized it as the symbol of the eternal God with one leg who dies and is born again forever and ever. And they respected missionaries as messengers from this God. Which is why in some part of Africa missionaries were called a name which is also one of the many names of the African sun god, namely Muruti, which means the great teacher, a name by which Twana speaking, Owambo speaking and Sotho speaking people still call missionaries to this day.

Our people believed also in what they called the perfect cross, the most powerful cross of all. This was a cross that had all its four wings of exactly equal length. The cross of the kind that white people call the Celtic cross. A cross which is often imprisoned within a circle, with all its wings of exactly equal length, our people used this cross, drawing it in its many forms, healing some of the most horribly diseases to which the body is prone.

Before a person was treated for cancer, the herbs, the powdered herbs which were to be used in this treatment, were first laid out on a piece of clean springbok skin on the likeness of the perfect cross, then spoon after spoon, they were taken and poured into a clay pot which had been blessed several times. There were forms of the cross, which unlike these which I have briefly described which were used for healing, were used for extremely destructive purposes and one of these is what the white people call the Saint Andrews cross.

The X-shaped cross which even today we find teachers in mission schools using to mark a wrong answer written by a pupil in his or her exercise book. Africans believed that the X-shaped cross possessed great powers of evil, and they used it to put curses upon people. It may be of interest to you to learn that when a Xhosa person from the Eastern Cape, says that you are crazy, you are mad he says, "Uphameene."

And the literal meaning of this word is, "You have a cross put upon you," across which has made you cross witted, mad. In ancient times and even modern times, when a African artist, woodcarver or decorator of any kind draws a cross, he or she must take great care to only draw one of those crosses that heal and not to dare to draw, carve or render in beads, one of the evil crosses, because Africans say that the first person that gets affected by a negative engraving or a negative drawing is the artist himself. And the first person to be affected by a positive drawing or a positive engraving is the artist himself or herself.

Africa is a land full of surprises, and they who travel through her forests and upon the banks of her great rivers, and over her eternal plains must always be prepared to meet surprises. One day I was travelling along the Zambezi river, when I came to a home stead which people in villages that I had passed had told me about. I had been told that in this small village I would find some of the wisest people in the land, people who claim ancestry from creatures who are said to have come from the red star know as Liitolafisi, the red star whose name means the eye of the brown hyena is the star, or rather the planet that white people call Mars.

I wanted to meet these wise people, and when I came to the home stead, a collection of grass and wooden huts, protected by a wooden fence, I saw a number of women and children standing inside the fence near the gate. These people were smiling at me and their smiles grew even wider as I drew near the gate, the woman standing nearest to the gate, moved slightly to her left, coming to stand right in the centre of the open gate. My eyes went to her feet, and all courage left me, and like the coward that I often am, I turned around and ran away, followed by loud peals of feminine laughter. I had dropped all my property, my bag and my walking stick upon the dusty path that led to the gate, and there I was running away like a fat ape seeking the safety of the green bush. The women laughed and laughed again, and when I threw a glance over my shoulder, I saw them come out and pick up my property and take it into the village. I had never seen anything like what I saw on that day, the thing that caused me to run away like an idiot fleeing a bush fire.

The woman who had stood in the centre of the gate facing me had only two large toes on either of her feet. It was as if I was staring at the feet of not a human being, but of a monstrous bird from the valleys of folklore and legend. Shame faced I walked towards a tree and stood under it trembling with fear and as I stood there a group of men came out of the village and walked laughing and smiling towards me. Nearly all of them had only two toes on each foot. They wore no shoes, and in the African dust their feet really looked frightening. They came around me and surrounded me and said, Do not be afraid of us, we are people just like you. What is it about us that frightens you? Unable to answer, my face hot with shame and embarrassment, I glanced toward their feet and then they roared with laughter. This is how I met a tribe of people know as the Bantwana, which means children. A tribe of people who claim that their remote ancestors were bird like people who came from the stars and who mated with earthly woman and produced these two toed human beings. The Bantwana people welcomed me into their small village and for three months at the feet of two of their elders, I learned about things that left me numb with amazement. The Bantwana are shy people who in ancient times suffered persecution at the hands of people of other tribes, but when they like you and trust you, and feel pity for you, they tell you things that fill you with great amazement. They tell you that there are twenty four inhabited planets within the area of space in ...

Although South Africa possesses a huge, highly organized tourist industry, that tourist industry, however, has not scratched the surface let alone dented it of the colossal potential as a tourist Mecca and destination that our country possesses. South Africa could attract four or five times the number of tourists that she is at this moment attracting if only those, whose duty it is to attract those tourists, knew more about their country - about South Africa and knew just how huge is the potential that this country possesses as a Mecca for tourists.

It is one of the most shameful truths in our country that those who live within our country's borders know little or nothing about the country in which they live. There may be those who resent my words but this is a fact and I want to state again that the tourist potential of the Republic of South Africa is grossly under-utilized by those whose duty is to tap into it and to activate it for the benefit of the peoples of this land. If those in authority could know more about South Africa's tourist potential, unemployment in our country would be cut down by a large percent and we would find hundreds of black people, especially, successfully involved in the tourist industry of our country.

I speak as someone who has travelled to many parts of the world, when I say that in some countries you find thousands of people gainfully engaged in their particularly country's tourist industry whereas in South Africa only a small percentage of people are engaged in this. What is utterly shameful is that, in South Africa, tourism is mostly a white-owned and white-run business and black people, even now, are left out in the cold or if they are engaged in the tourist industry at all, they are engaged simply as employees and paid servants. I have been to countries such as Japan where that country's tourist industry involves thousands of people. I have been to countries such as South America, especially, where you find hundreds of native Americans gainfully involved in their country's huge tourist industry.

Furthermore, when tourists arrive in South Africa they are shown many things only from the perspective of the European people and not from the African perspective. For example, they are shown South Africa's wild life and they are shown this wild life from the viewpoint of white scientists only - from the viewpoint of white settlers only and they are denied the rich folklore that black people - Koi Koi and Koi San people - knew and still know about wild animals. Tourists are shown, for example the South African wildebeest but they are not told what Africans think about this animal and thought about it - that the wildebeest was one of the holiest animals in Africa.

It was believed by the various tribes to possess powers of expelling negative spirits and other evil influences from the land and the tail of the wildebeest is used even now by shamans and sangomas as an instrument for exorcising evil spirits from people and from places. Tourists are shown the zebra, they are told that this is a Burchells Zebra or whoever's zebra and then they are given the Latin name for this African animal.

They are never told that to African people the zebra was an animal sacred to the great Earth Mother, an animal whose spoor possessed a power to take away infertility and other female illnesses from black women. I can say, bluntly, that a tourist gets cheated in South Africa in that he or she is denied the great beauty of the fold-lore that our people held and still hold regarding animals. I believe that this gross injustice must be remedied and remedied at once. Zoologist and other scientists have been in Africa for just over four hundred years but Africans have lived side by side with wild animals, birds and insects for millennia and over the years they built mythologies around these creatures, mythologies that should not be denied to those who visit our country's shores.

There are even places in South Africa, places of great interest about which tourists know nothing because those who live within our country's shores know nothing and care to know nothing about those things. I say again that South Africa is a paradise, a potential paradise for overseas visitors if only those in authority could allow traditional Africans to have their say and to talk to overseas visitors openly just as trained tour-guides do. South Africa does not consist only of scientists. South Africa does not consist only of white settlers. She consists of ancient tribes and communities, which were here long before the first Portuguese ship sailed around the Cape of Good Hope.

I am going to talk to you about two places. Two places whose potential as tourist destinations we are going to unveil. The first of these two places is a piece of land called Vulindaba, whose name means open the story or start the story. Vulindaba is at the foot of a range of mountains of the Megaliessberg Mountain system. It lies along a road named Lazy River Road. Vulindaba is going to be opened as a wilderness trail to young people, overseas visitors as well as school children. Vulindaba is a piece of unspoilt countryside.

It is a piece of wild bush and grassland. It is a piece of snarling rocks and a steep mountain slope. It is a piece of land on which there still grow some of the ancient flora, which one finds or used to find in this place. There will be accommodation at Vulindaba for young people to spend the night under the South African stars, to listen to stories and to listen to dancing and drum beating - to be one with the spirit of the wilderness and to be one with the spirit of the ancient Mountains of Magadi. This was a land once ruled by matriarchs - a land of hard-working people who were engaged in trade with seafarers far to the east of South Africa. There are many stories in this land.

There are many songs, which one can still hear being sung by old men and old women in this area. It is here that one must, once more, reconnect oneself with the bygone days of this country. There is mystery among the Megaliessberg Mountains. There are ancient things that you find here which have never been written about in any tourist brochure. There are historical structures, which still stand on farms in this area. There are ancient mines, which go deep into the entrails of the mountains. Mines, which were dug by people we do not know.

People who were mining for something we do not know. There are places amongst the Megaliesberg Mountains, which have been regarded as sacred by black people for hundreds if not thousands of years. Let me tell you about one such place. There is a farm along the Lazy River Road and on the edge of this farm there is a spring of pure water. Water that bubbles out of the earth, travels for a few yards or so and then disappears back into the earth again.

Our people called this spring the Spring of Marutwani, who is said to have been a great female healer and prophetess who lived nearly two hundred years ago. For many generations now sick black people, as well as traditional healers, have been coming to the Spring of Marutwani to get its pure healing water and in these two or three decades most the people who have been coming to this place have been members of the powerful Zion Catholic Church, the most powerful free church in South Africa, who have been coming here with plastic containers to get the water of Marutwani's spring. Now let me show you a blatant injustice - an injustice born of ignorance.

There are in England a number of sacred wells and springs whose waters are said to possess healing powers and in my travels to the far away British Isles I came across several such sacred wells and springs and one of them is called Chalice Well. The rusty coloured water that comes out of Chalice Well has been believed by the English people to possess healing powers for thousands of years and the waters of this spring are bottled and exported to distant parts of the world by the English people. But here is South Africa we have got springs like the Spring of Marutwani about which the world knows nothing and the water of Marutwani has got just as powerful healing powers as Chalice Well, Lourdes and other famous places like that in Europe and in England possess.

Everybody knows about Chalice Well but nobody knows about the Sacred Spring of Marutwani and the powers - real powers of healing that it possesses. Another thing. In the same area that Vulindaba is, about a few miles away from it, there stands a little hill, a small mountain, which for thousands of years has been viewed by black people as a mountain just as sacred as Mount Zion is to the people of Israel. This mountain is called Intaba kaNgwenya. This mountain stands out above the landscape and is visible from almost anywhere.

Black people, especially the Mandebele people, have held the belief that gods from the stars descend upon this mountain on a regular basis and ascend up this mountain also on a regular basis for reasons that we human beings do not know. Hundreds of Ndebele men and women over the decades have claimed to have seen strange creatures whose skins are chalk-white. Creatures with the heads of crocodiles and the bodies of human beings, descending out of the sky and then returning back to the sky from the top of this mountain. Many years ago, when I was a sangoma novice, I heard stories about these strange crocodile gods near the cooking fires of wise men and wise women who had their homes around this amazing little mountain.

The farmers upon whose land this mountain stands do not realize what a sacred or an important thing it is and they do not realize how it can be used to attract visitors from far away across the wide belly of Mother Earth. We have got treasures that the gods gave us, but these treasures are unknown to us. This is the tragedy of South Africa. When people visit Vulindaba they shall hear about all this and much more.

Not far away from Vulindaba, across the tarred road that leads to Hartebeespoort, you shall find another place, another farm which, like Vulindaba sits at the feet of the mighty Megaliesberg Mountains, but this farm is unique in that there is a river, the mighty Crocodile River, which flows through the land at the foot of a huge mountain, which old people used to call Nkwe Mountain.

This mountain is a huge, massive thing and seen from a certain angle it looks like a gigantic, sleeping leopard with its head resting upon its paws and what is amazing is that there is a visible feature on the slope of this mountain which looks like the open, snarling mouth of the leopard. There are two semi-circular features, which look like the mouth of a beast. The Sleeping Leopard Mountain is joined by a smaller mountain with a sharp point which the old women who used to have their kraals in this place many years ago used to call the Iswele, the Woman's Breast Mountain, and between the Leopard Mountain and the Woman's Breast Mountain there is a gap and from behind this gap rises the sun and it goes over the farm to set in the West.

We are told that ancient tribal astrologers used to observe the sun and the moon rising from behind these two mountains and they could tell which season it was by which part of the gap between the two mountains was the sun rising at any given time. This farm that I am talking about is now owned by the London based, Women for Peace, the brave women who go into places such as Bosnia and Sarajevo to comfort traumatized refugees and to care for the injured and upon this farm it is our intention to create unique attractions, which visitors will see.

One of these attractions will be a healing village where actual healing of people will take place. Traditional healers will be available here to tend to those who require their skills. Also in this place there will be a place for visitors to spend nights and days and there will also be a Garden of Mysteries, with standing stones erected according to traditional African ways. There will also be statues of various African gods, which will be seen in this place. This place, which did not have a name before, has been given the beautiful African name Naledi that means a star or the giver of enlightenment. Here visitors will take part in traditional astronomy and astrology and here stories will be told and visitors will also be shown healing herbs grown in the Garden of Mysteries. They will be shown that and much, much more. Works of art and other beautiful traditional artifacts will be here for sale for those who wish to buy them. It will be a place of Life, a place of Light and a place of Beauty.

Martin: First of all, let me say it is an honor and a privilege to speak with you, and I would like to thank and acknowledge David Icke and Dr. Joubert, without whose help we would not be having this conversation today. Our readers are aware of the existence of the shape-shifting reptilian extraterrestrials, and what I would like to discuss with you concerns the specifics of their presence, their leadership, their agenda, and their methods of operation at this time. So, the first question I would like to ask you is: Can you confirm that shape-shifting reptilian extraterrestrials do, in fact, exist on our planet at this time? And if they do, if you can confirm this, will you please be specific about them. Where do they come from?

Credo Mutwa: Sir, can your newspaper send people to Africa?

Martin: I'm sorry, can you repeat that?

Credo Mutwa: Can your newspaper kindly send somebody to Africa in the near future?

Martin: We are financially not able to do that at this time, but that may change in the future.

Credo Mutwa: Because there are some things that I would, please, like your newspaper to check-out, independent of me. You have heard of the country called Rwanda, in Central Africa?

Martin: Yes.

Credo Mutwa: The people of Rwanda, the Hutu people, as well as the Watusi people, state, and they are not the only people in Africa who state this, that their very oldest ancestors were a race of beings whom they called the Imanujela, which means "the Lords who have come". And some tribes in West Africa, such as a Bambara people, also say the same thing. They say that they came from the sky, many, many generations ago, a race of highly advanced and fearsome creatures which looked like men, and they call them Zishwezi. The word Zishwezi means the dival or the glidal-creatures that can glide down from the sky or glide through water. Everybody, sir, has heard about the Dogon people in Western Africa who all say that they were given culture by the normal beings, but they are not the Dogon people are but ONE of many, many peoples in Africa who claim that their tribe or their king were first founded by the supernatural race of creatures that came from the sky.

Are you still with me, sir?

Martin: Oh yes, very much so. Please continue.

Credo Mutwa: Sir, I can go on and on, but let me bring you to my people, the Zulu people of South Africa.

Martin: Please.

Credo Mutwa: The Zulu people, who are famous as a warrior people, the people to whom King Shaka Zulu, of the last century, belonged. When you ask a South African White anthropologist what the name of Zulu means, he will say it means “the sky” (laughter), and therefore the Zulu call themselves “people of the sky”. That, sir, is non-sense. In the Zulu language, our name for the sky, the blue sky, is sibakabaka. Our name for inter-planetary space, however, is izulu and the weduzulu, which means “inter-planetary space, the dark sky that you see with stars in it every night”, also has to do with traveling, sir. The Zulu word for traveling at random, like a nomad or a gypsy, is izula.

Now, you can see that the Zulu people in South Africa were aware of the fact that you can travel through space-not through the sky like a bird - but you can travel through space, and the Zulus claim that many, many thousands of years ago there arrived, out of the skies, a race of people who were like lizards, people who could change shape at will. And people who married their daughters to a walking (extraterrestrial), and produced a power race of Kings and tribal Chiefs, there are hundreds of fairy-tales, sir, in which a lizard female assumes the identity of a human princess and poses as her, and gets married to a Zulu Prince.

Every school child in South Africa, sir, knows about the story of a princess called Khombecansini. Khombecansini was to have married a handsome Prince called Kakaka, a name which means “the enlightened one”. Now, one day while Khombecansini was gathering firewood in the bush, she met a creature called an Imbulu. And this Imbulu was a lizard which has the body and the limbs of a human being, but a long tail. And this lizard spoke to Princess Khombecansini, “Oh, how beautiful you are, girl, I wish I could be like you. I wish I could look like you. Can I come close to you?” said the Imbulu lizard woman to the princess.

And the princess said, “Yes, you can.”

And as the lizard, which was a taller one, came close to the girl, she spat into the girl’s eyes and she began to change. That is, the lizard suddenly changed into a human shape and this lizard began to look more and more and more and more like the girl, with the exception of her long, pointed tail. And then, with her sudden burst of violence, the lizard woman sealed the princess and removed all her bangles and her beads and her wedding skirt off her, and she put them on. Thus, the lizard became the princess.

Now there were two identical women in the bush, the shape-shifted lizard woman and the original woman. And the lizard woman said to the original woman, “Now you are my slave. Now you are going to accompany me to the marriage. I will be you and you will be my slave, come-on!” She took a stick and started beating up the poor princess. And then she went, accompanied by other girls who were bride's maids, according to Zulu custom, and she arrived at Prince Kakaka's village. But, before they reached the village she had to do something about her tail, that is, the shape-shifting woman had, somehow, to hide the tail. So, she forced the princess to weave a net out of fiber and she tucked the tail in and she tied it tight to herself. She now looked like a Zulu woman with attractive, very big buttocks, when seen from outside.

And then, when she arrived and she became the wife of the prince, a strange thing started happening in the village. All of the milk started disappearing because each night the shape-shifting princess, the false princess, used to release her tail, which used to suck in all of the sour milk through a hole at the tip of the tail. And the mother-in-law said, "What is this? Why is the milk disappearing?" Then, she said, "No, I see, there is an Imbulu amongst us."

The mother-in-law, who was a clever old lady, said, "A hole must be dug in the front of the village and it must be filled with milk." And this was done. And then, all of the girls who had come with the false princess were told to jump over this hole. One after the other one, they jumped. And when the shape-shifter was forced, at spear-point, to jump as well, as she jumped her long tail burst out of the net under her skirt and started slurping the milk through the hole, and the warriors killed the shape-shifter. And thus, the real Princess Khombecansini became the wife of the king-of King Kakaka.

Now, sir, this story has got many versions in it. Throughout South Africa, amongst many tribes, you'll find stories of these amazing creatures who are capable of changing from reptile to human being, and from reptile to any other animal of their choice. And these creatures, sir, do really exist. No matter where you go throughout Southern, Eastern, Western, and Central Africa, you'll find that the description of these creatures is the same. Even amongst tribes which never, throughout their long history, had contact with each other at all.

So, there ARE such creatures. Where they come from, I will never claim to know, sir. But they are associated with certain stars in the sky, and one of these stars is a large group of stars which is part of the Milky Way, which our people call Ingiyab, which means "The Great Serpent". And there is a red star, a redish star, near the tip of this huge rim of stars which our people call Isonkanyamba.

Now, this star called Isonkanyamba, I managed to find its English name. It is the star called Alpha Centauri, in English. Now, this, sir, is something that is worth investigating. Why is it that well over 500 tribes in parts of Africa which I've visited in the last 40 or 50 years or so, all of them describe similar creatures?

It is said that these creatures feed on us human beings; that they, at one time, challenged God Himself to war, because they wanted full control of the universe. And God fought a terrible battle against them and He defeated them, injured them, and forced them to hide in cities underground. They hide in deep cavities underground, because they are always feeling cold. In these cavities, we are told, there are huge fires which are kept going by slaves, human, zombie-like slaves. And, it is further said that these Zuswazi, these Imbulu, or whatever you choose to call them, are not capable of eating solid food. They either eat human blood, or they eat that power, the energy that is generated when human beings, on the surface of the Earth, are fighting and killing each other in large numbers. I met people who have fled from the early Masaki in Rwanda, from years ago, and these people were horrified by what was happening in their country. They said that the slaughter of the Hutus by the Watusi, and the Watusi by the Hutus, is actually feeding the Imanujela, monsters. Because the Imanujela like to inhale the energy that is generated by masses of people being terrified or being killed by other people.

Are you still with me, sir?

Martin: Yes, I'm completely with you.

Credo Mutwa: Now, let me point out an interesting thing, sir. If you study the languages of all African nations, you find within the languages of our people words which are similar to Oriental, Middle-Eastern, and even Native American words. And the word Imanujela means "the Lord who came". A word that anyone can discover in Rwanda, amongst the Rwandan Hutu and Watusi people, is very similar to the Hebrew word Immanuel, which means "the Lord is with us". Imanujela, "the ones who came, the Lords who are here". Our people believe, sir, that we, the people of this Earth, are not masters of our own lives, really, although we are made to think that we are. Our people say, that is, Black people of all tribes, all of the initiated ones, all of the shamans everywhere in Africa, when they get to trust you and share their deepest secrets with you, they say that [with] the Imanujela, there is Imbulu. And there is another name by which these creatures are known. This name is Chitauli.

Now, the word Chitauli means “the dictators, the ones who tell us the law”. In other words, “they who tell us, secretly, what we are to do”. Now, it is said that these Chitauli did a number of things to us when they came to this planet.

Please forgive me, but I must share this story with you. It is one of the strangest stories that you find everywhere in Africa in shamanic secret societies and other places where the remnant of our ancient knowledge and wisdom are still preserved. It is that, originally, the Earth was covered by a very thick blanket of fog or mist. That people could not actually see the Sun in the sky, except as a nimble of light. And they also saw the Moon at night as a gentle claw of light in the sky, because there was this heavy mist. And the rain was always falling in a steady drizzle. There was no thunder, however. There were no storms.

The world was thickly covered with great forests, great jungles, and people lived in peace on Earth at that time. People were happy and it is said, at that time, we human beings did not have the power of speech. We only made funny sounds like happy monkeys and baboons, but we did not have speech as we now have it. And in those centuries, people spoke to each other through their mind.

A man could call his wife thinking about her, thinking about the shape of her face, the smell of her body, and the feel of hair as a woman. That a hunter would go out into the bush and call out for animals to come, and the animals would select one of their number which was old and tired, and this animal would offer itself to the hunter so that he may kill it quickly and take it as meat to his cave.

There was no violence against animals. There was no violence against Nature by human beings at that time. Man used to ask for food from Nature. He used to come to a tree and think about fruit, and the tree would allow some of its fruit to fall to the ground, and man would take it.

And then it is said, however, that when the Chitauli came to Earth, they arrived in terrible vessels which flew through the air, vessels which were shaped like great bowls and which made a terrible noise and a terrible fire in the sky. And the Chitauli told human beings, whom they gathered together by force with whips of lightning, that they were great gods from the sky and that from now on they would receive a number of great gifts from the god. These so-called gods, who were like human beings, but very tall, with a long tail, and with terrible burning eyes, some of them had two eyes-yellow, bright eyes-some had three eyes, the red, round eye being in the center of their forehead. These creatures then took away the great powers that human beings had:

- the power of speaking through the mind only
- the power of moving objects with their mind only
- the power of seeing into the future and into their past
- the power to travel, spiritually, to different worlds

All of these great powers the Chitauli took away from human beings and they gave human beings a new power, now, the power of speech. But, human beings found, to their horror, that the power of speech divided human beings, instead of uniting them, because the Chitauli cunningly created different languages, and they caused a great quarrel between people.

Also, the Chitauli did something which has never been done before: they gave human beings people to rule over them, and they said, “These are your kings, these are your chiefs. They have our blood in them. They are our children, and you must listen to these people because they will speak on our behalf. If you don’t, we are going to punish you very terribly.” Before the coming of the Chitauli, before the coming of the Imbulu creatures, human beings were spiritually one. But when the Chitauli came, human beings became divided, both spiritually as well as by language. And then, human beings were given strange new feelings by the Chitauli. Human beings started to feel unsafe, and so they started making villages with very strong fences of wood around them. Human beings started becoming country makers. In other words, they started creating tribes and tribe lands, which had borders, which they defended against any possible enemy. Human beings became ambitious and greedy and they wanted to acquire wealth in the form of cattle, and sea shells.

And, another thing the Chitauli forced human beings to do, they forced human beings to mine into the Earth. The Chitauli activated human women and made them to discover minerals and metals of certain types. Women discovered copper; women discovered gold; women discovered silver. And, eventually, they were guided by the Chitauli to alloy these metals and to create new metals which had never existed in Nature before, metals such as bronze and brass and others.

Now, the Chitauli, further, removed the sacred rain-bringing mist from the sky and for the first time since creation, human beings looked up and saw stars, and the Chitauli told human beings that they have been wrong in believing that God dwelt under the Earth. “From now on,” the Chitauli told people of this Earth, “the people of Earth must believe that God is in Heaven and they must do things here on Earth which would please this God who is in Heaven.”

You see, originally, human beings had believed that God was underground, that she was a very great mother who dwelt under the Earth because they saw all the green things growing from under the Earth-the grass came from below ground, the trees grew from below ground, and the people had believed, therefore, that the dead people who died go underground. But when the Chitauli turned humans' eyes towards the sky, people started believing, now, that God is in the sky and that those who die from this Earth don't go underground, but go up into the sky.

And to this day, sir, throughout Africa wherever you go as an investigator, you will find this amazing - these two amazing ideas which conflict with each other. Many African tribes believe in what is called Midzimu or Badimo. Now, the word Midzimu or Badimo means "them who are in the sky". But, in Zulu-land, amongst my people, you find this amazing schism going hand-in-hand. There are Zulus who believe that the dead ones are the Abapansi, which means "the ones who are below, who are under the Earth". Then there is another idea which says Abapezulu. The word Abapezulu means "those who are above", and the word Abapansi, which is the oldest name for the spirits of the dead, means "they who are under the Earth". So, even today, sir, all over Africa amongst hundreds of tribes, you find this strange double-belief that the dead go into the sky, and side-by-side with the belief that the dead die and go under the Earth. This belief that the dead die and go under the Earth is said to date to the days when our people believed that God was a woman, the great Cosmic Mother. And, it is contrasted by the Abapezulu belief that God is a man who dwells in the sky.

Now, sir, another thing that the Chitauli told our people, it is said, is that we human beings are here on Earth to change the Earth and to make it suitable for "God" to come down one day and dwell in it. And it is said that they who work to change this Earth and make it safe for the serpent god, the Chitauli, to come and dwell in it, will be rewarded with great power and with great wealth.

Sir, as I have watched over many years of study, over many years of initiation of the mysteries of African shamanism, wisdom, and knowledge, I have found myself wondering why we human beings are actually destroying the Earth on which we live. We are doing something which is only done by one other species of animal, namely, the African elephant, which utterly destroys every tree in the place in which it dwells.

We human beings are doing exactly this. And wherever you go in Africa, where once there were great ancient civilizations, you find desert. For example, there is the Kalahari desert in South Africa, and under the sands of that desert, I have found the ruins of ancient cities, which means that human beings turned this stretch of land, which was once green and fertile, into a desert. And, in days when I was with explorers and safari people in the Sahara regions of Africa, I also found evidence of unbelievably ancient human habitation in places where there is nothing now but angry rock and whispering sand.

In other words, the Sahara Desert was once a fertile country and was turned into a desert by human beings. Why? I must ask myself, again and again, why are human beings being driven by insecurity, greed, and lust of power to turn the Earth into a desert in which, ultimately, no human being would ever be able to live? Why?

Although we are all aware of the terrible dangers that this will bring about, why are we cutting huge areas of jungle in Africa? Why are we on Earth carrying out the instructions which the Chitauli programmed into us? Although my mind refuses to accept this, the answer is a terrible yes, yes, yes.

Amongst the many people of wisdom who honor me with their friendship, is a man of great knowledge who lives in Israel, Dr. [Zecharia] Sitchin. According to the ancient books which were written by the people of Sumeria, out of clay, gods came out of the sky and forced human beings to work for them, to mine gold for them. This story is confirmed by African legends throughout Africa, that gods came out of the sky and made us into their slaves, and they made us into slaves in such a way that we would never realize that we are slaves.

One other thing that our people say is that the Chitauli prey upon us like vultures. They raise some of us, they fill some of us with great anger and great ambition, and they make these people they've raised into great warriors who make terrible war. But, in the end, the Chitauli do not allow these great leaders, these great war chiefs and kings, to die peacefully. The warrior chief is used to make as much war as possible, to kill as many of his people, and those he calls enemies, as possible, and then, in the end, the warrior chief dies a terrible death, with his blood being spilled by others.

And this phenomenon I have seen in my people's history, again and again. Our great King Shaka Zulu, he fought over 200 great wars during the reign of some 30-something years. And then, he was slaughtered and he died a violent death. He died a broken man who, because of the death of his mother, had no longer the power to win any more battles.

And, before Shaka Zulu, there was another king who trained Shaka to become the great king that he was. That king's name was Dingiswayo. Dingiswayo had fought great wars trying to unite the Zulu people into one great tribe. He had seen the White people of the Cape and he thought that, by uniting his people into one huge nation, he would be able to repel the threat to his people which the White people posed. But, what happened was, after winning many battles of uniting many tribes, King Dingiswayo suddenly became stricken by an eye disease which made him almost blind. And he hid this secret that he could no longer see. But, that terrible secret was discovered by a woman, a queen of another tribe, called Ntombazi. Ntombazi took a battle ax and beheaded Dingiswayo with one blow, after she had lured him into her hut and given him food and beer to drink.

There is also a similar phenomenon with great White leaders: Napoleon, in Europe, who died a miserable death on his lonely island in the Atlantic Ocean; Hitler, also in Europe, who died a terrible death by putting the gun in the mouth and killing himself, we are told; Attila the Hun, who was killed by a woman, and many other great leaders who came to a sticky end after giving as much death and misery to as many people as they could.

King Shaka was stabbed to death by his half-brother, who used on him the same type of spear that he had designed to kill people as quickly as possible. And, Julius Caesar also met a similar fate after he, like our Shaka Zulu, had conquered many nations.

Always the warrior hero dies a death that he, really, should not die. King Arthur, in England, was killed by his own son, Mordred after a long and courageous reign. I could go on and on and on.

Now, all these things, if you bring them together, they show that whether people laugh at this or not, whether people scoff at this or not, there is a certain power that is guiding we human beings toward the dark river of self-destruction. And the sooner many of us become aware of this, the better, perhaps, we might be able to deal with it.

Martin: Do you believe that these beings are around the world equally, or are they primarily focused in Africa?

Credo Mutwa: Sir, I believe that these creatures are everywhere on Earth, and with respect, sir, although I hate talking about myself so much, I am a person who has traveled to many parts of the world. I have been to your country, the United States, sir. I have been to Australia. I have been to Japan, amongst other countries.

And no matter where I have gone, sir, I have found people telling me about creatures like this. For example, in 1997, I visited Australia, sir, and I traveled a lot to try and find the Black people of Australia, the Aborigine. And when I did find them, they told me a number of things that astonished me very, very much. The same things that I'd found in Japan, I found in Taiwan. Everywhere where there are still shaman and traditional healers, you find these amazing stories.

Now, let me tell you, sir, what I found in Australia alone. This, that the Australian Aborigine people, who call themselves Coorie, which means “our people”: The Coorie people of Australia believe in a great creating god called Byamie, sir. A Coorie shaman, in fact, several of them, drew me pictures of this Byamie, and one of them showed me a rock painting representing this strange creator god who came out of the stars. And when they placed their drawing in front of me, what they showed was a Chitauli. I recognized it from my African initiation. It had a large head. It had large eyes, which were stressed by the artist. It had no mouth, and it had long arms and incredibly long legs. Sir, this was a typical depiction of a Chitauli which I knew from my own people in Africa.

I asked myself “Why?” Here I am in a country many thousands of miles away from Africa, and here I am seeing a being known as the Biamai or Bimi, who is a creature with which I, the African, am familiar.

Amongst the Native American people, sir, I found, for example, amongst certain tribes in America, tribes such as the Hopi people, and those people who stay in those buildings called a pueblo, I found that these people-they have got what are called Katchina creatures, where people wear masks and disguise themselves as certain creatures. And some of these Katchinas are very, very tall, with a huge round head.

Exactly as we have in Africa, I found similar creatures in America. In Africa we call these creatures Egwugwu, or, we call them by another name, called Chinyawu. The Katchina of the Native American people, and the Chinyawu of our people, are identical beings. Now, why should this be? When were American Native people and Africans in contact? When? This is one of the greatest mysteries of all time, sir. It is one of many things that I found throughout the world which left me utterly amazed.

There ARE such creatures, and the sooner skeptics amongst us face up to this fact, the better it shall be. Why is human-kind not progressing? Why are we running around in a great circle of self-destruction and mutual-destruction?

People are basically good; I believe this. People don’t want to start wars. People don’t want to destroy the world in which they stay, but there are creatures, or there is power that is driving we human beings toward self-annihilation. And the sooner we recognize this, the better.

Just now, I live in Africa. Here are my people. Here is my home. But I see Africa being destroyed in wars that make no sense whatsoever to me as an African. I look at India which, like Africa, suffered the scourge of colonialism by the French, the English, and other European powers. But India, through her independence as a country, has achieved the things which we, Africa, have failed to achieve. Why?

India has exploded the atomic bomb and is today one of the feared nations of this world. India has launched satellites into orbit. India, although she has the same problems as Africa has - a burgeoning population, religion as well as tribal strife - although India has got an incredibly poor section of her population, as well as an incredibly rich one, she has achieved things that Africa has failed to achieve.

Now, I ask myself "Why? Why?" Because India was established by people from Africa, and I don't think, sir, as the Black races about this. This is a fact that, thousands of years ago, people from Africa laid the foundation of the greatest civilization of India, as well as other countries in Southeast Asia. There is overwhelming archeological evidence of this. But, why is Africa drowning in war, in disease, and in hunger? Why?

Many times, sir, I sit in my hut and I cry when I see diseases like AIDS destroying us; when I see senseless wars destroying those countries in Africa which had thrived for thousands of years.

Say, Ethiopia is a country that has been free for thousands of years. Ethiopia was once the school of all of Africa. Nigeria was once a great country with a long tradition of self-government - long, long before the White man came to Africa. But today, all of these countries and many others are being destroyed.

Today, sir, there are parts of Africa which have been totally depopulated by war and by the disease called AIDS, a disease which shows every sign of being a man-made disease. I ask myself, "Who or what is destroying Africa, and why?"

Because there are tribes in those villages I lived in, who assisted my search for knowledge, before the Second World War and after. But today these tribes no longer exist anymore. They are gone, dispersed, totally exterminated in senseless wars that gain the Black people nothing.

I am in South Africa now. Here I was born, and here I was to die. But I see my country falling apart like a rotting mango. South Africa was once a powerful country. She had a powerful army. She had huge industries, which were producing everything from locomotives to little radios. But today my country has become a drug-sodden, crime-ridden piece of rubbish. Why? A country doesn't get destroyed almost overnight, unless there are definite forces which are determined to obliterate it.

I recently saw, sir, the destruction of another country inside South Africa. The country is Lesotho. This country, Lesotho, is inhabited by some of the oldest and the wisest tribes in South Africa. Amongst them is a tribe called the Bakwama. The Bakwama people are so ancient that they actually describe to you a mysterious land of huge pointed mountains, a mysterious land ruled by a great god, who had the head of a human being and the body of the lion. [One immediately thinks of the Sphinx in Egypt.]

The Bakwama call this country Ntswama-tfatfi. This land that they name Ntswama-tfatfi means "the land of the Sun-hawk". The hawk is the bird of prey in Heaven-you know? Now, these Bakwama people did, in South Africa, know about the land of Egypt where they say their ancestors came from. And they call this mysterious land of the gods, "the land of the Sun-hawk, or the Sun-eagle", which is exactly how the Egyptians portrayed their country, sir. They portrayed it as "the land of Hor", the god Horus in Greece.

Now, when Princess Diana died, in 1997, I was one of the first Black people to suspect that Princess Diana had been murdered, and I will tell you why this thing happened, sir. Because, about a year or 8 months before Diana died, there died a king in Lesotho, King Moshoeshoe II. King Moshoeshoe II's death was detail-for-detail identical to Princess Diana's death.

Consider this please, all of you who might find my words incredible: Princess Diana died in a tunnel, but the king of Lesotho died in a ravine. He had gone far away to investigate a problem in his cattle ranch. It was found that he was overdue, and when the people went to search for him, they heard from various boys who were looking after the cattle in the Basotho-land mountains, that the boys had heard what sounded like a rifle shot, and when the men went to look where the rifle shot had sounded, they found the king's car off the road and deep in the ravine.

They went down their and they found that the king of Lesotho was in his car. He was strapped in a safety belt, but he had a terrible injury at the back of his head. And they found that the king's driver was dead at the steering wheel. But, the two men who were the king's bodyguards, who were riding in the king's vehicle in the seat directly behind the king, had escaped without a scratch. One of the men entered the car and pulled out the dying king. The king apologized to them for messing-up their hands with his blood, which was a tradition, that a dying king must thank the people who are trying to get him out of where he is. And he must apologize to them for putting them into trouble, because anyone who handles the sacred blood of the king is in spiritual trouble of some kind after that.

Then, when the king's car was brought out of the ravine, it was found that there was a hole, like a bullet hole, in one of the tires of the car. And that car's tire was mysteriously removed, afterwards, when the king's car was stored not in a safe place, but in a yard outside where anybody could get at

it. And, when an autopsy was conducted on the body of the driver of the king's car, it was found that the man had been so drunk as to not have been able to drive the car at all. And third, the man who had driven the king's car and who died at the wheel had not been the man who usually drives the king's car.

Now, sir, do you see this mystery now? The death of the Lesotho king matched that of Princess Diana, which was to follow it. In many other amazing details than I have detailed now, and so the nation of Lesotho was reduced to a wretch after the king's death, when rioting took place as a result of a general election which provisional party members prospected and controlled.

Today Lesotho is an economically moribund nation. And Lesotho is a country which was the place of a strange experiment - an experiment which consisted of the building of a huge dam, whose purpose was to supply South Africa, and not Lesotho, with large quantities of water. And we have recently heard ugly rumors emanating from that country, that somebody was bribed to facilitate the building of this huge dam where the water of a small nation is being used to supply, to supplement the water supplies of a highly industrialized nation.

There are many strange things, sir, which have taken place in South Africa, and are taking place, as well as in other parts of Africa, which make no sense to me as an African. There are wars which take place in Africa, where after an African country has gained its independence from the colonial power, then a force of rebels pick up weapons against that country's government, but instead of the rebels fighting the government to the bitter end, what happens again and again is that the rebel forces split into various groups which end up fighting not only the government in power, but also each other. And the result is that, in several African countries, the country is so destroyed that, no matter which party wins, the people lose. The United Nations are caused to be called in, in order to create some semblance of peace. In other words, Africans have now started fighting wars which bring about not victory, but the destruction of themselves, as well as their people.

I would like to draw your attention, sir, to the senseless tide which is still raging in the Sudan, as well as other parts of Africa. I would like to draw your attention, sir, to the longest and most terrible civil war which is destroying the southern parts of the Sudan. I would like to draw your attention, and that of your readers, sir, to the terrible war which is destroying Angola. And one part of the world, to the East of Southern Africa, has been so raped by many years of war that there are now places where you don't even hear a bird-thing. All living forms of life have been wiped-out in that place. Now, why?

And then, I have found that these countries that are being destroyed by senseless wars which are totally out of character for us Africans, and I speak as an African, are those countries which, had they been left alone, could have supplied the whole of Africa with food, with water, and with valuable minerals. I am told, sir, that under the surface of Angola, under the plains of Angola, are deposits of coal which are without equal in this world. I am further told that in parts of Angola there are deposits of oil which are second only to those reserves of oil which are in the Middle East.

The Sudan is a country which I visited several times during, and even after, the Second World War. In the Sudan there was so much food that you received free food from the villagers, as you traveled through the Sudan. Today, southern Sudan is a starvation-torn, battle of rage hellhole where children die of diarrhea in the bush while the vultures and buzzards wait on the branches of trees to feast. Africa is being systematically and deliberately destroyed by a power of such relentlessness that it is continuing the destruction even now. But, this power is getting desperate.

Martin: Excuse me. Did you say there was coal in Angola or gold?

Credo Mutwa: Coal, sir, coal. There are diamonds in Angola, sir. And I have learned from reliable people that there is more oil under Angola, in certain places, than there is in certain parts of the Middle East.

Is this what Africa is being destroyed for? Is this what our nations are being slaughtered for - for coal under the surface, for diamonds? If so, who is this intelligence that is behind this? Are people less valuable than minerals? Are people less valuable than oil?

Because, sir, genocide, worse than anything that Hitler ever committed upon the Jewish people, is taking place in Africa NOW, and the people of America don't seem to care a damn. Why? We are the best friends that the United States has got. We are the best people. We buy American products. Our children want to look like American children. Our kids wear jeans, sir, and they even speak with American accents, because you American people are our role model. Why are you allowing us to be slaughtered? Why? Why?

Not only are we being killed by war, sir, we are being killed by drugs. There were no drugs in South Africa during the days of the apartheid government. Now, under our democratic government, our country has become one drug-sodden cess pit. Why?

Today, sir, and I speak as a traditional shaman, one of my purposes is to try and help people with a drug problem. Sir, I can help a young African who is abusing marijuana or hashish. I can help a young African who is dependent upon Dakwa. But, sir, I am useless, my skills are rubbish and I fail again - and so do many like me - to help young Black people who are addicted to a new type of drug which is called "crack". It is a hard-looking drug. It's like hardened chocolate when you see it, and this thing is so addictive that no shaman can help a young victim of this drug.

I am asking the people of the United States of America, I am asking my Black brothers and my Black sisters over there, why are you allowing the country which is your mother to be exterminated?

I don't care what skeptics say, sir. Please forgive me when I really get hot under the collar. I don't care what skeptics say, but there IS a force destroying Africa and I am not buying the nonsense that it is the bankers of the IMF and other big banks. You don't kill the goose that gives you the golden egg, so why would the bankers want to destroy Africa? There is another force behind these people, a terrible, alien force, which does things behind the scenes which - and the sooner we recognize this, the better - sir, it is very common for human beings who are in trouble to blame forces other than those inside themselves. But, I have studied the situation in Africa since the end of the Second World War, and before, and I have evidence that points to an alien force at work in Africa. What, who is wiping out Africa's oldest tribes? Please, sir, let me tell you a thing that cuts my soul. May I please?

Martin: Please, continue.

Credo Mutwa: Please, I'm sorry to talk so much. Please forgive me. I belong to the Zulu nation, a nation of warriors, a nation of wise people. My people, sir, have never been studied by White anthropologists thoroughly, but the Zulu people knew things that, if I were to share with your readers, they would be amazed.

Let me show you this. The Zulu people KNEW, amongst many things, that it is the Earth which moves around the Sun, and not the other way around. They said, to explain this thing to the initiated, that the Earth is a feminine creature and the Sun is a male creature, and, therefore, the Earth is the mobile one who dances around the Sun - the beautiful princess who dances around the fiery king who is the Sun. Our people knew that the Earth was a sphere. Our people knew about germs and their function. When the White man came to Africa, where did this incredible knowledge come from? I do not know. The people of America and the people of Europe say that it was Albert Einstein who came out with the idea that time and space are one and the same thing. My answer to that is, "No!"

My people, the Zulus, knew that space and time was one thing. In the language of the Zulu, one of the names for space is umkati. And the Zulu name for time is isikati. Now, our people knew that space and time were one and the same thing, hundreds of years before Einstein's birth.

And furthermore, our people believed, like the Dogon people, that there are 24 planets in our part of space which are inhabited by intelligent creatures of various states. And, this knowledge has never been recorded in any book, and I and my aunt are the only surviving high sanusi [shaman] in South Africa who are the keepers of this knowledge. My aunt is still alive. She is about 90-something years old, and I am now close to dead, suffering from diabetes - a terrible killer of African people nowadays.

And, what I am trying to tell you is that, although my people had this tremendous knowledge, which has never been written down in any book, the

Zulu people today, a huge percentage of them, are victims of HIV or outright AIDS. And it has been calculated, sir, in the next 50 years, fully three-fourths of the Zulu people in Natal are going to die. And I am the keeper of sacred objects which I inherited from my grandfather. I am, from my mother's side, a direct descendant of the last true Zulu king, Dingame. And, my duty should be to protect my people from anything that threatens their existence. Look, please, sir. Anyone who studies humanity with love, with understanding, and with care, recognizes the fact that there is a shining God which is struggling to be born within each and every one of us. We are trying to fight back, although many of us are not yet aware of this. We are developing an attitude of wanting to protect our planet, no matter who or what we are. There are chiefs in Africa who fine you very heavily if they see you destroying a tree unnecessarily. This thing was common in the past, but it disappeared with the coming of the White people; but now it has come back again. Man is becoming, is struggling to become a more advanced, more caring being, and the aliens are not going to take this lying down. They are going to cause us to kill each other, again. And I am worried about what is going to happen. Sir, I can show you many strange things that African people did to protect themselves against the Grey aliens. The things that our people did were not the result of superstition. They were the result of terrible personal experience. One day I hope to share with you, sir, the story of how I got "taken", we say. We believe, sir, that the Mantindane ("the tormentor"), the Greys, are really servants of the Chitauli. And that they, contrary to what White people think - White people think a wrong thing, sir, many - that the Mantindane are experimenting with us. They are NOT. I repeat, they are not. Anyone who has been through the hells of these beings will tell you that there is nothing experimental in what they do. There is a cold, cold, cold-blooded resolve, and they are not doing what they do to us for themselves, they are doing what they do to us for greater creatures than they are. Please, sir, can you give me a little time to share with you, briefly, what happened to me?

Martin: Oh yes, absolutely, please. We have all the time you need.

Credo Mutwa: Sir, it was an ordinary day, like any other day. It was a beautiful day in the eastern mountains of Zimbabwe, which are called Inyangani. These are mountains to the East of Zimbabwe.

Now, I had been instructed by my teacher to go and find a special herb which we were going to use in the healing of a certain initiate who was badly ill. And my teacher, a woman called Mrs. Moyo, was Ndebele, from Zimbabwe, once known as Rhodesia.

I was looking for this herb, and I was not thinking about anything, and I had no belief whatsoever in these creatures. I had never encountered them before, and although we African people believe in many things, I was mighty skeptical, even about certain entities that we believed in at that time, because I had never encountered anything like that before.

And all of a sudden, sir, I noticed that the temperature around me had dropped, although it was a very hot African day. I suddenly noticed that it was now cold and there was, what appeared to be, a bright blue mist swirling all around me, getting between me and the eastern landscape. I remember wondering, stupidly, what this thing meant, because I had just begun to dig one of the herbs I had found.

Suddenly, I found myself in a very strange place, a place that looked like a tunnel lined with metal. I had worked in mines before, and where I found myself appeared to be a mine tunnel which was lined with silver-greyish metal.

I was lying on what appeared to be a very heavy and very large working bench or a working table, sir. But yet, I was not chained to the table. I was just lying there and my trousers were missing, and so were the heavy boots that I always wore when I was out in the bush. And all of a sudden, in this strange, tunnel-like room, I saw what appeared to be dull, heady-looking, grey, dull-like creatures which were moving toward me.

There were lights in this place, but not lights as we know them. They seemed to be patches of glowing stuff. And there was something above the far entrance which looked like writing, that writing against the silver-grey surface, and these creatures were coming at me but I was hypnotized, just as if the witchcraft had been put upon my head.

But I watched the creatures as they were coming towards me. I didn't know what they were. I was frightened, but I couldn't move my arms or my legs. I just lay there like a goat on a sacrificial altar. And when the creatures came towards me, I felt fear inside me. They were short creatures, about the size of African Pigmy. They have very large heads, very thin arms, and very thin legs.

I noticed, sir, because I am an artist, a painter, that these creatures were built all wrong from an artist's point of view. Their limbs were too long for their body, and their necks were very thin, and their heads were almost as large as full-grown watermelons. They had strange eyes, which looked like goggles of some kind. They had no noses, as we have, only small holes on either side of the raised area between their eyes. Their mouth had no lips, only thin cuts as if made by a razor.

And while I was looking at these creatures, sir, in amazed fascination, I felt something close to my head, about my head. And when I looked up, there was another creature, a slightly bigger one than the other, and it was standing above my head and was looking down at me.

I looked up into its eyes and I was totally hypnotized, and you know, I was spellbound. I looked into the thing's eyes and I noticed that the creature wanted me to keep looking into his eyes. I looked and saw that, through these covers over their eyes, I could see the creature's real eyes behind this black, goggle-like cover. Its eyes were round, with straight pupils, like those of a cat. And the thing was not moving its head. It was breathing; I could see that. I could see little nostrils moving, closing and shutting, but sir, if anybody says to me that I smelled like that creature, really, I would konk him one on the face.

Martin: (Laughter)

Credo Mutwa: The creature smelled like nobody's business. It had a strange smell, a throat-tightening, chemical smell, which smelled like rotten eggs, and also like hot copper [sulfur], a very strong smell.

And the creature saw me looking at it, and it looked down at me and, all of a sudden, I felt a terrible, awful pain on my left thigh, as if a sword had been driven into my left thigh. I screamed in pain, horrible, calling out for my mother, and the creature placed its hand over my mouth. You know, sir, it was like-if you want to know how that felt, please sir, take the leg of a chicken, a live chicken, and place it against your lips. That was how the creature's hand felt upon my mouth.

It had thin, long fingers, which had more joints than my human fingers have. And the thumb was in the wrong place. Each one of the fingers ended in a black claw, almost like certain African birds. The thing was telling me to be quiet. And how long the pain went on, sir, I don't know. I screamed and I screamed and I screamed, again.

And then, all of a sudden, something was pulled out of my flesh, and I looked down and saw my thigh covered with blood, and I saw that one of the creatures - there were four of them, other than the one standing over my head - they wore tight fitting overalls, which were silvery-grey in color, and their flesh resembled the flesh of certain types of fish that we find in the sea off South Africa. And the creature standing above my head appeared to be a female. It was somehow different than the others. It was taller, bigger, although it didn't have breasts like a woman, it appeared to be feminine. And the others appeared to be afraid of it, I don't know how I can describe this.

And then, while this terrible thing was going on, another of the creatures came up to me - it walked sideways, in a slightly jerking way, as if it was drunk - it walked up along the table, to my right side, and it stood next to the one standing above my head. And before I knew what was happening, this creature stuck something that was like a small, silver, ball-point pen with a cable at one end, it pushed this thing, coldly, into my right nostril.

Sir, the pain was out of this world. Blood splattered all over. I choked and tried to scream, but the blood got into my throat. It was a nightmare. Then, it pulled the thing out and I tried to fight and sit up.

The pain was terrible, but the other thing above my head placed its hand upon my forehead and kept me down with very little force. I was choking and trying to spit out the blood, and then I managed to turn my head to the right to spit out the blood, which I did, and then what the creatures did to me, sir, I don't know.

All I do know is that the pain went away, and in place of the pain, strange visions flooded my head, visions of cities, some of which I recognized from my travels - but, cities which were half-destroyed, the buildings having their tops blown away, with windows like empty eye-sockets in a human skull. I saw these visions again and again. All the buildings that I saw were half-drowned in a reddish, muddish water.

It was as if there had been a flood and the buildings were sticking up out of this great flood, partly destroyed by a disaster of some kind, and it was a terrible sight. And then, before I knew it, one of the creatures, the one standing next to my feet, drove something into my organ of manhood, but here there was no pain, just a violent irritation, as if I was making love to something or someone.

And then, when the creature withdrew the thing, which was like a small, black tube which it had forced into my organ of manhood, I did something which produced a strange result, and I did not do it intentionally. I think it was my bladder opened, and I urinated straight into the chest of the creature which had pulled the thing out of my organ.

And if I had shot the creature, it would never have reacted as it did. It jerked away and nearly fell, and then it recovered and staggered away like a drunken insect, and left the room. I don't know whether my urine did it; I don't know. But that is what happened.

Then, after a while, the other creatures went away, leaving me with a dull pain in my nostril, with blood on my thigh, and the table wet with urine. And the thing standing above my head had not moved. It just stood there with its right hand touching its left shoulder, in a strangely beautiful and feminine way. It stood there looking at me. There was no expression in its face. I never saw any of the creatures talk or make any sound of any kind. All I do know is that they appeared to be mute.

And then, out of somewhere there arrived two other creatures, one of which was made entirely out of metal. Even in my worst nightmares, I still see this creature. It was tall. It was big. And the area in which we were was too small for it. It walked with a slight stoop, moving forward, and it was definitely not a living thing. It was a metal creature, a robot of some kind. And it came and it stood near my feet, its whole body clumsily bent, looking down at me. There was no mouth. There was no nose. There were just two bright eyes, which seemed to change color, and seemed to move somehow, like the crackling of an electrical device.

And then, behind this huge, bent creature, came a creature which surprised me. It was very, very, very, very swollen, sir, in appearance. It had pink skin. It had a blondish, very human body. It had very bright, blue, slanting eyes. It had hair which looked like nylon fiber of some kind. It had high cheekbones and an almost human mouth, with full lips and a small, pointed chin. The creature, sir, was definitely a female but like an artist and a painter, which I am, and also a sculptor, I noticed that the creature was totally out of proportion. It was wrong.

First, its breasts were thin and pointed, and set too high upon its chest, not where a normal woman's breasts would be. Its body was powerful, almost fat, but its legs were too short and its arms were too short in proportion to the rest of its body. And it came towards me, looked down at me, and before I knew what it was doing, somehow it mated with me. It was a horrible experience, sir, even worse than what had been done to me before. But even now, the trauma of that day had affected my life even now, exactly 40 years later.

And after that, when the creatures had gone, leaving only the one creature which had been standing about my head, the creature standing about my head shook me by the hair, it gripped me by the head and forced me to stand off the table and to get off the table. I did that, and such was the state that I was in, that I fell onto my knees and hands, onto the floor.

And I noticed that that floor was strange. It had moving patterns in it, which kept on changing and shifting-purple, red, and greenish patterns, on a metal-grey background. And the creature pulled me by the hair, again, forcing me to stand up, and it pushed me roughly and made me follow it.

Sir, it would take too long for me to describe what I saw in that strange place, as the creature pushed me, roughly, from room to room. Even now my mind can't grasp what it was that I saw. Amongst many things that I saw were huge cylindrical objects, made of what appeared to be glass of some kind. And in these object, cylinders, which reached from the roof to the floor of the place we were going through, was what appeared to be a sort of a greyish-pink liquid. And in this liquid I saw small editions of the alien creatures floating round and round, like disgusting little frogs, inside this liquid.

I couldn't understand what it was that I was being shown. But then, in the last room I was led through, I saw people, and other strange creatures, which, even now, my mind can't make head or sense out of, lying on the table. And I passed a White man, a real White man, who smelled like a human being, was smelling of sweat, urine, excrement, and fear. This White man was lying on a table like the one I had been lying on, and I looked into his eyes and he looked into mine as I went by.

And then I found myself out in the bush. I found that my trousers were missing. There was a terrible pain in my left thigh. There was a pain in my penis which was starting to swell, and when I tried to pass water, the pain was excruciating. I took off my shirt and I used it as a loin-cloth and I walked through the bush.

I first met a group of young Rhodesian Black people who guided me to my teacher's village. And when I arrived outside that village, I smelled so horribly that every dog in the village came yapping and snarling to tear me to pieces. And it was only my teacher and her other students and the villagers who saved me on that day. My teacher and the villagers were not at all surprised by what I had to tell them. They accepted it, sir. They said to me that what had happened to me had happened to many other people before, and that I was lucky to return alive, because many people have disappeared in that part of the land, never to be seen again - White people, Black people, and so on.

Sir, I'm cutting a very long story short. In the year following, 1960, I was delivering parcels in the city of Johannesburg. You see, I was working in a curio shop, when a White man shouted at me to stop. I assumed that the White man was a secret policeman who wanted to look into my identity documents. And when I tried to produce the documents, he told me, angrily, that he didn't want to see my stinking documents. Sir, he asked me this question: "Listen, where the hell have I seen you before? Who are you?"

I said, "I am nobody, sir; I am just a working man."

He said, "Don't bullshit me, man; who the hell are you? Where did I see you before?"

And then I looked at him. I recognized him - his long, straggly, golden-brown hair, his ridiculous mustache and beard. I remembered him - his blue eyes blood-shot and naked-terror, shining upon his eyes, and his skin as pale as that of a goat.

I said, "Meneer", which is the African's way. "Meneer - I saw you in Rhodesia in a certain place underground." And if I had hit that White man with my fist, he wouldn't have reacted the way he did, sir. He turned away and walked with a terrible expression, and he disappeared on the other side of the street.

Now, roughly, this is what happened to me, sir, but it is not a unique experience at all.

Since that time I met many, many, many people who have had the identical experience that I said, and most of them were traditional Black men and women who can neither read nor write. They were coming to me to seek my help as a shaman, but I was, myself, looking for somebody wiser than I to tell me what had happened to me, exactly.

Because, sir, when I get caught by the Mantindane, you become so traumatized, your life becomes so changed, you become so embarrassed and ashamed of yourself, you develop a self-hatred which you cannot understand, and there are subtle changes in your life which make no sense to you.

One: You develop a strange love for humankind. You want to shake everybody by the shoulders and say, "Hey, wake-up people; we are not alone. I know we are not alone!"

And, you develop a feeling that your life is no longer your own; and furthermore, you become compelled with a strange edge to move from place to place, to travel. You become worried about the future; you become worried about people.

And another thing, sir, which I hoped one day you would send people to me to see for their own self: you develop knowledge which doesn't belong to you. You develop an understanding of space, an understanding of time and creation which makes no sense to you as a human being - it is a state, after your terrible torture, after substances have been removed from you, some kind of exchange takes place where you suddenly know things that the Mantindane would know, which ordinary human beings do not know.

But, sir, I know that this sharing of God often happens even when for example, at one time, in 1966, in South Africa, sir, I was arrested and rather savagely interrogated by the security police. It was that time when every Black intellectual, no matter who he or she was, had a visit from these really nasty guys, who put you to torture, sometimes, who used to put electrical devices on you, and ask you questions, and so on.

Sometimes, when these "human beings" were torturing you, you often used to sense what they were thinking. Somehow, when you are being tortured by human beings, not by Mantindane only, there is a transference of thought. For example, when a particularly nasty secret policeman was coming to beat you, you KNEW what he was thinking, even before he burst into the room in which you were held. You knew that he was coming, and you knew exactly what he was thinking and what he intended to do to you.

So, this is why I say the strange things that flood my mind. And what flooded my mind on that day were visions from the mind of the Mantindane.

Since that time - I am a man of only very limited education - I found it hard to speak, let alone to write English. I take long to say things which people of better English would say in few words. But, my hands are capable of making things which nobody ever taught me.

I make engines, rocket engines that actually work. I make guns, of any type I wish, and all people who know me will tell you this and, Mr. David Icke, sir, might show you pictures of what I've done around my new home. I have made large robots out of scrap iron, and some of these robots are going to work. I don't know where I acquired this knowledge from. And since that terrible day, the visions I have seen since I was a child, and the ordinary impressions which I have as a shaman, have grown much more intense.

I don't know why, and I want to know the reason why. But I can tell you, sir, that these creatures, which people wrongly call aliens, are not aliens at all.

Over many years of looking into this thing, trying to understand it, I can tell you this: that the Mantindane, and the other kinds of alien beings that our people know about, are sexually compatible with human beings. The Mantindane are capable of impregnating African women.

And I have come across many cases of this during the last 30 years or so. For example, according to our culture, abortion is regarded as worse than murder. And if a tribal woman from a rural area in South Africa is found to be pregnant by some unknown person, and then her pregnancy disappears, that, sir, relative to that woman, accuses her of having committed abortion, and yet she denies this, of course.

And because of the fight that results between her and her relatives, the husband's relatives, then she challenges these people who are accusing her to take her to a sangoma; that is a person like myself. The sangoma will sometimes examine the woman and, if the sangoma finds that the woman had been pregnant, and had somehow had her fetus removed - a thing which, when it is done by the Mantindane, results in specific injuries to the woman which anyone with experience can recognize - then, the sangoma knows that the woman is telling the truth.

Also, the smell which clings to people who have been through the hands of the Mantindane, that meticulous man which is unforgettable, always clings to all women who have been impregnated by the Mantindane, no matter how much perfume or powder they try to use.

So, that is why many such cases land on the doorstep of my life. Sangomas bring such people to me in large numbers, because they think I am the best one to help in such problems.

So, in the last 40 years or so, I have received many women who have actually been impregnated by the Mantindane and their pregnancies mysteriously terminated, leaving the woman feeling defiled, feeling guilty, and rejected by her family. It becomes my duty to convince the family of the woman's innocence, to try and heal the terrible spiritual and mental, as well as physical-trauma that the woman has undergone, and to otherwise help her and her members of the family, and forget what happened.

No, sir; if these aliens are from a far away planet, why are they able to impregnate women? And why did that strange creature, which was naked, with red pubic hair, which climbed over me on that working table, why did it have an organ which, though slightly different from that of a normal woman, was still a recognizable female organ?

The creature's organ was in the wrong place. It was slightly more in the front, where that of normal woman is between the legs. But it was recognizable, and it looked like a female organ. It had hair like a woman's organ.

So, sir, I believe that these so-called aliens don't come from far away at all. I believe that they are here with us, and I believe that they need substances from us, just as some of us human beings use certain things from wild animals, such as monkey glands, for certain selfish purposes of our own.

I believe, sir, that we should study this dangerous phenomenon very, very, clearly and with objective minds.

Far too many people fall into the temptation of looking upon these "aliens" as supernatural creatures. They are just solid creatures, sir. They are like us; and, furthermore, I'm going to make a statement here which will come as a surprise: the Grey aliens, sir, are edible. Surprised?

Martin: Please continue.

Credo Mutwa: I said, sir, the Grey aliens are edible.

Martin: Yes, I heard that and I'm anxious to...

Credo Mutwa: Their flesh is protein, just as animal flesh on Earth is, but, anyone who ingests Grey alien flesh comes very, very close to death. I nearly did. You see, in Lesotho there is a mountain called Laribe; it is called the Crying Stone mountain. On several occasions, in the last 50 years or so, alien craft have crashed against this mountain.

And one last incident was reported in the newspapers not so long ago. An African who believes that these creatures are gods, when they find the corpse of a dead Grey alien, they take it, put it in a bag, and drag it into the bush, where they dismember it and ritually eat it. But some of them die as a result of ingesting that thing.

About a year before I had the experience from the Inyangani Mountains, I had been given, by a friend of mine in Lesotho, flesh from what he called a sky god. I was skeptical.

He gave me a small lump of grey, rather dry stuff, which he said was the flesh. And he and I and his wife ritually ate this thing, one night. After we had eaten this thing, sir, on the following day, exactly, our bodies erupted into a rash which was like nothing I had experienced in my life before.

Our bodies were so full of the rash and urticaria, it was as if we had small pox. We itched, the itching was horrible, especially under the arm-pits and between the legs, and the buttocks. Our tongues began to swell. We could not breathe. And for a number of days, my friend, his wife and I were totally helpless, secretly attended by initiates who were studying under my friend, who was a shaman.

I came very close to death. There was bleeding from nearly every orifice in our body. We passed blood, much blood when we went to the toilet. We could barely walk, barely breathe. And after about 4 or 5 days, the rash subsided, then the peeling of the skin took its place now. Our skins began to peel, in scales like that of a snake shedding its skin.

Sir, it was one of the most terrible experiences I had undergone. In fact, when I began to feel better, I think that my being abducted by the Mantindane was the direct result of my having ingested flesh from one of these creatures. I had not believed that what my friend was giving me was flesh from a creature. I assumed it was some kind of root or herb or whatever. But, afterwards, I recalled the taste of the thing. It had a coppery taste, and had the same type of smell that I was to encounter in 1959.

And, after the rash went down - while I was still peeling and we were smeared from head to foot with coconut oil by the initiates, every day - a strange change came over us, sir, which I am asking all people of knowledge who would read this in your country to try and explain to me. We went crazy, sir, utterly crazy.

We started laughing like real loony tunes. It was ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha, day after day-for the slightest things we started laughing our heads off, for hours, until you were nearly exhausted.

And then the laughing went away; and then a strange thing happened, a thing which my friend said was the goal which those who ate the flesh of a Mantindane wanted to achieve.

It was as if we had ingested a strange substance, a drug, a drug like no other on this Earth. Suddenly, our feelings were heightened.

When you drank water, it was as if you had drunk a wine of some kind. Water became as delicious as a man-made drink. Food began to taste amazingly. Every feeling was heightened, and it's indescribable - it was as if I was one with the very heart of the universe. I cannot describe it any other way.

And this feeling of amazing intensity of feeling lasted for over 2 months. When I listened to music, it was as if there was music behind the music, behind the music. When I painted pictures - which is what I do for a living - and when I was holding a particular color on the tip of my brush, it was as if there were other colors in that color. It was an indescribable thing, sir. Even now I cannot describe it. But let me now, sir, go to something else.

The Mantindane are not the only alien beings that we Africans have seen and know about, and have got stories to tell about.

Many, many, many centuries ago, before the first White-man came to Africa, we African people encountered a race of alien beings which looked exactly like the European White Man who were going to invade Africa in our future.

These alien creatures are tall. Some of them are rather well built, like athletes, and they have slightly slanting blue eyes and high cheek-bones. And they have got golden hair, and they look exactly like the Europeans of today, with one exception: their fingers are beautifully made, long and like those of musicians and artists.

Now, these creatures came to Africa out of the sky, in craft which looked like the boomerang of the Australian people. Now, when one of these craft comes down to land, it creates a whirlwind of dust, which makes a very large sound indeed, like that of a tornado. In the language of some African tribes, a whirlwind is zungar-uzungo.

Now, our people gave several names to these White-skinned aliens. They called them Wazungu, a word which loosely means "god" but literally means "people of the dust-devil or the whirlwind".

And, our people were familiar with these Wazungu from the start. They saw them, and they saw that some-in fact, many-of these Wazungu carry what appears to be a sphere made of crystal or glass, a sphere which they always playfully bounce like a ball in their hands. And when a force of warriors tries to capture a Wazungu, the Wazungu throws this ball into the air, catches it in his hands, and then disappears.

But, some Wazungu were captured by Africans in the past and forcibly kept prisoner in the villages of chiefs, and in the caves of shamans. The person who had captured the Muzungu, as he is called in singular, had to make sure that he kept the glass-globe well-hidden from the Wazungu. So long as he kept the globe hostage, the Muzungu could not escape.

And when Africans saw the real Europeans, the White men from Europe, they transferred to them the name Wazungu. Before we met the people from Europe, we Africans, we had met White-skinned Wazungu, and we transferred the name Wazungu to the real Europeans, from the aliens.

Now, in the Zulu language, we call a White man Umlungu. Now, the word Umlungu means exactly the same as Wazungu, “a god or a creature which creates a big whirlwind underground”.

In Zaire, called now the Democratic Republic of the Congo, White people are called Watende or Walende. This, again, means “a god or a White creature”. And, the word Watende not only is used to refer to the pink-skinned alien, but is also used to refer to the field Chitauli. In Zaire, when shamans talk fearfully about the lords who control the Earth, they refer to them not as Chitauli, but they refer to them euphemistically as Watende-wa-muinda - that is, “the White creature which carries a light” because at night the Chitauli’s forehead eyes glow like red lights in the dense bush. They glow like the rear lights of an automobile in the dense bush. So, a Watende-wa-muinda “the White creature of the light”, that is what the Chitauli are called in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

There are over 24 other alien creatures, sir, that we Africans know about, but I will tell you briefly, now, about only two.

Sir, in the country called Zimbabwe, where I had my encounter in 1959, there is also another creature. This is the most amazing creature, and I saw it once, and so did several other people, some Black and some White, who were with me. This creature is a huge creature, and shaped exactly like a gorilla, but it is unlike a gorilla, which often walks on its feet, as well as on its knuckles. The creature I’m talking about, sir, stands about 8 feet or 9 feet high, and is built exactly like a gorilla, but its body is very powerful. Its shoulders are very wide, its neck is very thick. It is covered with thick, rough fur, like no other wild animal in Africa.

It is a humanoid creature, with thighs and legs and feet, as well as arms and hands which look exactly like those of a human being, only covered with a heavy mat of dark-brown fur. This creature, sir, is known as Ogo by the people of Zimbabwe. And schools of people have seen this creature, hundreds over the many generations. Some of these creatures have been seen right here in South Africa, in isolated bushy and mountainous places.

And these Ogo are, detail for detail, exactly like what the Native American people of the Northwestern United States call a Sasquatch or Bigfoot.

In fact, I say it is the same creature and we have it right here in southern Africa. It is also exactly the same creature, but with a totally different skin color, as the one that is seen by the people of Nepal on the slopes of the Himalaya mountains, the creature that is called a Yeti.

Now, then, the last creature, sir, a creature which is so well known in South Africa, and elsewhere in Africa, that if you mention its name, people smile. It is called a Tokoloshe. Every African knows what a Tokoloshe is. Some call it Tikoloshe.

It looks like a very nasty looking teddy-bear in appearance, in that it's head is like that of a teddy-bear, but it has got a thick, sharp, bony ridge on top of its head. The ridge goes from above its forehead to the back of its head, and with this ridge it can knock down an ox by butting it with its head.

This creature causes the Black people in certain places to raise their beds on bricks, one brick laid on top of the other one, about 3 feet above the ground. And you find this all over South Africa. This Tokoloshe likes to play with children, and has been seen hundreds of times by school children, in various parts of South Africa, even in recent times.

Sometimes it will terrorize children by scratching them as they sleep, leaving long, parallel scratches on a child's back and upon a child's thighs, scratches that become infected and itch terribly.

About two years ago, a creature like this terrorized a whole school of children in Soweto, near Johannesburg. And the school children called it pinky-pinky. Now, this creature is not only known in South Africa amongst Black people, it is also known, sir, amongst Polynesian people of Hawaii, and other islands in the Pacific. These people lift their huts, their grass houses, on stilts, to the height exactly that Africans lift their bed. When you ask a Polynesian, "Why do you built your huts like this?" The Polynesian will say, "We want to protect ourselves from Tiki."

Now, this is interesting, sir that a creature exactly like the one seen in South Africa is also seen on some Pacific islands, and the name by which it is known in the Pacific, Tiki, is very close to the African word Tikiloshe, or Tokoloshe.

One day I hope to share more of this information with your readers, but my appeal, again, is this: Please investigate! Please, let us investigate! Let us stop being too skeptical. Excessive skepticism is just as dangerous and as evil as gullibility.

Nobody can tell me that aliens don't exist. Let someone tell me, what is the meaning of this hole in my side? Let someone tell me, why is it that after I had been mated to that strange creature, in that strange place, my organ of manhood swelled horribly, and for many years after that I couldn't make love to an ordinary woman, properly. Why? If that was a figment of my imagination, how can a figment of one's imagination leave you with scars and cracks on your male organ, some of which have not healed to this date? Let such people answer me that question.

We must investigate, sir, because there is every sign that the alien creatures sharing this planet with us are getting desperate. Why? Because, you see, there is a great fight shaping up, and anyone who thinks deeply about such things can see this fight coming.

What am I talking about? Sir, until 30 or 40 years ago, very few people cared about the environment. Very few people were concerned about the destruction of the rain forests in Africa and elsewhere. Very few people were concerned when White hunters, who, at that time were regarded as heroes, massacred Africa's animals in the thousands. Very few people were concerned when the great nations of the world, such as the United States, Russia, Britain, and France, openly tested nuclear weapons in many parts of the world.

Today there are people who would spit at a big-game hunter if he showed himself in a hotel and announced what he was. Today a big-game hunter is no longer looked upon as a hero, but rather as a murderer. Today there are men and women, Black and White, who are prepared to risk their lives to save trees, to save animals, and to stop the insanity of testing nuclear weapons.

Sir, what does this tell you? It tells you that, after many thousands of years of being dominated by alien creatures, human beings are starting to fight back. Human beings are starting to care about the world in which they live and in which they find themselves. But, the aliens, the Chitauli, the Mantindane - call them what you will - are not going to take that lying down. They are going to punish us, as they did centuries before.

The aliens once destroyed a nation whose name has come down to us Africans as the nation of Amariri. It is said that the kings of Amariri, this fabulous country which we believed lay beyond the setting of the Sun, were refusing to do what the Chitauli were telling them to do.

The kings, at that time, were refusing to sacrifice their children to the Chitauli. They were refusing to make war on fellow human-beings, in order to sustain the Chitauli, with their god's image.

It is said that the Chitauli brought down a fire from Heaven. They took fire from the Sun itself and they used it to burn that great civilization away. They caused earthquakes and tidal waves and destroyed the great civilization of the Red people of the long green hair, who are said to have been the first people ever to be created on this Earth. It is said that the Chitauli allowed only a few surviving people to escape the destruction of Amariri, and that they are prepared to do this again in the very near future.

I'm worried about what is going to happen in other countries in the world. All these earthquakes, which have caused the destruction of human life in the Middle East and in parts of Africa and India, why does my heart feel frightened when I read about all this? These earthquakes are happening with unnatural regularity now, in Egypt, in Armenia, and one of these earthquakes was so powerful, it went right through the planet Earth and caused a very sacred rock in Namibia, a rock known as the Finger of God, which has been standing for tens of thousands of years, to collapse in a heap of rubble. And when that rock collapsed, I received many worried letters from sangomas who believed that because this rock had fallen, then the end of the world was very, very near.

Is there a question, please?

Martin: I read your poem, your pledge. In your pledge you mention the name Jabulon. Can you explain who that is?

Credo Mutwa: Jabulon, sir, is a very strange god. He is supposed to be the leader of the Chitauli. He is a god, to my great surprise, which I find certain groups of White people, especially, worshipping. We have known about Jabulon for many, many centuries, we Black people. But I am surprised that there are White people who worship this god, and these people, amongst them are people whom many have blamed for all the things that have happened on this Earth, namely, the Freemason people. We believe that Jabulon is the leader of the Chitauli. He is the Old One. And one of his names, in the African language, sir, is Umbaba-Samahongo - "the lord king, the great father of the terrible eyes" - because we believe that Jabulon has got one eye which, if he opens it, you die if he looks at you.

It is said, sir, the Umbaba ran away from an eastern land during a power struggle with one of his sons, and he took refuge in Central Africa, where he hides in a cave, deep underground. And it is an amazing thing, sir, it is said that under the Mountains of the Moon in Zaire is this great city of copper, of many thousands of shining buildings. There dwells the god Umbaba or Jabulon. And this god is waiting for the day when the surface of the Earth will be cleared of human beings so that he, and his children, the Chitauli, can come out and enjoy the heat of the Sun.

And, one day, sir, I had a very unexpected visit while I was living in Soweto, near Johannesburg. I was visited by priests from Tibet.

One of these priests, I'm sure you have met him or you know of him. His name is Akyong Rinpoche. He is one of the leading Tibetan priests in England who was exiled with the Dalai Lama, and he visited me one day while I was in my medicinal village in Soweto. And one of the things that Akyong Rinpoche asked me was, "Do I know of a secret city which is somewhere in Africa, a city made of copper?"

I said, "But, Akyong, you are describing the city of Umbaba, the city of the unseen god, the god who hides underground. How do you know about this?"

And Akyong Rinpoche, who is a very serious investigator of strange phenomena, told me that at one time the great Lama left Tibet with a group of followers and came to Africa searching for this city. And the Lama, and his followers, were never seen again. They never returned back to Tibet.

Now, sir, we have got stories in central and southern Africa about little Yellow men who came to Africa looking for the city of Umbaba, the city from which you cannot return alive. What is amazing, sir - I don't know whether this falls within the orbit of your newspaper, but - there are very, very disturbing stories which I have followed-up here in South Africa, stories which make no sense to me.

Credo Mutwa: Hello.

Martin: Yes, Credo. May I just say that I am very appreciative of your taking this time to talk with me, and I realize it's difficult.

Credo Mutwa: I appreciate the honor that you are doing me, much more than you realize. And I know how White people often treat anyone who talks on the subject that I am talking about, as weird.

Sir, I really shouldn't be exposing myself to public ridicule, as I am, but, our people ARE DYING! Not only do we have problems with drugs in southern Africa, not only do we have problems with crime in my country, which is getting a thousand times more vicious than it ever was before, not only do we have problems with AIDS, sir, but we also have got weird problems which often come our way-problems which, when you study them together, show you that something unearthly is going on in southern Africa. Can I share this thing with you, sir?

Martin: Yes, please.

Credo Mutwa: Sir, according to my culture it is very rude for one man simply to talk to another man without giving that other man the chance to talk back to him. So, out of respect of your paper and of you, I would like to ask you, in your country, the United States, do you have strange stories about underground structures which are built-because we are having similar stories in South Africa, and with us they are having very strange results, indeed.

Martin: Yes, there are many stories of underground - we call them underground bases, actually, and, in fact, in the newspaper I was associated with earlier, we published an entire edition on exposing the locations of those underground bases. Not only that....

Credo Mutwa: There is exactly the same thing here in South Africa, and there has been for a number of years. I was able to confirm one to my own satisfaction, but I have failed to confirm others. You see, sir, a man like me, who walks two worlds - the African mystical world, as well as the modern, down-to-Earth world - must be careful of what he says. But, about 5 years ago, I was living in the little town of Masikeng, a very historical town which was the site of a famous siege by the Boors, in the war of 1899-1902.

It was in this town, sir, that the Scout movement, the Boy Scout movement, was founded by Captain Powell. I'm sure you've heard about him. But, while I was living in Masinkeng, a number of people came to me, ordinary tribesmen and women, sir, some of them totally illiterate. These people complained to me that their relatives had mysteriously disappeared. They wanted me to divine where their relatives have gone to. And, I asked these people, all of whom did not know each other, where did your relatives disappear?

These people had told me an incredible story, and it was this: Not far from Masikeng there is a famous place which I'm sure you have heard about, a place which we call the Las Vegas of South Africa. This is the famous casino/hotel complex called Sun City.

Martin: Yes.

Credo Mutwa: I was told that under Sun City strange mining operations were in progress, deep underground, and that many of the Africans who worked in those mines disappeared and never returned home again, although their paychecks kept on being sent to their family. The men never returned home, as ordinary miners do.

Now, I looked into this phenomenon, sir, and, like a fool, I refused to believe it. And then more stories came my way, because when an African is in deep trouble, he or she always looks for a sangoma to find the reason behind the trouble.

Sir, the other story was this, and this one I found to be a shocking truth, that there was construction across the border from South Africa, in the land known as Botswana. There, the Americans were working with African labor, who had been sworn to secrecy. The Americans were building there a secret airport which can take modern jet fighters. Now, I couldn't believe this. Again, I was told that many had mysteriously disappeared there-ordinary tribesmen, sir, not even educated Black people; ordinary workers have gone missing. And when their relatives try to find out where they had gone, they are met with stone-cold silence.

Now, I wanted to have a look at this thing, and one thing that made me act was that a strange story swept through South Africa, that a South African jet aircraft, a jet fighter, had shot down a flying saucer. And the jet fighter had been scrambled from this secret base.

Now, sir, I decided to investigate because my credibility as a shaman and as a sangoma was at stake. I went to Botswana. It was very easy. You can still cross through the wire and get into that country. The borders are not as heavily sealed in certain places as many people would think.

I went there with some friends and I found that there was such a base in Botswana, not underground, but on the surface. It is an aircraft base, but Black people are afraid of even being seen near there because it is said that you will disappear if you get too close to the place, and the man who took us there didn't want to come near that place. I studied it from far away, and it does exist, and the man said if we got any nearer to the place, we would disappear. Which is a very odd thing, sir, because there are many military bases all over South Africa, and in Botswana, but this particular one fills the local people with deep terror. Why this would be so, I'm still struggling to find out, even now, because there are too many strange things going on in my country, and they are affecting the lives of many of our people very badly indeed.

Now, there is another thing, sir: It is that one of the things that the Chitauli like to do in their underground caves, where many fires are always kept ablaze, we are told, is that when a Chitauli gets sick and starts to lose a large area of skin on his body, it is said that there is a disease that the Chitauli suffer from which causes them to lose large areas of their skin, leaving only raw flesh.

When the Chitauli gets sick this way, a young girl, a virgin, is usually kidnapped by the servant of the Chitauli and is brought to the underground place. There the girl is bound, hand and foot, and wrapped in a golden blanket, and is forced to lie next to the Chitauli, the sick Chitauli, week after week, being well fed and well cared for, but kept bound hand and foot, and only released at certain times to relieve herself. It is said that after the sick Chitauli shows signs of getting better, then the human girl is manipulated into trying to escape. She is given a chance to escape, a chance which is really not a chance. Then, when the girl escapes, she runs, but she is pursued over a long distance underground by flying creatures which are made of metal, and she is recaptured when she reaches the height of fear and exhaustion.

Then she is laid on an altar, usually a rough rock, flat on top. Then, she is cruelly sacrificed, sir, and her blood is drunk by the sick Chitauli, which then recovers. But, the girl must not be sacrificed until she is very, very, very frightened, because if she is not frightened, it is said that her blood will not save the sick Chitauli. It must be the blood of a very frightened human being, indeed.

Now, this habit of chasing a victim was also practiced by ordinary African cannibals, sir. In Zulu-land, in the last century, there were cannibals who used to eat people, and their descendants, even today, will tell you, if they trust you, that the flesh of the human being who has been frightened and made to run over a great distance, while trying to escape, tastes far better than the flesh of someone who was simply killed.

Now, sir, some time ago here in South Africa - and it is still an ongoing process - 5 White girls disappeared. They were school-girls, sir. These school-girls were, every one of them, a highly talented child - either a child who showed signs of developing spiritual power, or a child who was a leader of her class in one particular thought or subject of learning. Five such children disappeared in South Africa. It was a very big story in the newspaper and, at one time, White people came to me and persuaded me to try and trace these children.

And one day a White man brought to me a rubber toy belonging to a White child who had disappeared. And I took the rubber toy in my hands and I noticed that the creature's eyes appeared to move. It was as if the rubber toy, a toy dinosaur, was about to burst into tears. I felt very bad, as if I could stand up and run away.

And then I told this White man,

"Listen to me: The child who held this toy is dead. What are you trying to do to me? This child is dead. I feel it."

And the White man, who was a television producer, took the toy, the school books, and the jersey, and he went away. And, sure enough, the White school child was found dead, buried in a shallow grave next to a road.

Now, other people came to me asking for my help in finding their missing children. Are they dead? Are they alive? Before I could do anything, sir - at that time I still had a telephone in my home - my telephone started ringing and people with very angry voices, White people voices, shouted at me and told me to stop helping those people. They told me that if I don't stop, acid would be thrown into my wife's face, and that my children would be murdered, one after the other.

And, sure enough, sure enough, my youngest son was brutally stabbed, almost to death, one day, by mysterious people whom his friends later told me had been White-skinned people. And so, I stopped, sir.

I am told, reliably, that over 1,000 children disappear in South Africa, almost every month. And they disappear, never to be seen again. Many people, especially in the newspaper field, think that this is the result of child prostitution rackets. But I do not think so. The children - if you check the history of many of these children, they were not ordinary street children, sir. They are school children who stand out in their class, because of certain subjects at which they are good, or, who stand out in their class because of thoughts which they are good at.

Not only that, sir, but ordinary women have disappeared this way, in Masikeng, also, at more or less the same time that the 5 White children disappeared. In Masikeng, two Black school teachers, female school teachers, disappeared in their car and were never seen again. But I don't want to burden you, sir, with this terrible story.

But let me tell you one last thing: After the disappearance of the 5 White school children, the police arrested a priest, a reverend of the White Reform Church, Reverend Van Rooyen. It was said that it was Van Rooyen who was responsible for the disappearance of these poor White school kids. And, he had been assisted by his girlfriend, who hand-picked these children. Before

Van Rooyen could appear in court, a very strange thing happened. He and his girlfriend were shot in their little vehicle, a little 4x4 truck. And, after they had been shot, the truck managed to come to a stop - a thing that a moving truck never does - and I was told, afterwards, by a White woman who knew Van Rooyen, that Van Rooyen and his woman had not committed this crime as the police had said to the newspapers.

They had actually been murdered. Why? Because Van Rooyen was found with a gunshot wound in his right temple, and yet, all of the people who knew him knew that he had been a left-handed man. So, who murdered Van Rooyen and his woman? It is one of the biggest and the ugliest mysteries in South Africa to date.

There is more, much more along these lines, but I won't waste your time with it.

Martin: When we were talking about the Greys, you talked about the Chitauli. You had described them, the reptilians - now correct me if I'm wrong - were you describing them as tall, thin, large-headed, large-eyed beings?

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir. They are tall. They walk with a - you see, the Grey aliens walk with a jerking motion, sir, as if there is something wrong with their legs. But, the Chitauli walk very gracefully, like trees gently swaying in the wind.

They are tall. They have large heads. Some of them have got horns all around their heads. Now, let me express amazement, there exists - that in one of the films that recently appeared in South Africa, a Star Wars film, the latest one, shows a character EXACTLY like a Chitauli, exactly! It's got horns all around it's head. These are the warrior Chitauli.

The royal Chitauli have got no horns around their head, but have got a darker ridge reaching from above their forehead to their back. They are very graceful creatures, we are told, sir, but they have got - their little finger is a claw which is a very sharp, straight claw, which they use to punch into human noses, in order to drink human brains in one of their rituals.

Martin: Now, are they fair skinned?

Credo Mutwa: They are not pink skinned. They are white-skinned, like paper, almost like certain types of cardboard. Their skin is like that, it is the skin, definitely, of scaly, reptile-like creatures. Their foreheads are very large, bulging, and they look highly, highly intelligent.

Credo Mutwa: Yes, they do, sir. They set human being against human being. I could give you many amusing examples, using some African language, how the Chitauli are said to have divided human beings. They like - do you know who they like, sir? They like religious fanatics.

Martin: (Laughter)

Credo Mutwa: Ones who are burdened by too much religion are very popular with the Chitauli.

Martin: Well, now, I can't help but wonder if the Chitauli are prevalent in the United States because of the large number of underground bases. In the United States, alone, the numbers of missing children are so astronomically high that the White-slave trade does not answer those questions.

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir, I agree. But, I'm sorry, sir, I feel that it is in Africa that something very funny is designed to happen. Let me tell you what happened to me, recently, sir. We still have a little time. I won't be long, one minute or less.

Martin: No, no - that's fine.

Credo Mutwa: When I started talking to Mr. David Icke, and it was (when) Mr. Icke started speaking about me in Cape Town, I received a visit from 3 White people who pretended to be from South America. These people told me that something is going to happen on the 9th of this month, on 9-9-99. They said that this was going to happen in Lake Titicaca, a place which I once visited about 2 years ago.

Martin: A very special place.

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir. And then, these people told me, when we were speaking - these people, sir, speaking through an interpreter - told me that Africa is the country where something is going to happen soon which will decide the fate of all humankind.

And then, we parted on very friendly words, sir, but these people had left me a letter which I did not open until a few hours after they had left. And in this letter was written that I should not attend David Icke's talk, and that a strange person called Alia Czar was watching me. I don't know who Alia Czar is.

And they said to me - these people had said to me when we met - that they were under a great lord called Melchizedek. And, after I'd read this threatening letter, which threatened that if I talked, my wife, who is sick of cancer in hospital, is going to die if I talked. Then, I began to wonder. Who were these people?

Then, because I've been to South America before, I found that the Spanish language with which they were speaking was different from the language, the Spanish which is spoken in South America. These people were using Spanish from Spain, and not the slightly weakened Spanish from South America.

Even now, sir, that threat is still hanging over my head and, may I point out, sir, a strange thing which whoever you will send to me one day will see for themselves: my wife is sick of cancer in the hospital, which is the largest hospital in South Africa, sir. And in one of the x-rays taken of my wife's womb, a strange metal device was seen - of a kind which has puzzled doctors. I spoke to my wife. I asked her, "Who put this object, which the x-rays have seen, in her womb."

My wife said nobody had ever touched her, and nobody had ever inserted anything into her. But this artifact, sir, which is clearly marked in the x-ray, and is clearly indicated with an arrow, is first seen in one x-ray plate, disappears for the next 2 plates, and is seen on the 4th plate again. I've been wondering very, very much about this.

No matter what we may think, sir, there are strange things going on in this world and they require an agent, investigation, and explanation. What is this strange device, which the doctors cannot identify, doing inside the uterus of a 65-year-old woman? My wife is suffering, and I can lose her at any time now, because I can't even get her out of hospital. Who put this device in her uterus, and why? I will never know the answer, not in this world.

Martin: I'm very sorry to hear about your wife having cancer. I just lost my mother last year to cancer and I know that is a very painful struggle.

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir, it is.

Martin: So, I am very sorry that you are going through that.

Credo Mutwa: Through the training as a Zulu step-son warrior, we have got something like the Japanese Samuri which we call the Kaway, which is a Sun warrior. When a Sun warrior, who is trained like I am, undergoes a terrible experience, he must channel the pain caused by that experience into cold, battle anger, in order to overcome the grief he feels.

And, at this moment, sir, I am aggrieved about what is happening in my country; about what's happening to my people; about what's happening to my wife, who is also my half-sister. You see, ours is what was called a sacred marriage between a man, a sanusi, a shaman, and his half-sister.

And, the wife I'm about to lose is my half-sister. Our father is one man, although our mothers were different.

You know, sir, I feel a cold rage that Africa is being destroyed. I feel, sir, a cold rage that my people are being destroyed by forces which, when you study them, you find are totally alien. And, here, let me share with you, sir, one last thing, please, which will make your readers understand why I am feeling what I am feeling now.

As you know, sir, there is AIDS going like a silent fire through South Africa. And, last year, I found, to my horror, that one of my six children, my 21-year-old daughter, is HIV positive. Sir, I feel a cold rage in my heart that we are allowing an alien disease that came from we know not where, a disease which anyone, with any thought, realizes was manufactured somewhere in order to destroy large swaths of humankind. When I look into my daughter's eyes, sir, I feel a chill. I've got two daughters, grown-up, young women, and she is the last. The other one is short and dumpy, and a loving-a lovely African girl with a big backside and big breasts. But this girl, who is dying of this disease, is slender, dark-skinned like my mother, and she is very beautiful, even by European standards - and I cannot look into my child's eyes and see what I read there: a resignation, a why? Why?

If AIDS was a natural disease, sir, I would accept it, because man must live side-by-side with illness in this world. But a child, you spend years educating and bringing-up, suddenly being snuffed-out before your eyes, by a disease made by evil people, I want to tear somebody's eyes out for what I've seen happening. I'm sorry, sir.

Martin: I understand.

Credo Mutwa: We must look into this thing. Is there one last question you would like to ask?

Martin: Yes. I would like to go back to the copper city for a moment. It would seem that this Jabulon would be the equivalent of what, in the West, we call Satan. Would you say that?

Credo Mutwa: I think so, yes, sir. He is the chief of the Chitauli. And, like Satan, he lives in a house underground where great fires are always lighted, to keep him warm. Because, we are told, that after the great war they fought with God, they became cold in their blood and they cannot stand freezing weather, which is why they require human blood, and also they require fire always to be kept working where they are.

Martin: Well it's been said, in the recent video tape that David Icke has put out, that the shape-shifting reptilians, in order to maintain their façade, their cover, their human-like appearance, they must drink human blood. And there is something about the blond gene, apparently. Now, I don't know what...

Credo Mutwa: Yes. Mr. David Icke shared that a little with me, sir. He told me that, repeatedly, golden-haired people get sacrificed by the Chitauli, and then I told him, in my turn, what I know from Africa.

You see, sir, not all Africans have got black hair. There are Africans who are regarded as very holy, as very sacred. These are Africans who are born with natural red hair. These Africans are believed to be very spiritually powerful. Now, in Africa, such people, albeamers or red-headed Africans, were the most victims of sacrifice, especially when they were just entering maturity - whether they were males or females.

Martin: Now, when you were able to see the eyes beneath the Grey alien's exterior, would you say that those were reptilian beings underneath that cover?

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir, exactly. I will tell you why. There is a snake here in South Africa which is called a Mamba.

Martin: Yes, very deadly.

Credo Mutwa: It is one of the most poisonous snakes that you can find. It has got eyes EXACTLY like those of a Chitauli and of a Mantindane. And so has a Python, sir. A crocodile's eyes are very ET-looking, and they don't look as hypnotic and as piercing as those of a Mamba or a Python. If you can image, sir, the eye of a Python, magnified about 10 times, then you have got exactly what a Chitauli's eyes look like.

Martin: Well, it is said, and I believe this to be true, that there is a - for lack of a better way of putting it - there is a war between Light and Dark, Good and Evil, on this planet.

Credo Mutwa: Yes. Yes, sir. Yes, sir. Yes.

Martin: And there certainly is a God in His Universe, a God of Light and Justness.

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir.

Martin: How does your culture, how do you view the intervention of God through His Hosts, through His Representatives? In all things there must be a balance, and that includes on planet Earth - as above, so below. How do you see - for many readers, they can read about this all, and it sounds very frightening and very, almost, hopeless - and yet, there certainly is hope. So, I would like to end this interview on a message of hope.

Credo Mutwa: Yes. Please, sir, there IS hope! Look, first of all, there IS a God above us. And this God is more real than most of us believe. God is not a figment of someone's imagination. God is not something dreamt-up by old men and old women in prehistoric times. God exists, sir. But standing between us and God are creatures who claim to be gods. And these creatures we must get rid of in order to get closer to God.

Sir, I have lived a long and very strange life, and I can tell you that there is a God, and He is intervening. However, we see God's intervening as slow, but wait: Who would have thought that less than 30 years ago, not one person cared about the environment. Who put this sudden Godliness within all of us?

Today, sir, people everywhere in the world are standing up and fighting for the rights of women and for the rights of children. Who has put these ideas into our minds? Not the Chitauli, not any demonic entity, it is God acting in the shadow and making us strong and able to resist these ugly creatures.

You see, sir, God seems to work slowly in our eyes, because God lives in a time-sphere totally different from our own. God is there. God is working. And it is God, sir, who, for the first time in our existence, is making us aware of these things, making us aware that on this world we are not alone, and that we must be soul-ly and solely responsible for our actions, and we must neutralize these alien beings who for years have led us around in circles.

Human beings have never known any real progress, sir, because there have been forces that have been stopping us from reaching our rightful position in the universe, and I mean the Chitauli, I mean the Mantindane, I mean the Midzimu. We must stop regarding these creatures as super-human creatures. They are just parasites who need us more than we need them. And only a fool will ever deny the fact that we are not the only intelligent species of being that this planet has produced.

All over Africa there is overwhelming evidence that once there were gigantic human beings who walked this planet, in the days of the dinosaur. There are footprints in granite, each one 6 foot long by 3 ½ wide, footprints of mature human beings, sir, which date back thousands of years, millions of years. Where did these giants go to? Who knows; the dinosaurs may have produced an intelligent race, a race which deceives us into thinking that it comes from the stars, when in fact it is part of this planet on which we live.

There is hope, and the hope is very bright. A Christ-child is being born in all of us, but like all deaths, the death of the Light-child (the death of the old-self prior to transformation into "Christness") is going to be attended by great danger, as the enemy is going to be driven into desperation. The enemy will make mistakes and we will conquer him in God's sacred name. That is what I believe, sir, and that is what I'm going to hold-on believing until my last breath.

Martin: And that is a perfect place to end this - on that thought, on that note. Now, let me just say, just for you, since 1974, I have seen many, many spaceships, close-up (though not inside nor by abduction). I have experienced-in the mountains of southern Oregon-I have come across Bigfoot footprints...

Credo Mutwa: Ah-hah!

Martin: ...by a river where I was camping. I have heard the Bigfoot in the mountains at night. I have heard their cries...

Credo Mutwa: Ya-ya! You see?

Martin: ...from one mountain to another. These are things I have experienced. I KNOW these things are real!

Credo Mutwa: Yes, sir. Then, I speak to a fellow warrior, and I say, "We shall overcome", as the American Marines used to sing during the Second World War.

Martin: Yes, and during the Vietnam War.

Credo Mutwa: We will overcome, we will overcome, but skeptics must stop laughing, and fools must stop calling these aliens, god. There is only ONE God, and He or She or It is the One who created us, and not some impostor who came from somewhere else to hide behind us and to drink our children's blood. Amen, sir.

Martin: Yes, absolutely right. Credo, please know that I deeply appreciate what you have done and the courage of just speaking frankly. It's past time to hold onto these things, and it's time to just speak The Truth. And for those who don't believe or even consider possibilities, well, it's just too bad.

Credo Mutwa: Exactly, and also to confront people with the fact that there is no reason to fear anything. If we go from a perspective of making information available that should be available to every single person on this blooming planet, why the hell are they trying to threaten you to keep quiet? If it's so ridiculous, let it be. Stop assassinating and ridiculing and destroying people by churning-up fear. This is the perspective I come from, and I'm sure David, as well, and obviously you, as well, do too. I don't have fear anymore.

It's time that we speak out and that we acquire a consciousness - a global, common consciousness - and get this thing to the front. Thank you, so much, I really appreciate it.

Martin: Absolutely right. Thank you.

RICK MARTIN: The weekend of April 28 you may have noticed that all the major prostituted print and broadcast media outlets announced yet another AIDS conference of "goodwill" had just ended in Africa. This latest public relations pageant (or pressure-relief valve) was orchestrated in Nigeria, a location of deep and protracted turmoil. All the usual array of participants (from politicians to pharmaceutical companies to medical "experts") promised, with special practiced earnestness for the cameras, to work hard to combat this illness. Meanwhile, The Truth of the matter is far different from the likes of this major propaganda event, broadcast far and wide "coincidentally" with our receiving and sharing of the following heart-wrenching communication. The deep pain and chronic suffering that is a daily experience for many South Africans has never been more vividly described than in my recent phone conversation with Credo Mutwa. Some of you will recall that we presented a remarkable front-page feature interview with Credo Mutwa back in our October 1999 edition of The SPECTRUM. Things have gotten quite a bit worse in South Africa since we last spoke, particularly as it relates to those infected with and dying from AIDS.

On the morning of April 23, I received a telephone call from David Icke's publicist for the United States, Royal Adams, relaying a request from Credo Mutwa to speak with me. I am grateful to both Royal Adams and David Icke for considering The SPECTRUM to be the appropriate conduit through which to share this great Zulu shaman's most impassioned message. I called Credo Mutwa that same morning, and he was as genuine and cordial as I remembered him to be-but with a very serious edge of urgency in his voice. Actually, words fall terribly short at times like these for their inability to convey the kind of intense emotional impact his voice so tangibly carried. It was as though Credo was speaking before the full assembly at the United Nations, delivering, in very measured wording, the most serious and important appeal imaginable. His plea is on behalf of humanity that the genocide (initiated covertly some years ago as part of the depopulation agenda of the dark, so-called "elite" global controllers) MUST CEASE in the land of Africa - which is rapidly becoming a graveyard populated by the walking dead. With that brief introduction to a subject of tremendous moral consequence, let me just move directly into the message Credo Mutwa wishes to be shared. Keep those Kleenex handy.

Credo Mutwa: My call, sir, has to do with the terrible disease which is killing my people, the disease which is called AIDS. My appeal is this, sir: I don't know who the people are who created this disease. But in the last 2 years or so, I have handled many cases. I have handled friends of mine who are dying of this disease. And I know now that this disease, sir, is a man-made one. I wish to appeal to those human beings who created this disease: PLEASE STOP NOW! You have done enough. You have killed enough of the children of Africa. Stop now! Stop! The death of Africa will be the death of the whole world. If it is correct for Dr. Simon Wiesenthal to pursue Nazi war criminals many years after the end of the Second World War, will it also not be just and correct for future Africans to pursue these men and these women who have murdered Africa in this terrible way?

There are questions about AIDS which I want to be answered. AIDS is not just a disease. It is a spiritual disaster to our people. It destroys families, sir. It turns children against parents. It turns lovers against each other. It has turned our society upside-down.

But what chills my blood is the paralyzing that I see amongst our leaders. Men and women who suffered and died for the liberation of South Africa are paralyzed like little rabbits in front of a vicious fox when they have to turn around and face AIDS. I do not know what our leaders are afraid of, who they are afraid of. Are there, after all is said and done, humanoid shadows out there who scare our leaders witless?

And I say, sir, to the pharmaceutical organizations in South Africa: you have done enough! Your sham of a court case has been rebuked for what it is—an act of cheap advertisement for drugs which have been rejected in Europe, in America, and elsewhere.

On top of death, you are dumping more death on Africa. Why? I say, to every human being on this planet, AIDS is not a God-made disease! If it was, I would not be trying to fight it—half-educated, semi-literate, and stupid as I am. I say this disease was made BY people, and I am appealing to those people to stop, now! There are names which are being bandied about by frightened people in South Africa, people who talk in whispers. One of the names that is mentioned is the name of the man called [Dr. Robert] Gallo. I say to Mr. Gallo: Remember your common humanity. You have done enough. Stop now!

I say to the pharmaceutical organizations: Sir, you are like octopuses. You have got tentacles sprawling all over the world. You play Jehovah [God] with the lives of our people.

But your tentacles can be lopped-off! You are driving African people into a situation where they will have to turn around and attack you with weapons. And if that happens, you will have only yourselves to blame. I am not threatening anyone. I am only articulating the anger that our people convey to me - as they lay dying, in empty shacks, skeletons wasted to nothing, with skins like brown wet paper.

I say: stop now, my brothers, in the name of our humanity! If your aim is to destroy Africa, say so. Let us fight, and at least die with honor. I say: four of my children are gripped by this terrible scourge. I cannot bear the prospect that I will have to bury my offspring before I die. It is unnatural and obscene. I say, again, to those shadowy organizations in America, and in England, and Canada, and elsewhere: STOP!

You have done enough. Turn off the tap of murder. You have killed enough. STOP!

Or allow us the right of all threatened animals to retaliate, with weapons, for what is being done to us. If there are, out there, the children of the serpent, the Chitauri, the walkers in darkness, let them know this: that I, Credo Mutwa, am not a brave man. But when I see my children ravaged by AIDS, when I see my children turning their eyes, turning away from me, I feel the courage of any beast that watches its offspring being slaughtered by a predator. You have done enough. Conspirators, you have done enough! Do you know, sir, let me tell you one last thing before I stop. I, and a White doctor, are saving many of our people-not curing them, because we are not allowed to claim that we have a cure for this disease-but the herbal medicine that we use is making people, who have been condemned to go home and die, come back to life. And I am asking that the South African government and the United Nations, if they are not servants to Dark Forces, they must release this medicine and allow us to combat this scourge, until such a time as scientists can come up with a stronger medicine against AIDS.

I will not allow Africa to die! I am sorry, but I will not allow my people to perish! I am only doing my duty as a father and as a Black man, and as a human being, in a country which is being deliberately murdered. I cannot accept, and will not accept, the fact that in the United States, the magazine called TIME, states that there are only 920,000 people with AIDS in the United States. And yet, in sub-Saharan Africa, there are close to 44 million. This is illogical! And I want to know the reason behind it. I'm sorry, sir, but this is how I feel!

Martin: Please don't apologize.

Credo Mutwa: These conspirators, sir, these ugly entities have shown a dangerous over-confidence, and it is high time we confronted them. I cannot - you know, sir, what happens in South Africa is that a child who has got AIDS runs away from his family and hides himself. And if you, the desperate parent, try to go looking for your child, your child fights you and can hit you with stones and drive you away.

It happened to me, sir.

There are stories which newspapers never dare to print, which are happening in South Africa, centering around AIDS. And the newspapers in South Africa, which are directed by conspirators and liars, do not even try to stop the stigma, which they built-up, against AIDS and its victims. In fact, sir, they are making it worse, with the resolve that people who are suffering from this disease find that they are being rejected by their families. Men die alone, in shacks behind their homes. Women chase their husbands out of their homes. Men murder their wives, sir, because of the spread of AIDS.

I appeal to you, and the editor of The SPECTRUM - please, please, tell the world the hell in which we are living. Please! Like now, I am trying desperately to build clinics in South Africa, with the help of my initiate, Virginia Rathele, and others. But we are being blocked and frustrated at every turn. We are threatened.

My house has been broken into 3 times, and the seeds of the precious and endangered plant, which we use in helping our people, were stolen. But I was able to find more, and I intend to find a piece of land - God knows where and how - to plant them, so that this plant, which is on the brink of extinction, should come back and save our people, which it is doing. I appeal to the world, sir, and to all decent human beings, that the stranglehold that the Chitauri, the Reptile People, have over humanity, should be broken once and for all. The death of Africa will lead to the death of the entire human race.

People must be aware of that, please. Thank you, sir. But, please, can you please tell me, sir: What should a half-educated man like me do? You know, sir, I expected my kids to bury me when I die. But now it seems it is going to be the other way around. What father can see his children being slaughtered in this way? What parent can allow such an ugly thing? What should a parent legally do against these monsters who have unleashed AIDS?

Everything points to the fact, sir, that AIDS is a man-created disease. In fact, I was telling Mr. David Icke, only a few moments ago, that I have traveled widely through Africa, as you know, and I can tell you one thing that scientists who study AIDS cannot tell you: That people who die of AIDS, sir, immediately after death, show signs of people who have died of arrow poison-you know, as if they'd been shot with a poisoned arrow. They don't die, merely, of a disease, as would happen in the case of tuberculosis or cancer. Their lips are discolored in a way that I have seen happening with people who had been hit by poisoned arrows. What is it in AIDS that behaves like an arrow poison?

And, another thing, sir: It is said that AIDS began as a disease of homosexuals. But wait. In Africa, most homosexuals do not penetrate each other, sir, as they do in Europe. African homosexuals do the sex act between each other's thighs, not in each other's, you now, back passage. So, how does it come that these people get AIDS, when there is no physical contact with the body fluids between them?

Another thing: How does it happen, as I have seen now many times, that you find a family of four - a mother, a father, and two children. You find, sir, that the parents are healthy, but the little kids have got full-blown AIDS. Can someone, kindly, explain this to me, this phenomenon which I have seen in many parts of southern Africa?

Another thing: You find a man who has got full-blown AIDS, and a wife who is free from AIDS, and these people have got a child who is totally free from AIDS. How can one - can anyone on the Earth who reads your paper, sir, kindly explain this amazing phenomenon to me?

What, other than sexual intercourse, what is another thing that is spreading AIDS? I suspect there is something else, but the doctors disagree with me when we talk at conferences. I suspect there is another way by which AIDS spreads through people. Is it an insect, as I suspect, or is it a what?

I don't know. Please, let wise people out there help me, because these conspirators and their running dogs, these people who work in shadows, are, literally, destroying Africa. And if Africa is destroyed, other races of humankind will follow - one of them being the Black Americans in America. They won't survive the destruction of Africa.

What is the idea behind Africa's depopulation? I read a chilling book not so long ago, a book written about the "great" [The word should definitely be contained within quote marks, to depict the actual, opposite meaning of "respect" for this very prolific, now deceased member of a very major family among the so-called "elite" controllers. Credo knows very well that about which he speaks so humbly!] White man, Bertrand Russell. Russell stated that, one day, the Western nations would have to decimate Black people, using war, famine, and disease. And this has happened.

I say, please, you Russell followers, please, you racists and Malthusians, you have done enough harm! Stop now! Stop! In the name of our common humanity, and in the name of the Intelligence that obviously exists behind the Cosmos, the Intelligence which human beings call by the cheap name, God, please stop now!

Stop, please! Stop!
Thank you very much, sir.

AIDS in South Africa

There was someone whose name, if I remember correctly, was Santana or Santanaya (George Santayana) - a person of great wisdom indeed. This Santana or Santanaya spoke the following words: "If people fail to learn from history they will always repeat history's mistakes."

Upon this planet all living entities - be they birds or animals or even human beings - are given an important ability by the Creator, which is to learn from experience and on learning, to survive the angry night and the roaring storms of existence upon this world. But many of us, supposedly civilized human beings, appear to be losing this very important God-given talent. We no longer appear to have the capacity to learn. We take it for granted that we are intelligent beings. We take it for granted that we know many things - but the fact is that we know nothing or next to nothing and that we seldom learn, we human beings, from experience.

When things happen we tend to forget them and because of our having forgotten them we tend to make mistakes - mistakes that cost us our lives mistakes that cost us our happiness, mistakes that even threaten the existence of the very earth, which has nurtured and cherished us for so many millions of years.

Today a hideous pandemic known as Aids is sweeping through South Africa today we are told that four million people, our brothers and sisters, our neighbours, our fellow tribesmen and tribeswomen are already contaminated by Aids and are living with it. Hundreds of people have died since Aids appeared in South Africa some 20 or 21 years ago. The bony hand of Aids has snuffed out hundreds of our brightest stars, our young intellectuals, our young leaders, and the number of deaths is increasing fast.

For some reason Aids, which was said to be a slow killer has become even more vicious than before and is killing our people with amazing speed. Today every person who dies of an illness is immediately suspected of having died of an Aids related illness. But that is not all. The name Aids carries with it a stigma a brand of shame so dark and terrible and intense I can only liken it to the kind of stigma that societies in Africa and in ancient Israel placed upon the shoulders of those unfortunate people that suffered from leprosy.

A lot of empty lip service is being paid in Sa today to the fact that everybody should fight to remove the stigma that is attached to Aids. But actually very little is being done to bring this about and the entities that caused this terrible stigma namely the newspapers and other news media are doing next to nothing to de-stigmatise Aids. They started it all and they should put it right. When Aids first appeared it was said to be a disease of drug-takers and homosexuals. People who are looked down upon by holier-than-thou sections of our society.

Suddenly we were told that Aids was a heterosexual disease, apart from being a homosexual one, and that it attacked even those people who thought that they were leading clean and God-fearing lives. It is the news media that should correct this dreadful mistake for they were the instruments of it spreading when this disease first came to existence. It is spoken by our people in this proverb that he who has farted inside the chieftain's great house should find perfumed herbs to burn in the fireplace and take away the smell - and this proverb I throw at the feet of newspapers, not only in this South Africa, but in other parts of the world as well.

You started this rot, you farted in the chief's house - now please find perfumed herbs and burn them to take away your stench. I am an old man, closely approaching my eightieth year and over my head the angry years have passed like water over the wall of a dam. I have seen many things and I can tell you from my experience as well. You started this rot, you farted in the chief's house - now please find perfumed herbs and burn them to take away your stench. I am an old man, closely approaching my eightieth year and over my head the angry years have passed like water over the wall of a dam. I have seen many things and I can tell you from my experience that what we are seeing in South Africa is really something new but rather a repetition of history brought about by people who have failed to learn history's lessons.

Today in South Africa we talk about the disease called Aids, which we are told there, is no cure for. We are further told about how expensive are the medicines for combating Aids are and lastly, we are told about Aids orphans - Oh, I have seen them - the pathetic little waifs, the scatterlings left upon the cruel road of history by a disease that knows no pity. I have seen children already marked by the claws of Aids -children who will not see their fifty years of life.

Children who will be torn away from the arms of our motherland by Aids and hurled into the dark night of death without every having known what life really is and what life is about. I have seen wasted little children, many of them hardly more than skeletons - children whose mothers and fathers have already died of Aids. I have seen this and much more. I have seen the horrible impact that Aids is having on our people's family life. I have seen how Aids is separating men from wives, child from parent. I have seen that and much, much more, but within my swollen heart bloated with old age a voice, a grave voice from yesterday keeps on saying to me. "Mutwa, you have seen all this before.

Your country and your people have gone through much of this before. Much of what we see happening in South Africa today is not new but has happened before and the people of our country failed miserably to learn from that."

What am I talking about? There was once a time in the 1920's, 1930's and 1940's when Tuberculosis was just as deadly a killer of our people as Aids is today - in those days Tuberculosis was known as Consumption and any black person who was told by doctors that he or she had Consumption reacted exactly as black people who are told that they have got Aids do today. The person knew in those days before streptomycin and other magic anti-Tuberculosis drugs that a sentence of death had been passed by some angry god over him or her and that he or she must silently and with as much courage as possible await the dark Angel of Death's coming.

There was once a time in my country's history when diseases such as Gonorrhoea, Syphilis and other sexually transmitted diseases, which had been brought into Africa by people from Europe, were as deadly and incurable as Aids is today. If Aids today has created thousands of Aids orphans then, my friends, so did Gonorrhoea, Syphilis and Tuberculosis. Those people who are complaining about how expensive anti-Aids drugs are should listen to what I have to tell them now. In olden days there were crude medicines, which were used against Syphilis, Gonorrhoea and such like diseases. Most of these medicines were in the form of pills - ugly, round black coloured things, which were made of mercury. I remember them well.

These pills were priced right out of the lives of grass-route level Africans. I remember that some unscrupulous white doctors of those times used to demand two cows for a tinful of these mercury pills. Pills, which eventually drove the user mad - pills which tanned the teeth of those who used them over a time as black as those of goats. Very few of our people could afford these mercury tablets.

Even more expensive, were much later preparations created for the combating of venereal disease. I remember one such preparation known as 606 or Salvasan. These tablets were out of reach of our people and many, many people died horrible deaths, hideously disfigured by Syphilis, hideously mutilated by Gonorrhoea because they could not afford those silver bullets of those times. In those days, as is the case today, people were filled with a massive hysteria regarding diseases such as Tuberculosis and sexually transmitted diseases.

It is one of the most brutal facts of our country's history that in those days, if a farmer learned that one of his black labourers had contracted either Gonorrhoea, Syphilis or even Tuberculosis that while farmer became frightened that these diseases would, somehow be transmitted to members of his own family and he used to take the black man or woman away from his farm on the pretext of taking him or her to "a good doctor" in a nearby town and when the farmer and his worker reached an isolated spot the farmer used to order the worker to get off the wagon and to walk the rest of the distance - giving him a meaningless letter supposedly to be taken to the great doctor in the town and the farmer would stop his wagon and let the black person climb off and then he would wait for him or her to walk some distance away towards the imaginary source of help and when the person was still within rifle range the farmer used to draw his gun and shoot the worker dead, drag him or her into a clump of bushes and return home.

On so many occasions was this thing done almost all over South Africa, especially in Natal and in the Eastern Cape and the Northern Transvaal that our people began to develop a cold distrust of going to seek the help of doctors when they found themselves the victim of either Tuberculosis or venereal disease. It became a tradition for our people to believe and, rightly so, that if he or she sought the help of a doctor, he or she would not return alive but would be finished off somewhere along the road.

Today, there are still thousands of Zulu people, Xhosa people and people of other tribes who firmly believe that if they go to a clinic or seek the help of a doctor when they have got either Tuberculosis or venereal disease that they will be finished off. I have met hundred of such people and this belief which is still as strong now as it was over sixty years ago or more is one of the things that are making our battle against Aids a hundred times more difficult than it otherwise would have been. In the olden days, there was something, which our people used to call ingane kaNodndwa, which means the child of a prostitute. This child of a prostitute was often the offspring of a woman who had suffered for years from Gonorrhoea and who then died after giving birth to this child. Usually such children were born blind, which was a strange characteristic I observed of children whose mothers suffered from this scourge.

The child was born weak in body and in mind and was sometimes covered with sores and when having reached the age of walking, unable to walk properly. In those days it was quite common for a woman, while walking along the street to be approached by a strange woman, a prostitute, and given a child wrapped in blankets, "here" would say the prostitute, "I give you this child, please bring it up in memory of me". In those days our people still believed very firmly in their sacred traditions and their belief in the traditional black religion had not yet been destroyed by the foreign creed known as Christianity. In those days our people regarded children as very sacred beings indeed - so much so that in no African tribe or community did you find an orphan.

All orphaned children were immediately adopted, handed over to relatives and brought up with dignity and love by people who still believed that the greatest duty of all human beings was to cherish, protect and nurture children. In those days things such as sexual abuse of children were totally unknown. In those days were believed that there was no greater luck that could befall a person but for that person to be given a living breathing child by a total stranger. I know many sangomas who, in their younger days, had been given children by prostitutes in Johannesburg and who brought up these children as their very own. One of the greatest sangomas, who once lived in Johannesburg, was a Sangoma known as Dorcas Danisa.

Dorcas Danisa was a true psychic like Mr. Uri Geller she could bend spoons and other metal objects and one day when she was still a young woman way back in the 1940's Dorcas had been approached by a destitute woman who had made a living out of selling her body and who was now riddled with syphilis and no longer able to earn a living. This woman approached Dorcas Danisa with a boy child who was deformed.

The boy was crippled, paralyzed from the waist down and Dorcas brought up this boy as her own child - saw to it that he had proper schooling and when

Dorcas died, this boy now grown into full manhood inherited Dorcas's estate. Very, very few people knew that he was not her natural son, but a son by adoption - given to Dorcas by a strange woman well over thirty years before. When a child was born deformed, when a child was born blind, the offspring of a prostitute our people used to cherish that child, bring it up as their own, and see to it that it grew into a mature, happy and respected human being.

But today, with our traditions destroyed and our religion shattered, black people have become utterly cruel and selfish and vicious towards those they should be assisting. Today our people run away from those of their countrymen and women who have been traumatized by Aids and Tuberculosis.

Children orphaned by Aids are treated worse than beasts. In Westernized and Christianized communities of today children suffering from Aids, weakened by HIV are beaten, ostracized, ill treated and forced to scavenge for scraps of food in dirty dustbins. I have seen it many times and I have wondered why our people have changed so much within one man's lifetime. We have become a nation of extremely cruel people towards our own kith and kin and the reason for this is that we have thrown away our culture and our religion like so much rubbish and accepted falsehoods shouted at us from the pulpits of deceivers and the altars of liars.

Today, if you want to adopt a suffering child, you have got to go through a whole hell of bureaucracy - you got to answer a thousand questions - you have got to travel many miles from this office to than one. Things are not being made at all easy for us African people to do what we feel is our godly duty towards those of us who are suffering. Sometimes in the darkness of the night when I lie unsleeping, lost in thought, I despair for the future of the black people. I despair for he future of my country. But at the same time, man is a winged creature, a creature given spiritual wings by the gods and these wings have one name and that name is Hope.

No matter how dark the night or how angry the storm a human being must keep his wings of Hope unfurled and strong otherwise he shall fall out of the skies as id Icarus and perish upon the rocks far below. It is true that there is darkness over South Africa, it is true that there is despair in the land at this moment but what we are facing is a disease like any other - a disease made worse by the high rate of unemployment in our country. A disease made worse by the fact that our people are starving. You can never fight a deadly disease like Aids if you are torn apart by hunger - if you are torn apart by unemployment, but there is hope, a very faint hope for the people of South Africa.

We must believe in that Hope otherwise we are a nation of dead things. There is a Hope that Aids can be defeated - there is a hope that the economic situation of our country can get better. One of the most amazing things that I have found in my long and bitter life is this - that it appears as if God prepared this world for the coming of animals and human beings and for the meeting of any emergency that may arise - that there isn't a disease on this planet that has a cure and man has but to look around carefully and find it. There is a plant growing in the veld in South Africa, especially in the Cape.

This is a plant with rather a strong smell - a beautiful plant that looks like a delicate fern - a plant with bright red, strange looking flowers, flowers that taste almost like honey when you eat them. This plant's name is Sutherlandia Frutescens - a plant that was known for thousands of years for its healing powers by Bushmen, Koi San and Koi Koi, Hottentots as well as Bantu people. This medicine was one of seven medicines that our traditional healers called xxxxxxxx, the final medicines, medicines which must only be used when the entire nation is in danger as it is now. This medicine, Sutherlandia, is safe to take and has been used by our people for thousands of years.

Hope for South Africa. - No matter how dark the night may seem to be, No matter how angry the thunder storm, there is always a ray of light that can pierce those thunder clouds and that can make the night turn into day. No one can deny there is AIDS devouring our people like a dragon in this land. There are the people who say that AIDS does not exist and that it is not the fearful thing that we take it to be. I would like to ask these people most respectfully: what is that, what is killing our people out there in the countryside? I have held many AIDS victims in my arms some of them have died in my hands. I know that there is something out there killing our people. I know that this thing is as real as you and I. There is an African saying that says: the poor woman who refuses to see the rapist and who shut her eyes to his ugly presence will not however escape his presence - and we can not fight AIDS by saying it is not there. It is there. We cannot, we dare not, the reality of this disease, which has such a serious impact on our society, which has a disastrous impact on our families. Although this disease is so evil it can be defeated. Just as other diseases in the past was eventually defeated.

People should realize that what we are seeing is actually a repercussion of history. In my younger days diseases such as gonorea/syphiler and TB were as terrible and incurable as AIDS is today and they were eventually defeated. People today complain about anti-aids drugs and in the past I heard people complaining about anti-venereal diseases medicines in the 1930.

There was a time when an African with TB all had left to do, was to go home and die exactly as the case with AIDS today. But people must never forget that the greatest disease people have is their minds and that if we put our minds together we can defeat this ailment. In the darkness today that is South Africa, in the darkness, as death and misery there is however a faint green ray of Hope in a plant called Sutherlandia Furtencens. This plant was known for hundred's of years by the Khoi-Khoi and Khoi Sun as well as African people. It was the plant in older days was the weapon against diseases such as cancer to TB and other diseases. It was also a sedative and a tonic amongst the untold story of Africa.

Credo: "I wish to appeal to the world. First, I am not a quack or a charlatan or a sensationalist. I am an old man who has seen much. I wish the world to know that there is a faint ray of hope that emanates from South Africa.

It is a plant which is almost on the point of extinction, a plant called 'Suderlandia Fructosate'. This plant works miracles on people who have the terrible disease called Aids. And it is so miraculous that the miracles are seen within a week or a fortnight. A person, who was lying down on the point of death, when given this plant, rises and has much energy and is free of depression and has a good appetite. And I feel that as a nation as a matter of world emergency because the big scientists have not produced a viable safe treatment for aids. I say that this plant should be planted by all caring governments, by all caring organizations and that it should be given to human beings free of charge."

Steve: "Absolutely. You know what I think is important though Credo, that people understand what to do with the plant."

Credo: "They don't do nothing sir, you are going to laugh about this. You plant the plant okay, but then you take the little leaves from it and you put them in a tea cup and you pour much boiling water on it. And then you let the cup stand there, like tea you know, and you just drink, the patient just drinks."

Steve: "The leaves and the red flower?"

Credo: "Yah."

Steve: "Mix them together? Do you need to dry them first?"

Credo: "No you can take them straight from the garden, because if you dry them too much they somehow lose some of their good spirit. Now this is all you do. Now, there are good doctors I'm working with who are making pills out of this medicine. But you know sir, I feel we are faced with a national emergency, a world emergency.

You know sir, what I say is this. I can't cure the people of Africa without curing the people of the Caribbean, because Aids is running around the world. If I cure the people here and they get better, more Aids will come in and eat the same people whom I tried to cure. So the whole world must be cured. Look, can we say this? Nobody will arrest us or anything?"

Credo: Thank you sir. I will tell you why. Originally the plant of 'Suderlandia' was all over South Africa. And I will tell you what used to happen. There was a funny little grayish brown bird, which used to feed on 'Suderlandia's and this bird was very edible. And starving people used to hit it with katties (slingshots) and kill it. Now the bird is gone almost. And now... so the land here is difficult to cultivate.

Steve: The seeds are not being spread.

Credo: "Yah, yah. What is happening is you need to take a fine sandpaper and sandpaper each little seed. The seeds are very tiny, tinier than grape seeds. And you sandpaper each seed and you plant it in a small blompot (flower pot). And you allow it to grow until it is about maybe four inches, three inches high. Then you take it and you plant it in the big veld (grassland). You can make a big garden, maybe twenty acres or so and you plant there. They just grow. There are farmers who have already planted them but they are too few. This is a world emergency and we must not be selfish. In the last few years or so there has been many claims made by people about plants and herbs, which they say are beneficial in the fight against aids. Some of these claims have proven to be false and at best have proven to be exaggerations. But in South Africa there is plan, which is on the brink of extinction. This plant is called by white people in English 'Suderlandia Fructosate'. This plant is also called by the Afrikaans people 'kankerbos', which means cancer bush or 'kalkoenbos', which means turkey bush. Now this plant was known in South Africa and other parts of Sub-Saharan Africa for thousands of years. It was an anti-depressant, it was appetite booster, it was also and still is a dramatic booster of the human immune system. For many years African people and Xhoi-xhoi people and Xhoi-san people as well as Bantu people used this plant in the fight against cancer, and it was very effective there, and it still is. And they used it also in the fight against diseases like tuberculosis before there was streptomycin and other drugs to fight tuberculosis. In the old days when ordinary venereal disease like gonorrhea, syphilis and others were as incurable as AIDS is today, our people used this plant to fight those diseases. If they had not had this plant, the black people of Southern Africa would have been destroyed just as the Australian Aborigines were destroyed, and other races of aboriginal people in other parts of the world were brought to extinction by diseases brought in from Europe. Now, we have found... me and a group of doctors, doctors like Dr Nigel Gerica , Dr Ben van Wyk, Dr Albrecht, Dr Mayeng. We looked at this plant and we found that it was having dramatic impact in creating a better quality of life. People with full-blown aids, people who had been sent home to die. Not only did we, the five of us, use the plant to help many people to a better quality of life within the space of a month or a fortnight. There is a lady in a hospital in Zululand, a white lady who has saved many, many people who have been condemned to die of Aids in this hospital. Then I also have my student, Virginia Ratele, who has saved many people who were condemned to die of aids. She has done this in her tribal village near the town of Kuruman. There is something very strange that is happening now. I and Virginia, who live amongst the mountains of the Magaliesberg, are being terrorized and threatened by white men who are very professional in the way they do this. They are able to neutralize the security lights and the alarms with which the house in which we live are fitted. They are able to break in through the doors even though we put devices in the keyholes to stop people from doing so. These are not your run of the mill thieves; they are professional men who know exactly what they are doing. I feel that all of human kind is facing an emergency, and that all greed and selfishness should be swept away, and this plant should be made available to nations in the world. The way the plant grows, I know it can grow in Nazareth, in the United States, India and in China and in other places where Aids is rampant. I do not claim that this plant, dramatic as the results are is the cure for Aids. I say it is a stopgap, which must be used by all human kind in order to halt the disease of Aids. Until such a time as the pharmaceutical scientists can come up with a real cure, a cure which is not at all toxic. I say that this plant 'Suderlandia' is not at all toxic. It was even used by men such as President Paul Kruger of the South African Republic of 1899 or thereabouts. And Paul Kruger who used this plant lived to be a very old man, and at one time Paul Kruger tried to send a consignment of 'Suderlandia' to save the life of a German Prince who had cancer of the throat. But the ship that sailed from Mozambique was too slow and arrived too late to save the prince. I say this that the United Nations should take over the growing of this plant because we are faced with a world emergency. We are faced with a disease which devastates all of human kind without thinking. And we have got to stop Aids not only in Africa but in other parts of the world too. This disease has got to be stopped; it is not a natural disease. I have dealt with Aids now for the last five years and I now firmly believe, I Credo Mutwa, that Aids is a manmade disease. The way it behaves in the human body is like no God created ailment ever does. The disease shows a Satanic intelligence and I appeal to all people throughout the world, that here in South Africa is a faint ray of hope, which is however to be drowned by greed, by selfishness and cowardly secretiveness. I say that this plant belongs to all humankind. It belongs to the little children dying of Aids; it belongs to the men and women who are ravaged by this ailment. And I believe firmly that scientists will be able to create a cure for Aids out of this plant. And I am making this worldwide appeal because our government appears totally indifferent to this offer, which I am making freely for all humanity. Our government does not seem to be able to take the one step, to have this plant planted throughout South Africa as a matter of national emergency. One 'Suderlandia plant' is capable of treating 10 people, and we need plantations of this plant. And I say that this plant should not be the plaything of greedy businessmen. It should not be the plaything of thieving pharmaceutical organizations that steal Africa's treasures and lock them up in computers and call them their intellectual property. I say this that this plant belongs to all the humankind, and that the greedy organizations leave it alone. We do not need a disease like Aids to reduce the population of the world. I am told that this disease was created specifically to destroy Africa and I now believe this. After more than five years of dealing with this disease. And I say this. I will not allow Africa, a misunderstood and misrepresented nation, a misunderstood and misrepresented continent, to perish, to suit the designs of conspirators. I say that Africa must live, I say that India must live, China must live, and even the United States must live. There is hope, a little ray of hope, a green ray of hope, emanating from South Africa, and I call on all human fellow human beings to make it larger, to spread hope throughout the world. I beg to remind all that there was once a time malaria devastated whole communities throughout the middle east, throughout Africa and elsewhere. And out of South America there appeared a ray of hope, which grew, larger and larger. That ray of hope was called the bark of the Cinchona tree, quinine. And quinine saved thousands of lives, which would have otherwise been swept into oblivion. I say that people should not look upon me as a quack or a crank. I am a researcher, self-taught. I am a writer of books, which have sold worldwide. I am an inventor and a historian and a traditional healer. And I say please, those who don't believe me come to South Africa and look at this plant yourself. I say that no organization has the right to call this plant it's property, none. And I say let hope for humankind be lighted from the southern tip of Africa to overspread the whole planet. If AIDS were created to reduce the human population, then it is a self-defeating thing. The only way to make people breed less is to end war in the world. When there is war shaking continents people breed more. People breed out of fear. People breed out of insecurity. You, the hypocrites of the United Nations, you the liars within the walls of the United Nations, you, I challenge you to create a safer world and not a world rotten with disease.

(Living Lakes Conference, October 2, 1999, US Forest Service Mono Lake Visitor's Center, Lee Vining, California, USA. The following text was transcribed from an audio recording. The speech includes Zulu words for people, places, and things that are spelled phonetically in italics.)

As we say in our country Bash-on-e-payg which is a completely asexual way to address those who we respect. I stand before you as a man who is stunned and shaken by what he has seen, what he has heard, and what he has experienced. First of all, did you know, you who live around Lake Mono, that your lake joins together Africa and the Native American people? Did you know that the most amazing word I heard when I arrived here was the word Inyo? Which is said to mean the dwelling place of the creator, or rather, the place of creation. Did you know that that word occurs in Africa as a reference to the sacred organ of a mother? Did you know that the word Mono is a name for something delicious and nutritious that you eat? Perhaps one day if I return this way I shall share more of these things with you.

Shumenitch-y means "the one," and no matter who we are, no matter in which part of the world we dwell, we are one. We are one with each other. We are one with the earth. We are one with the moon, the sun. We are one with the stars. Please, please remember that. It is useless to conserve entities such as water and trees if you have severed yourself away from those entities. You cannot conserve something which you do not feel within you. You cannot conserve something which is not part of you.

When I was initiated for the first time in 1937 into the mysteries and knowledge of Mother Africa I was ordered by my teacher, who was my aunt, to go outside and fill a small clay pot with water. Then she said to me, "Look into the water--what do you see?" I was caught in a trap because an initiate is not supposed to have an ego. An initiate is not supposed to refer to himself. I said, "Aunt, I see a person in this water." She said, "Who is that person?" I did not dare say it was me. I said, "It is the person I know who is the son of my mother, the only son." And she said, "Yes, you are in this water, and the water is in you. Until you know that, that you and the water are one, you must not even drink the water, you must not even think about it, because you have cut yourself off from it."

Respected ones, no matter where you go in Africa you will find African people referring to water by a very interesting name indeed. In the language of the Swahili people in Kenya, water is called ma-gee. In the language of my people the Zulu's, water is called amanze. And in the language of the Besutu people of Esutu in a small kingdom in South Africa, water is called mazte. And all of these words mean one thing no matter where you go: the fluid of creation, the thing that did something, the thing that caused something to be.

In olden days Africans used to risk their lives in protecting water. In olden days our people used to severely punish anyone they caught urinating into a stream or a river. There are some ants which you find in my country, they are called ma-the-bella ants. When you hold one in your hands it looks as fat as myself, and it fights like nobody's business. And if you were caught, wise guy, making water into the water, one of those babies was taken, and made to bite you on your thing, closing the hole for several hours, and it will be the biggest lesson you will ever learn.

Africans used to say that no punishment is too severe for somebody who murders nature. There are trees in South Africa and in other parts of Africa which you are not allowed to cut. And sometimes this thing is carried to such extreme ends even now, that one day, I, Credo Mutwa, was brought before a chief and accused of murder. It was a really serious charge, and after a trial which lasted for three days. I was acquitted because I pleaded that I was guilty but insane. The holy person whom I had murdered had interfered with my dinner, which in the Credo Mutwa book is a mortal crime. Now, who was the holy person? It was a fly, an ordinary housefly. In South Africa, there is a tribe called the Bahune-bamata who even today will charge you with murder if they find you hurting a fly.

Honorable ones, our people believe many strange things regarding water. They believe that water is a living entity. That water has got a mind, that it remembers. The reason why a lake forms where it is, the reason why a river flows through where it flows, is not because it happens to be the right place for water to flow--no! It is because in that place where the river flows, there is an energy, an invisible spirit that moves like a snake, under the ground through the fine sand and which moves in the direction opposite to the one down which the river flows. If this great fire snake, as we call it, this unseen energy, if it dies, then the river dies too. We are told that lakes form where they form because there is an agreement between the water and certain types of rock.

In the language of my people, the Zulus, a lake is called Icibi. Now this word icibi gave birth to the verb icibella which means, "to patch." If there is a hole in a cloth and you put a patch on it, that patch is called icibi, and you, icibella. Now why do we say that a lake is a repairer? We believe that a lake controls the life forces of all living things around it. A lake controls the life forces of every bird, every fish, every tiny creature that you find in water, and it also controls and stimulates the life forces of bigger animals up to and including human beings that they are of the same. And each time there is an illness in the land, our kings used to prevail upon the tribespeople to go closer to lakes, to get into that field. There is an invisible field of power all around a lake. If you take off your clothes and moisten your skin slightly and walk into that field, you will feel a tingling. That is what we call the spirit of the water, the icibi, the repairer of life.

Our people believe that there is a music, a sort of communication that goes on between streams, and rivers, and lakes. If you destroy a lake, say about 20 miles away from another one, this music is cut off and the lake that you have destroyed dies, and so does another lake which has been in communication with it.

Ladies and gentleman, many, many times in Africa, when I started fighting to preserve what I thought was sacred, I was often snarled at, ridiculed, and even beaten up as a superstitious heathen. But I was only preaching what my grandfathers had preached. I was only preaching what our mothers had taught us: that water is sacred. It is the life-blood of the great mother. It should not be dammed or in any way interfered with because if that is done, the water dies.

Our people say that water is the first thing that happens to you. It is also the thing that happens to you throughout your life. And it will be the last thing that will happen to you. When you are born, you are bathed, and thus, you are married to the spirit of water. When you leave, you take-in water and you become one with it. You drink, you wash, and you clean your clothes. You drink in the spirit of water whether you like it or not, or whether you believe in the spirit or not. Our people also believe that when you die, you are bathed with water, not to clean you up, because who needs to clean something that has kicked the bucket in the first place? But you do need to be bathed so you can quickly go into the village of judgment and advance to reincarnation. We say that a dead body which has not been bathed will not be able to reincarnate.

Our people further say that water has got ears. We have a proverb amongst my people that says: he who makes love to another man's wife on the bank of a river must be careful not to utter loud and stupid noises. Because why? Because water. If there is a fierce emotion near a stream, that stream somehow records it. And guess what will happen? What you did near the river will be heard by every person in the surrounding villages one day. And you will wonder how they got to hear about it.

In South Africa there is a range of mountains called the Devaterbergh Mountains. There are many springs and fountains of water, and there were many more in the past. And when you come to the water mountains and you sit alone in total solitude, you are going to hear clearly the sounds of ancient battles which were fought in that area. You will hear horses screaming, sabers clashing, and you will hear warriors shouting and people dying in pain. You will hear that because water has got ears.

Ladies and Gentlemen, there is much I could share with you. But our people say that he who talks too much makes people tired. I am not here to make you tired. I am here to tell you this: let us by all means conserve the beautiful song of nature. Let us regard each lake and each river. Not simply as an interesting stretch of water across whose expanse spoiled millionaires will zip around in their powerboats--no! Let us feel the water, let us hear the water, and let us be one with the water.

Accompanying me is my ritual wife, Nobella. Nobella is capable of finding water. Nobella is what is called a dowser. In Europe she would be honored and here in the United States, but because of rapid death of the black culture in South Africa a person like Nobella stands great chance of being burned to death as a witch. She can find water, and I sometimes play tricks upon her. I will sometimes lead her blindfolded to a place where I know there is a great sewage pipe that passes under the ground and she will find this, and very angrily, and she is a Mantebella with a very fiery temper. She will be furious that the water under her feet is dead and is not sinking to her breasts. Now what does that mean? It means that sewage water is water that is now so overloaded with dead matter that it has died itself. It has died as a living entity. It only lives as a liquid entity that is taking this rubbish to wherever it is going to go.

Ladies and Gentlemen, please, let us bring back the earth. Let us accept one thing which our mothers accepted and our grandfathers knew: that the earth is a living entity where everything is joined to everything else in eternal marriage. And if you destroy something in one part of the world you create a chain of destruction that destroys things somewhere else.

Let me tell you two last things please. One, it is this, that I am told by the great storytellers of our tribes, that fresh water is not native to our earth. That at one time, many thousands of years ago a terrible star, or the kind called Mu-sho-sho-no-no, the star with a very long tail, descended very close upon our skies. It came so close that the earth turned upside down and what had become the sky became down, and what was the heavens became up. The whole world was turned upside down. The sun rose in the south and set in the north. Then came drops of burning black stuff, like molten tar, which burned every living thing on earth that could not escape. After that came a terrible deluge of water accompanied by winds so great that they blew whole mountaintops away. And after that came huge chunks of ice bigger than any mountain and the whole world was covered with ice for many generations. After that the surviving people saw an amazing sight. They saw rivers and streams of water that they could drink, and they saw that some of the fishes that escaped from the sea were now living in these rivers. That is the great story of our forefathers. And we are told that this thing is going to happen again very soon. Because the great star, which is the lava of our sun, is going to return on the day of the year of the red bull, which is the year 2012.

Well. I'm glad I won't be there to see the fun. My wish is this: that there may be blessing over everything that you have done, over everything that you are going to do. May whatever power there is beyond the stars strengthen your efforts, because each lake that you bring back to life is a whole world saved.

Thank you.

News for the Soul

Credo: Who, however, are so afraid of our, our advance in certain fields of human being that they do everything in their power to suppress us. Just as the Western nations knew who the Africans really were, knew what the Africans had done, but they deliberately kept the knowledge away from the Africans. For example, far beyond England are islands far beyond the ...? and on those stone fragments, the people of those island say that those were erected by black men, but the English people arriving in Africa pretended not to acknowledge the effect. But to the North west of the country, islands that were once visited, the African was denied his own true identity, just like some alien entities are denying us the truth about ourselves and the importance of ourselves, pushing us into fear.

And they are actually blinding us. What am I saying, then? When we were young children, we were being forced to be vaccinated. We had to go to the local admission station where we were vaccinated, and our grandmothers protested against it, saying the children were being spiritually blinded. And it turned out to be true. Many Africans that were given these scaremongering vaccines became spiritually deaf and blind. They no longer saw nature's spirits. Only parents who protected us, who used to apply maze to cause blisters, so that when the officers saw them, they thought we had been vaccinated, so in fact, they did not give us vaccines. We were prevented from being spiritually blinded.

Credo: All I can say is that any disease vaccines, especially a thing called "Yellow fever" - which you can't travel to certain countries without being given - these people become spiritually affected. Another thing that affects these people is that when you want to a trading store, the shopkeeper used to give you what is called bonzeelsa. These are lumps of food that are given to children. They became addicted to this food, and these people became spiritually blind. I remember in the 1950s we were told not to buy it. We would accept it, and were told when we went out into the bushes to throw it away. This is sheer cold, ugly superstition. This is part of a strategy that is being pursued now by whatever powers that exist. It would be interesting for Icke to hear that today, out of anger, I went to a lawyer to seek advice over something that is happening to me, in terms of the AIDS pandemic. It should be known by all of humanity and not hidden under a blanket.

Icke: He is talking about vaccines making it much more difficult to get into a multidimensional level - this sugar, in our food and drink. What they must do to hold us in the five sense reality is to prevent us from moving out of this mode. We are being bombarded so we find it much harder to see who we are, so we look only into the physical world to see who we are.

Groups of countries are played off against each other is a common technique. We are desperate to survive on paying the mortgage and worrying about conflict so we do not challenge the system. Those who do fight need to realise that they are all facing the same problem: society being held in spiritual servitude. It's all about disconnecting us from the full magnitude as to who we are. We are only droplets of the ocean. Once we wake up to how the manipulators' power is falling. They are starting to panic - this chitahauri. The agenda for centralised global dictatorship - fundamental to this is closing us down spiritually - the next few years are going to be a very interesting time to be here. He predicted the Kennedy assassination and 9/11. Doing this is possible if we are unlocked spiritually.

Host: How do you do this, Credo?

Credo: I don't know. It's a gift. I don't like it. I am not proud of it. It has made a misery of my life. All I know is that everyone throughout my family - and other black people - have had this gift. But because the Christians do not like it, we hide it. We try to suppress it. In other words, we are helping the enemy to help enslave us out of fear. I have heard many white people boasting about their psychic power. They shouldn't. It is a horrendous responsibility. It is something all humans used to have. It is not an enjoyable experience, honourable lady. It only shows that this universe is more mysterious than we like to think. It is not really something that one ought to boast about. It is showing how the universe is falling. Once everybody could see into the future. Africa is full of prophets who made predictions. One black woman predicted that black men would rule south Africa again. Her predictions were so disturbing to the British empire that they ordered the arrest of this black woman. She was raped in a lunatic asylum and she died for this. They put her in an asylum. This wonderful woman even named Mandela before he came about. The obsessive fear about prophets haunted the British through their private consultations. I wish that you, honourable one, I wish that human beings would go back to what they used to be. We full from a godly state to a slave state. We fled from people who once sailed the seas to people who are frightened of their own shadows today. We must go back to that time and understand man should fall no more. Man and woman should go back to the days of those human beings that raised great pyramids in Egypt and Peru. These were human beings that used their God given talents. We should go back to that. Africa needs to go back to that time and be an agent of peace on this planet.

Icke: I realise why Credo thinks his powers are a curse. When the British went into these societies - whether it be the Native Americans, Central America, South Africa, Australia - wherever they went, one of their key goals was to destroy the knowledge their. They killed the Shaman, which is why his knowledge went underground into a network of secret societies. They wanted to destroy that knowledge. They were terrified of it because it holds the knowledge that could set us free. We are not Credo Mutwa or David Icke. We are infinite conscious. They have to destroy our amazing infinite knowledge, as well as putting crap into the food and vaccines. If we did not have the potential to be that God-like entity then they would not have to work so hard to suppress our infinite selves. I've used this analogy before: if you put the ball in the tank of water, just like we should be infinite. To keep the ball in the bottom of the tank, you have to hold it there. If you leave it, it will go to the bottom of the tank naturally. Over time we have been bombarded mentally, physically and spiritually to hold us at the bottom of the tank. Uncovering the methods of suppression should not be ignored. Every time I talk to Credo about the African experience, it is such a microcosm of how the humans have been held down. But I KNOW, that now is the time that we are in the true time of transformation.

Host: Do you have a recommended list of safe foods?

Icke: I do. I think we can cope with a certain amount. What happens when it gets overwhelmed - what I call the Norton Anti-Virus - the immune system, when overwhelmed, we get in a situation when we get in trouble. I eat non chemical food and eat purified water. I keep chemicals out of my body. When travelling around, I can cope with it - hard to ignore McDonalds. So it can cope, but then I make it healthy most of the time, when I'm at home. I saw my son, playing football, and the stuff in the coke was like a chemical formula, and they were all just washing it back like nothing. It is no wonder we are seeing increasing behaviour problems among children - because they're being poisoned. They are being chemically re-wired. So what do we do? We give them even worse drugs, so off we go in this downward spiral. The great problem is not juvenile delinquency, it's adult! Most of the delinquents are in government. We do this by not forcing stuff on them, but giving them the info they need. The parents pour this crap on them, and wonder why they behave like they do. I feel for these children, because there are some incredible children being born now, being able to retain this multidimensional state. They are targeting this children because they know they then have the adults that become. We need to protect them from what is being done.

Host: OK, let's talk about throwing the bones. Explain. You said that's important.

Icke: I believe in not imposing on other people. If you like something, keep doing it as long as you don't affect others. I think that's a good philosophy. They gave a great energy. Credo starting reading them. To him, it was a storybook. Credo, how does it work?

Credo: I don't know. But all one has to do is - I don't know the English word - we must go deep into a certain part of the human body where there is a broad tower residing in every part of the human. This is in all of us, where all fear is banished. When you are in this golden place - where you see up, down, future, present, where you see everything- where there is full love and you see all eternity. I can not describe it, only calling it the golden cave. You are one with everything. Then, you feel that when the things talk to you. Even now, there are Christian priests, even those of the Roman Church, tell the children not to listen to what we do. These, they say - certain things - not to even drink the medicines we drink, because these are the devil's... The God knowledge in all of goes on even now. One The words that David Icke just said made me cry. Something is happening in Southern Africa that should be investigated by all human beings that care about humanity. South Africa has been brought a kind of GM (Genetically Modified) corn. This maze, mam, is highly poisonous. It makes human beings highly violent. It is the ingredient of junk food that our children are forced to eat. South African governments have rejected this. So, to get around the problem, it has been falsely labelled as (translation): "This is just normal maze". It came not from Africa, but from America. It was brought by the slave raiders to Africa. It made people huge, big massive, but dumb, weak-minded and extremely aggressive. Some of the most aggressive tribes in Africa- my own people, the Zulus – became very warlike, because they adopted this alien graze. But in this battle against AIDS – that the last true heroes of Africa are fighting – we say that you should not eat maze, but eat the ancient graze, most anciently known to Africa. By eating it, health increases dramatic. They increase in size and become not self-hating. This kind of human hating goes on still now. I am a painter of pictures and I am the only black person in all of South Africa that casts his own wax in metals. But did you know that I am not allowed to sell any of this, because I portray things – that I appear as if I portray things that certain powers do not want to see exist. There is a war against the ancient knowledge of humans, the winged mind. My aunt is gone – 104 years. My wife Cecilia – she died with a mysterious needle. And my sister is dead. I was told a falsehood that she had died in a car accident, but there was no car near where she died. Why? Mary protested against the crime of the Catholic Church, which discourages SAFE SEX BEING PRACTISED BY AFRICANS!! Why does the Catholic Church allow of this, she said. And she paid for it with her life. I wish that this wife could be exposed in all of its disgustingness. All these people are dying. I feel angry. How can people feel so blind to these hostile alien entities disguising themselves as alien invasions?

Host: David?

Icke: Wow, just hearing Credo talk there. Everything he says connects to the same subject of human knowledge. Me and Nicole [the host] talked about this silent cave, the golden cave, where you go to see beyond what most can see. What he was saying about GM food and maze was amazing. What I've been saying for years is that GM food is designed to genetically modify US! It PLAYS WITH OUR DNA! For some reason they are targeting the black people, for some reason, particularly in Africa. When you read PNAC, it is just like reading the last 5 years of the Bush administration. It talks about the need to invade Iraq, Iraq, North Korea and Iran – known as the axis of evil. You follow this document and the course of what is going on now. It also talks about creating weapons that target specific genotypes. They are targeting them with AIDS. What is AIDS? You don't die of AIDS. You die of the immune related disease, as it break down your system. It is a concentrated attack against the African immune system. Instead of doing this, you should go along the lines of improving the immune system. You need to find the solution for this. Credo found a solution for this which proved to be incredibly successful. But this is difficult to implement, because the people in power need to fight against this. We are faced with a series of coldly calculated actions. If we can remove the powers that create these things, they will go away. I must emphasise this: I'm tired of hearing people coming from the spiritual direction, that are in complete denial of what is going on in this planet which they do not think are very pleasant. The real reality is not running away from what we don't like. We need to remove what is denying and removing the spirituality of everyone else. We need to actually get involved in changing the world instead of allowing it. Just my opinion.

Host: And what would we go about changing?

Icke: Fighting is no good. What the matrix wants us to do is fight. It takes two to fight. As someone said in sixties, what if we had a war and no one turned up? It's about removing the source of it. As Ghandi said, it's about not co-operating with the system. If we would not touch the aspartame-ridden soft drinks and refused to touch GM food and refused to take part in wars of conquest – but are about further imprisoning – then there would be no war to conquest. George Bush and Tony Blair are not out fighting wars. They are in their office smoking cigarettes. There should be a law that anyone who declares war should have to go on the frontline. We are cooperating with our own imprisonment. This is why staying rural is so key. We need to stop buying their crap, and if we did, the corporations would have no one to sell it to. If we stop cooperating, the system would fall.

Credo: I cannot and do not have the right to dictate to people what they have the right to do and not do. I say to all the world – my brothers and sisters – whether you are white or black or brown, we are in great danger. Too many people, as Icke said – these should be written into stone – we human beings are blinded. We refuse to see certain things and are conditioned not to see others. For example, the conspiracy is not simply a dream in the minds of deranged people. I never believed such a thing myself. I used to think that it is just white people talking. I am not a victim of my own ignorance. Look at the world. Look at India and look at Africa. India underwent the same form of spiritual undermining that Africa went through. However, India has today recovered its dignity as a people and a nation. And for some reason that I can't understand, India has been allowed – I SAY, ALLOWED – has been allowed to possess nuclear weapons. It has been allowed to possess huge iron wegs. There is even an Indian that I saw in a picture who works on steel in a large scale. However, Africa – whose mind is the same as India's – is entrenched in endless, engineered wars from outside. They gain no one anything. And today I see a new danger for Africa. There is now talk – emanating from the West – that terrorists have now entered terrorists. In other words, Africa is now the next country to fall victim to Western open neocolonisation, where Africa's people will be wiped off the face of the Earth. The Western nations will allow war, famine and disease to run rampant in Africa. What we are seeing now is that Africa is going to be sterilised, in wars in which Africans will carry the blame. Same with diseases. And yet these wars, famine and disease come from outside. We must understand that we stand in danger from mortal danger. Among the people that talk to me, people say that there is more oil underground than there is in the entire Middle East. There is also a metal that carries in its hands the future of all the oil-producing nations of the Middle East. That metal is platinum, which Africa will be destroyed over. We have already lost my children. I weep tears which will be wiped off my eyes by no one. We are being destroyed. An enemy has declared war upon us. We are being killed by AIDS and by wars that I appeal. Please, look at the truth. Do not go into denial, by brothers and sisters. Nations are being dessimated in front of you. Open your eyes. Do not let the children of the reptile destroy us. We can win. Open your eyes.

Icke: Africa has been destroyed in terms of its history. Tony Blair, one of the great manipulators of the war in Iraq, and Afganistan and what have you, he has now said that his desire and passion is to save Africa. When he says something – you reverse it. So he means he wants to finish it off. He wants to destroy Africa. These guys want to destroy Africa’s knowledge and profit from its resources.

The solution is people waking up. It is also mentally waking up and seeing what is actually happening. It’s like a veil. A lot of that veil is denial. You just don’t want to look at it. It’s a version of “shut up, don’t want to hear it”. At the same time, knowledge is being destroyed to keep that ignorance perpetuated. We need to get information around the suppression of the mainstream media. We need to wake up from our hypnotic slumber state. We are trying to do this – me, you, Credo and others. I realise the challenge of this. Our own prison wardens will hand over the keys to us. We’re going to see some incredible changes. Some of them terrible and some of them incredibly inspirational.

Host: Thank you all for joining us on newsforthesoul. Perhaps we can do this again sometime.

Credo: Amen to that.

Icke: That was so powerful that interview, Nicole. I could feel it has an energy about it. I could feel it. This is why we’ve been brought together.

Host: Exactly.

The Theft of the Necklace of Mysteries

DAVID ICKE (DI): Hello. I'm at the home of Credo Mutwa, a fantastic man who it's been my privilege to know for a very, very long time. A Zulu Sanusi ... what some people know better as a shaman, but it's a high shaman. This man is a library on legs when it comes to African knowledge, and anyone that's read my books, or seen my talks, will see how much information this man has to share with the world. And one of the artifacts which has been highlighted many times in my books, because I think it's so significant, is something called the Necklace of the Mysteries. It's the one with all the symbols hanging from it, which tell the story of humanity and the story of Africa. The extraterrestrial figure and the human women figure, and the interbreeding between the two, all that story that I've told many times, thanks to Credo sharing it with me. Well, I have to tell you, this ... necklace, which is mentioned five hundred years ago in accounts and Credo says is a thousand years old or more, is now no longer with him. It was taken away from him, in Swaziland, by people who ... tortured him, in effect, pulling his fingernails off, or trying to, and some threatening to kill him. Well, Credo survived, thank goodness, but the necklace is still with these thugs, and whoever was behind and orchestrating these thugs. If you have any information about its whereabouts, would you please contact me at an email address, DavidIckeContact@aol.com, it's all one word, DavidIckeContact@aol.com, and let me know any information you may have about the whereabouts of this amazing, amazing artifact. And now, let's hear Credo tell the story of what happened, and how important this necklace is to him ... and indeed, the story of humanity in general. Credo, could you tell us the story of what happened, from when it all started. Tell us what happened, from the start, leading up to now.

CREDO MUTWA (CM): Yes sir. I was repeatedly phone called by a young man, who really was pestering the life out of me. This young man said he kept on having dreams about how I should take him to Swaziland. About how he had great ancestors, whom he wanted the help of. He phoned us every night until I got very angry. And then, he got himself friends who pestered me, on his behalf. And in the end, they said, it has been said by white people that I am a traitor, who takes black knowledge, and hands it to white enemies of the black people. I said, 'That's nonsense.' The insinuation even went on that I was not even a Zulu. And tribalism and racism is rife in South Africa today. People can be killed like dogs, if their lineage or tribe, or family are in doubt. I said to this young man, 'What do you really want with me? What do you want?' He said, 'I want to see you. I want you to give to us the necklace of secret knowledge.' I said, 'You are mad. I'm not going to part with that thing. I don't know who told you about it.' He said, 'But you are showing it to white people. We, who are black like you, you discriminate against.'

And that's how it started, sir. I decided to confront these people. It turned out that there were many. I decided to confront these people, and foolish quixotic donkey that I am, I took the Necklace of the Mysteries, and the Walking Stick of the Grandfathers with me.

DI: And you got on a train to Swaziland.

CM: Yes, sir, I went there. And they met me there. And they ... took me to their home. I did not know that I was going to face a mob, sir. I did not know that I was going to be put on trial like a criminal. That is where they started taking my nails from my hands away.

DI: They were pulling your nails off?

CM: Yes.

DI: What happened?

CM: You know sir, it was just sheer, bloody cruelty. They wanted to see. In fact, these people had been sent to kill me, by some white people. White people who had offered them a lot of money for this necklace. It was a nightmare. But circumstances saved me beyond the terrible pain I was going through.

DI: You were telling me someone sat on your hand, and then someone else was pulling...

CM: I was sitting...

DI: ...your fingernails off.

CM: ...I was sitting on the chair, sir, when this boy sat up on my arm. It was a, you know these wicker chairs.

DI: Yeah.

CM: And this one sat on my arm, and suddenly I felt a terrible pain. He was pulling my nail with a pliers. But he broke the nail in two places. I said, 'You want to kill me, don't you? That's what you brought me here for. But let me tell you that I am a Sanusi. I am a descendant of Ungoza. I'm a descendant of Sifele. I am a pure-blooded Zulu. And I am not afraid to die.' 'Let me tell you, that you, who are pulling my nail out of my fingers, you are sick. There is something sick about you. You are very, very close to death.' He started screaming, saying 'What?! What?!' I said, 'You are close to death.' I could see shadows in his eyes. I could see something else. I smelled a strange smell: the smell of a person who is on the last stage of AIDS. I said, 'Touch another nail in my finger, and you are going to die, shitting like a dog. Go on, do it.' Then there started an angry, an angry uproar. Some said I should be stabbed to death. I said, 'Stab me to death, within two hours, one of you will die, and that is you.' He started screaming, and he ran out of the house, and he ... it was just a uproar, sir. I wish you were there to see. People were quarreling with each other now. Some said, 'Let this man go. Can't you see he's got an evil spirit? How did he know that you, you are going to have such a stomach ache? How did he know that you have got caught AIDS?' I said, 'I can see. Kill me. I'm not afraid. I have no friends here. Go on.' They took the necklace. I was too weak to carry it out. They took the necklace and the stick, and on the following morning, I was very, very sick. A group of the women escorted me to the station. I was put on the train, they tried to be nice to me, but I just was ... I was out of this world. I no longer knew what was happening, or what was happening.

DI: And they kept the Necklace of the Mysteries.

CM: Yes, sir.

DI: The necklace of the knowledge.

CM: Yes, sir.

DI: And you've never had any idea where it is since then?

CM: No. Because I have not left here since then, sir.

DI: What does that necklace mean to you?

CM: Sir, these necklaces ... are the Bible of the black people. These necklaces are ... we learned from them. Things that you don't learn in any school to ... to white people. These necklaces are alive, sir. They were made by women. That is why they consist of copper. Copper is a female metal. That is why they consist of the green stone, jadeite, which was also handled by women.

DI: And it's very old, isn't it?

CM: It is, sir. It is.

DI: I think you told me once you thought it was at least a thousand years old.

CM: Yes, sir. Yes, sir. Yes.

DI: And what effect has it had on you? I mean, how has it made you feel, since ... because I know we've talked about this many times...

CM: I am broken. You know, Mr. David, my heart is broken, sir. I felt I did a stupid thing, and I should have paid for it with my own life. Imagine taking a thing like this into the hands of drunken swine.

DI: But you didn't know that, did you?

CM: No. I thought they were royal people. I thought they were good people. I thought they were adult people, Sangomas and Inyangas. But they were young hooligans.

DI: And what... You told me that there was a white person in the background. Are you...

CM: Yes, sir.

DI: What was that about?

CM: I don't know, Mr. David. But I can draw that white man.

DI: What was he doing? What was he...

CM: He was with them. They appeared to be having some kind of a drinking or whatever thing. But that white man, sir, he ... he wasn't just a white tote. He ... he had purpose behind him. And I noticed another thing: it was he who appeared to be crazy about the necklace. He seemed to be freaking out, if you know what I mean.

DI: And he seemed to be orchestrating it, did he?

CM: Yes, sir.

DI: And they, they didn't seem to like me, for some reason, you were telling me.

CM: Sir?

DI: They didn't like me, for some reason.

CM: Yes. They asked me, where are you. I say, 'I don't know. Angazi. [Zulu for 'I don't know.'] I don't know where Mr. David Icke is.' They said, 'But doesn't he write to you?' I said, 'You can search my post office. I don't even own a cell phone. I've only got a real phone.'

DI: And what was their problem with me, then?

CM: I don't know, sir. But somehow, the way they were afraid of you. That's very funny, Mr. David. I asked, 'Have you ever seen Mr. David Icke?' They said, 'No.' I said, 'Then why are you shit-scared of him for?' He didn't answer me.

DI: I was the 'White Satan,' wasn't I, according to them?

CM: Sir?

DI: The 'White Satan,' wasn't it, they called me?

CM: Yes, you white devil.

DI: The white devil.

CM: Mmh.

DI: Because, I guess, you're sharing information with me, and it's only supposed to be for one group of people instead of for the world.

CM: But sir, there's something that really, really worried me. I only thought about that afterwards. Mr. David, these people, the black people looked ordinary black people, sick looking. But that white man ... no, sir. Let me ... let me try and work out. He looked... he was smaller than you, and he looked not quite man-like. You know?

DI: How do you mean?

CM: He looked... what's the, what is the English word ... he looked like a fairy, Mr. David Icke.

DI: Mm-hm.

CM: He looked not normal [unclear, sounds like 'jigjig'] real man. He was something between a boy and a man. You know, he had protruding teeth. And when he spoke, he seemed to twist his mouth in a certain way. He was not sexually normal. I'm not a judge of white people, but there was something very odd about that man.

DI: What would you say now, to the people that have the Necklace of the Mysteries? What would you say to them?

CM: I say, 'You have stolen something that comes from the old gods. You have taken something that even I have no right to. I was given this thing as a custodian of it. I swore ... you have taken this thing, like thieves in the night. Within a short while, something interesting is going to happen to all of you. I see one of you dead under a blue car. It is you, with the protruding teeth. You, who never spoke, who spoke with a hissing sound on his, on...' as if his teeth were a bit drunk.

DI: And if they want to avoid that, they bring it back.

CM: They had better bring it back. They had better bring it back. This I swear by my mother's breasts. The Necklace of the Mysteries belongs to no one. Not even I, who am the keeper of it. 'Bring it back. You were sent to take it away. You were sent by someone. Who it is, I don't know, but I will dream about them, and I will know who they are. You called me a sellout, a traitor, who licks the backsides of white men. You are the traitors.'

If you know ANYTHING about the theft of this priceless, ancient artifact, of inestimable value to the story of Africa and the human race – but very likely now in the hands of white man who are only interested in money... please contact DavidIckeContact@aol.com in full confidence.

Baba Vusamazulu Credo Mutwa on Barack Obama

Zulu shaman, or sanusi, Credo Mutwa, has written a poem to express his thoughts on what he sees as the true nature of Barack Obama and the agenda for Africa and the world that he represents.

* * *

beneath a demon's gown.*

false.*

Son of a woman in whose veins flows the blood of ancient Ireland and dark Africa's plains.

You are Obama, nick-named the standing king, You are Barack, oh, son born to deceive

The suffering hoards of Africa look up to you, See a black saviour where nought but a Judas strides.

*An entrapper of nations, bringer of dismal war behind the robes and the nylon
wings of hope*

Oh, may those who look upon you, see you as you are. May those who hope in you behold you as you be

A prince deceitful to bring down Africa's shrines

A siren who leads Africa's ships onto rocks of obliteration.

Your rule my lord will not be one of peace

Your reign my king will not be one of smiles

Even as we speak in caves both dark and dank Enraged fanatics plot your dark demise They will put around your head a bloodwet martyr's crown.

Oh black Kennedy following the one before. May God forgive thee and thy fiery spouse

As you walk in silence from the stage of life. Barack Obama, blessed son, Oh standing king.

Challenging Times Ahead

Credo Mutwa is a Prophet that foresaw the Twin Tower attack on 9/11. He predicted that President Thabo Mbeki would not see out his full term. A very good friend and colleague of Credo's - David Icke - says that he is a genius. As David has stated; an African man who is extremely knowledgeable and talented with Art, Poetry and amazing Sculptures. His stories of our true history and where we actually came from are astounding.

Credo mentioned that Southern Africa birthed Egypt, and not the other way around as has been stated. We come from the stars and South Africa has many ancient sacred sites which are long lost and forgotten that existed more than 100,000 years ago.

He said that Southern Africa will determine the outcome of humanity and that Africa holds the key to our salvation. He also mentioned that 2010 and 2012 will be very important years; it will bring great challenges to us human beings. How we respond and act towards these challenges will determine the outcome. Sadly, he feels that at the moment, we are not doing too well to overcome these challenges and stated that he would rather not be here to see this transformation, as this will be a time of great suffering for his people. Credo said that the present President of South Africa, Mr. Jacob Zuma will be the last black President of South Africa. If this is true, then something dramatic has to happen in South Africa for this to actually come to pass. Can it be changed? "Yes, but I cannot see it change by the way we are carrying on at the present moment".

Credo Mutwa and the Alien Agenda: UFOs and Alien Abduction in the Eyes of a Zulu Shaman

© By LOUIS PROUD

The Zulu sangoma (a shaman or healer) and high sanusi (clairvoyant and lore-master) Vusamazulu Credo Mutwa is recognised by many as one of the most distinguished African traditional healers around today. He is, in fact, the spiritual leader of the sanusis and sangomas of South Africa.

As well as being a successful artist, author and historian, Mutwa is also an outspoken victim of alien abduction, having allegedly been in contact by entities his people call the mantindane ('the tormentors'), which are similar in nature to what we in the English speaking world call 'the grays'. Stories of UFOs and alien beings make up a big part of African tribal culture, he says.

AWAKENER OF THE ZULUS

Mutwa was born on July 21, 1921 in the South African province of Natal. The name Vusamazulu means 'awakener of the Zulus', and was appointed to Mutwa during his initiation as a sangoma. Mutwa means 'little bush man', and Credo means 'I believe'. Born out of wedlock, Mutwa was considered "an illegitimate child, a child of shame." Because his mother, who was descended from a long line of medicine men and women, refused to convert to Christianity, Mutwa's parents separated shortly after his birth. Thus he was primarily raised by his Roman Catholic father, who frequently travelled from place to place, working as a builder.

Mutwa claims that much of the knowledge he now possesses – of art, science, medicine, engineering and so on – can be attributed to the fact that, when he was child, he was taught by "strange companions." These "little people," he says, some of whom were blue in colour, used to make their presence known to other children as well. In fact, "all African children used to see such things." Thanks to the help of these beings, he says, he was often more knowledgeable than some of his teachers at school.

When, in 1937, Mutwa was brutally raped by a gang of mineworkers outside a mine compound, he experienced "a great shock and trauma," remaining ill for a very long time. He developed a feverish condition, accompanied by nightmares and visions, which caused great pain and debilitation, and which, he says, almost killed him. It also caused him to become highly psychic, and he was sometimes able to read the minds of those around him, as well as perceive auras. The treatment he received from European doctors and Christian faith healers didn't help at all.

Shortly afterwards, Mutwa was brought to his mother's village in Zululand, where his grandfather, Ziko Shezi, a sangoma and warrior – "whom my father despised as a heathen and a demon worshipper" – brought him back to health using traditional African methods. Mutwa was told by his grandfather that the illness he had undergone "had actually been a sacred illness which required that I had to become a shaman, a healer." Mutwa agreed, and, having renounced Christianity, was initiated into the shamanic path by his aunt Myrna, a fully fledged sangoma. Mutwa's 'spiritual sickness' had been part of the initiatory process of becoming a shaman, and is a common aspect of shamanic traditions all over the world.

Sadly, when his father and stepmother learned that he had become a 'heathen', they immediately disowned him, telling him "never to set foot in their home again." Virtually alone and homeless, Mutwa began to travel "for knowledge, in search of clarity of mind and in search of the truth about my people." He journeyed all over the country, meeting, and studying under, a number of traditional healers. His first destination was Swaziland. He then made his way to Mozambique, and later, Rhodesia (now called Zimbabwe). At the end of this not only physical, but spiritual, journey, he realised his life's purpose – to help preserve the culture of his people, and to help mend the problems in his country, of drugs, unemployment, crime, disease and poverty. Mutwa's first book, Indaba, My Children: African Folk Tales, was published in 1964, and is considered a classic. His other works include: Africa Is My Witness (1966), My People (1971), Let Not My Country Die (1986), and Zulu Shaman: Dreams, Prophecies, and Mysteries (1996).

Very much a cosmic thinker, Mutwa claims that many of humanity's difficulties can be explained by the negative influence of manipulative extraterrestrial beings, particularly the mantindane, who "share the Earth with us. They need us. They use us. They harvest things from us." It's about time, he says, that we acknowledged the alien presence on this planet. "We are being watched, we are being explored and investigated, and we are being controlled, and yet there are those among us who refuse to accept this fact," he explains in Zulu Shaman.

A WORLD RULER BY ALIENS

The late, great John E. Mack is among one of the first UFO researchers in the West to interview Mutwa. He has also been interviewed by the Australian UFO researcher Bill Chalker, the author and historian Zecharia Sitchin, as well as the controversial conspiracy theorist David Icke, who once called him "the most amazing and knowledgeable man it has been my privilege and honour to call a friend, a genius." Supposedly, many of Icke's speculations about 'shape-shifting reptilian aliens' – whom he believes to be the true rulers of this earth – have been confirmed by Mutwa. According to Mutwa, when he talks about extraterrestrials and other topics of this nature he often feels "caught between, on the one hand, Western thought, including the Christian religion, and African thought, which accepts these things without question."

Mack first met Mutwa in 1994, during a short trip to South Africa, the main purpose of which was to investigate the Ariel School incident in Zimbabwe. "Credo seemed a noble, even regal figure with his colourful robes and heavy metal adornments of the sangoma, which seemed as if they ought to weigh him down," writes Mack in Passport to the Cosmos. During the interview, Mutwa spoke a great deal about his traumatic alien abduction experiences – experiences that Mack, a world-renowned expert on the subject, found difficult not to take seriously.

Mutwa views the world as a mysterious and frightening place, controlled by alien forces that possess far more knowledge than – and are intellectually and technologically superior to – humanity. Some of these beings, he says, are wise, benevolent and wish to help us. But the same cannot be said of the mantindane, who are just

Some of these beings, says Mutwa, have covertly and profoundly influenced all human cultures and civilisations for millennia. They have aided our evolution and helped us survive by providing us with knowledge – of science, farming, medicine and so on. "Throughout Africa we are told that these mysterious beings taught human beings many things," writes Mutwa. "They taught human beings how to have laws, knowledge of herbal medicine, knowledge of arts and knowledge of the mysteries of creation and the cosmos as a whole."

Some of them – the mantindane in particular – are "part of the Earth," and should not be considered foreign. "We and the mantindane are one and the same stupid race," says Mutwa. "Far from these creatures being aliens, they are our future descendants. I am sure of this." Out of all the different types of alien beings that have been in contact with humanity, the mantindane are apparently the most important to Africans, who fear them greatly. Mutwa described these entities to Mack as troublesome and "parasitic," claiming that they "instil superstition, sow discord, and may even cause disease."

A DIFFICULT LIFE

Given the fact that he has led such a difficult life, it is perhaps not surprising that Mutwa's world view is less than optimistic. Over the years, he's been a victim of violence on a number of occasions, and has lost many loved ones. In 1960, his fiancée was shot dead when South African police open fired on a crowd of people to which she belonged. In addition, his first-born son was knifed to death by a group of black activists, "murdering people under the banner of the mass democratic movement."

During the Soweto riots of June 16, 1976, Mutwa was attacked by a group of thugs who stabbed him repeatedly. "I could feel the knives going into my body," he says. "The thing that always helps me happened then. I split into two, and so I escaped the pain.” Looking down, he saw his own body, a “bloodied mess that looked like me.” He was apparently pronounced clinically dead. On another occasion, Mutwa was almost burnt alive when a group of thugs doused him in gasoline. In Africa it’s widely believed that when a person is killed in this manner, their soul is destroyed along with their body, preventing them from reincarnating. Mutwa remembers this incident as one of the few times in his life when he felt genuinely terrified.

Unbelievably traumatic though these experiences must have been, nothing compares to Mutwa’s 1958 alien abduction episode – assuming it actually took place, of course. The incident has been detailed in a number of books, including Passport to the Cosmos, Bill Chalker’s Hair of the Alien (2005), and Mutwa’s semi-autobiographical Zulu Shaman (also known under the title Song of the Stars).

CAUGHT BY THE GOD OF THE MOUNTAINS

It all started in the bush, in the sacred Inyangani Mountains of Rhodesia, while Mutwa, at the time a sangoma apprentice, was busy searching for a particular type of herb, which he planned to use as medicine. All of a sudden the temperature dropped, says Mutwa, even though it was a very hot day. He was then engulfed by a bright blue mist, which, he says, “was swirling all around me, getting between me and the eastern landscape.” A moment later, he found himself in what looked like a mining tunnel lined with silver-greyish metal.

The next thing he knew, he was lying on a table of some sort. His boots and trousers were missing. He was approached by a group of grey-skinned creatures, with “very large heads, very thin arms, and very thin legs.” He wanted to flee, but could not move, as his arms and legs were paralysed. “I just lay there like a goat on a sacrificial altar.” On closer inspection, he noticed that the creatures were short, “about the size of African Pigmy.” They looked, he says, identical in appearance to the ‘gray aliens’ (or grays) commonly reported by abductees in America and other Western countries.

Mutwa was then subjected to some kind of operation on his left thigh, which caused him to scream out in agony. An abundance of blood flowed from the wound. Next, one of the creatures stuck a silver, pen-like object up his right nasal passage; then yanked it out. “The pain,” he says, “was out of this world.”

The pain subsided, however, when one of the creatures – who was bigger and taller than the others, and who possessed an air of authority – placed its hand on Mutwa’s forehead. Mutwa could ‘sense’ that the creature was female, despite the fact that ‘she’ lacked breasts and other feminine characteristics. Staring at Mutwa intently, it projected visions of destruction into his mind. He saw cities being destroyed by floods, fires and other natural disasters.

One of the creatures pushed a small, black tubular instrument into Mutwa’s penis. As soon as the instrument was withdrawn, Mutwa’s bladder opened, and he urinated straight into the creature’s chest. It then “staggered away like a drunken insect, and left the room.” A moment later, two other creatures entered the room, one of whom appeared to be a large, metallic robot. Its eyes were bright, seemed to move, and seemed to change colour. The other creature, which was naked, had pink skin, blue eyes, high cheek-bones and looked almost human, yet its body was swollen and strangely out of proportion. Something about it reminded Mutwa of a doll, for it looked and felt “totally unnatural.”

The creature mounted Mutwa “like a crazy Zulu girl,” and proceeded to have sex with him. But the experience was not at all pleasant – much the opposite, in fact. The creature’s body was cold, bony and lifeless, and Mutwa felt as if he were making love to a machine. To make matters worse, it attached something to his penis that made him ejaculate “too much.” It then left the room, leaving Mutwa alone with the tall, female creature. His penis “was burning as if I had put it in scalding water.”

Gripping him violently by the head, the creature forced Mutwa off the table he was laying on, and he fell to the floor, landing on his hands and knees. He was then led roughly from room to room. One of the things that most captured his interest, and which, he says, is still “haunting my dreams,” was a collection of huge cylindrical objects, filled with greyish-pink liquid. They contained “small editions of the alien creatures floating round and round, like disgusting little frogs.”

to have run into this very same man about two years later, while delivering parcels in the city of Johannesburg. He was working at a curio shop at the time. The man asked Mutwa where he had seen him before, to which he replied, “in Rhodesia, in a certain place underground.” As though the realisation was too much to bear, the man turned away and walked off quickly down the street.

The next thing he knew, Mutwa was once again in the bush. His mind was hazy, and it took him a moment to realise that something terribly wrong had occurred. He felt a pain in his left thigh, as well as his penis, which was starting to swell. He noticed, moreover, that his shorts and trousers were torn, and that his boots were missing. Clinging to his body was the god-awful stench of the place he had been earlier. Coating his skin was a fine, grey powder. He began to stagger home, making his way along a bush track.

Mutwa eventually encountered a group of locals, who guided him back to the village, where his teacher, Mrs. Zamoya, informed him that he had been missing for three days. She believed his story straight away. She told him that he had been “caught by the God of the mountains,” and that many other people had similar experiences. He was lucky to have returned alive, she said, “because many people have disappeared in that part of the land, never to be seen again...”

While staying in the village to recover, Mutwa was bathed every day, so as to wash away the tiny droplets of blood that continued to ooze from the pores of his itchy skin. He found a scoop mark on his left thigh, about a half-inch in diameter, which remains there to this day. Most unpleasant of all, however, skin started to peel off his penis. It also developed sores. This condition did not go away completely, he says, which is one of the reasons his first wife left him. Mutwa was eventually taken to Mrs. Zamoya's 'Solace Mission' in western Rhodesia, where it took him several months to make a full recovery.

THE 'SKY GODS'

It would appear that the alien abduction phenomenon is alive and well in Mutwa's homeland, just as it is in many Western countries, for he claims to have met numerous abductees like himself. During his long career as a sangoma, Mutwa has been approached by countless African women who insist that they have been impregnated by the mantindane and other alien beings. In each case, the pregnancy has mysteriously terminated, as though the foetus has been stolen. Because, says Mutwa, many of these women have been accused of committing abortion – which, in Africa, is regarded as an act "worse than murder" – it has been his job to "convince the family of the woman's innocence, to try and heal the terrible spiritual and mental – as well as physical – trauma that the woman has undergone."

According to Mack in Passport to the Cosmos, many African tribes believe that the mantindane and other alien beings harvest sperm and ova from unsuspecting human victims. The Masai warriors, for instance, fear that the mantindane are able to drain a man's semen, which is why they go into battle wearing codpieces to protect their genitals, whereas the women of the tribe wear certain ornaments to protect themselves from being sexually molested by these entities.

"Once a mantindane has dealt with you," says Mutwa, "you become afraid of making love to a woman... These beings scar you for the rest of your life." Flawed though the mantindane may be, Mutwa points out that they are "part of us, part of our lives," and that "they are moved by a desperate need." Mutwa calls the mantindane "solvers of great problems." Their technology, he says, may be "several million years ahead of ours."

Whether or not one accepts Mutwa's claim that the mantindane and other alien beings are sexually compatible with human beings – or that such entities actually exist – it cannot be denied that these matters are a very big part of African tribal culture. The “sky people,” or “sky gods,” says Mutwa, have visited Earth for thousands of years, arriving from the heavens in “magic sky boats.” The Pygmies, the Kalahari Bushmen, the Ovahimba of Namibia, the tribes people of Zaire, and of course the Zulus – all of them accept the existence of extraterrestrials, and even believe that humanity is descended from such beings.

The stars are revered by Mutwa’s people, who consider them more important than even the sun or the moon. The word ‘Zulu’, in fact, means ‘people from the stars’. It is from the stars that much knowledge and wisdom has originated, they say. The people of Botswana, explains Mack, “call a star naledi, which means ‘light of the spirit’, and have carved in wood, painted on rocks, or even scratched on metal ‘the so-called UFOs,’ the ‘magic vehicles’ in which the mantindane and the star gods of the various tribes travelled.”

In addition to the somewhat sinister and repulsive mantindane, Mutwa speaks of another significant alien race – one that UFO enthusiasts and conspiracy theorists in the West call ‘the reptilians’. “Some say that these creatures were like crocodiles, with crocodile like teeth and jaws, but with very large round heads,” he says. Anyone who’s read Robert Temple’s impressive and scholarly The Sirius Mystery (1976) would be familiar with the enigma surrounding the Dogon people of Mali, west Africa, who possess advanced astronomical knowledge of the Sirius star system, and who claim that they gained this knowledge, many thousands of years ago, from the Nommo, a race of advanced reptilian or amphibian beings who hail from Sirius (more specifically, Sirius A). Throughout Africa, says Mutwa, these mysterious, reptilian gods are known by other names as well. “In West Africa, in the land of the Bumbara people, these amphibian or reptilian sky gods are known as Zishwezi... In West Africa again, these creatures are called the Asa, which means the mighty ones of magic...”

FACT OR FICTION?

What, then, are we to make of Mutwa’s claims? Was he really abducted by alien beings? Or was his story a fabrication – either completely or partially? And what about his people’s beliefs that we are “descendants from gods who came out of the skies thousands of years ago,” and that these beings “share the earth with us,” and exploit us? Should this information be interpreted literally?

According to Mack and Chalker, both of whom looked deeply into Mutwa’s story, these questions are difficult to answer with a simple yes or no. The truth may lie somewhere in the middle, they say. In Passport to the Cosmos, Mack points out that Mutwa and other indigenous people with whom he has discussed the UFO phenomenon and other related matters, do “not sharply distinguish material or literal reality from mythic truths.” He adds, moreover, that certain ideas of Mutwa’s, “like the dominant role of the mantindane and other extraterrestrial or star beings in human cultural history, seem related to tribal myth and legend.” Chalker is of much the same opinion as Mack. ““Oral material’ like Credo’s is very difficult to judge,” he says.

Given the kind of life he’s lead, it’s a miracle that Mutwa is still alive to this day. Now eighty-six or thereabouts and suffering from diabetes and asthma, his health is continuing to worsen at a rapid rate, and it’s fair to assume that he probably won’t be alive for very much longer. He claims that the ‘alien knowledge’ he has divulged in recent years, which he once pledged never to reveal, was supposed to be reserved for initiate sangomas like himself only. He decided to ‘break ranks’ and ‘reveal all’, however, because he lacks a successor onto whom he can pass his unique and sacred knowledge – knowledge he has earned during a lifetime of initiations. Plus, he insists, this information is too important to be withheld from humanity, and is needed in this time of great global crisis.

FOREWORD

IN 1948 Marcel Griaule published under the title Dieu d'Eau : entretiens avec Ogotemméli a short book on Dogon religion. Written in an informal style and including no apparatus of scholarship—for it was intended to reach a general audience and to make the character and significance of Dogon religious life more widely known—this book marked a new stage in the intensive studies of Griaule and his colleagues among this people, since it attempted to provide a comprehensive outline of Dogon cosmology as he had recently come to understand it. It was suggested to Professor Griaule that an English translation should be published but he was himself more preoccupied with carrying his Dogon studies further, and indeed subsequent research by himself and his colleagues has greatly elaborated the documentation and in some respects modified interpretations.

Following his deeply regretted death in 1956 the Council of the Institute gave some consideration to the possibility of publishing an English version of some of Professor Griaule's studies. It accordingly welcomed an offer from Professor Robert Redfield, on behalf of the Centre for the Comparative Study of Religion of the University of Chicago, of a grant towards the cost of preparing an English translation of Dieu d'Eau. It has not proved easy to obtain such a translation, but we hope that this version will be of value in conveying the personal qualities of Professor Griaule's text and something of the spirit of the original. Our thanks are due to Mr. Ralph Butler who prepared a first version, and to Dr. Audrey I. Richards and Mrs. Beatrice Hooke who undertook its revision.

INTRODUCTION

PROFESSOR Marcel Griaule directed ethnographic field studies in Africa for over a quarter of a century. The first took him to Abyssinia in 1928 and 1929 and was followed by a two-year mission which traversed the continent from West to East, from Dakar to Djibouti, 1931-1933. This expedition assembled a very considerable documentation and enriched the Musée de l'Homme with collections of several thousand objects. It also laid the foundations for intensive studies which were to be carried out later in several areas along its route. From 1935 to 1939 three expeditions followed up these studies, notably in Mali, Cameroun and Chad. After the interruption of the war, annual expeditions and sometimes visits twice a year were made from 1946 to 1956, and were devoted to intensive studies among the peoples along or close to the Upper Niger in present-day Mali.¹

Marcel Griaule participated personally in all these expeditions until January 1956, less than two months before his deeply regretted death from the malady from which he had suffered since 1951. In the course of them he took with him a large number of collaborators trained in his methods and animated by the enthusiasm and energy which he devoted to his researches. Many of these colleagues continued studies during the same period in other areas which he had prospected and so widened the field of enquiry.

No attempt can be made here to list all the topics and questions with which these expeditions have dealt. Almost all aspects of human activity have been studied and the members of the field groups have worked variously as ethnographers, linguists, historians of religion, students of art, and archaeologists. They have also advanced the ethnobotany and ethnozoology of the areas studied. Modern techniques have been fully utilized, such as tape recording, cinema and aerial photography, of which extensive use was made. Finally, the Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique of France sponsored the construction and equipping of a laboratory vessel, for which Marcel Griaule had conceived the plans, and placed it under his direction as a base for field studies along the Niger. This boat, which includes living quarters, laboratories and storage space, has been in service since 1955 on the Niger, and provided a mobile base for the continuous study of its populations.

A simple scanning of the publications of Marcel Griaule, which exceed 170 in number, makes clear the range of his studies with regard to both subjects and regions.² In them he has recorded original observations, some of which were initial discoveries, concerning social organization, technology, religion, art, games, medicine, and pharmacopoeia relating to many African societies. This rich variety, due in large part to his methods of work, was apparent in his teaching at the Sorbonne.³ To his personal publications one must also add the considerable number by his collaborators, who took part in the many expeditions.

All this work has brought to the attention of scholars, through the discovery and formulation of its foundations, the full recognition of the remarkable development in all aspects, save only in the technical field, of civilization among African peoples. A consideration of African art, to which Marcel Griaule himself contributed much—an art which has moved and aroused reflections in European peoples, and has also considerably influenced European art—has demonstrated the vigour of African cultures. We are however far from understanding all its developments; many years of further patient study will be needed to estimate its range more fully.

It is here that Marcel Griaule's methods of study, due in large measure to his personal temperament and his warm humanity, played so great a part. It was a method that he applied instinctively from the beginning and then developed more systematically during the long period of his field studies. He combined with the most rigorous pursuit of objective and scientific observation of the facts observed, an active participation in the life of the peoples studied, participation which required a prudence that was continually on the alert and the fullest cross-checking of information and impressions in both space and time. While like others he made collections of objects and reported observed facts, he also made the fullest use of discussions and of the analysis of activities conjointly with those who were using the various objects and with the actors in the rituals. The long period of his studies, and the amount of time passed in the field have also been dominant factors, and the persistence with which he returned to the same places (the Dogon studies were undertaken during successive expeditions from 1931 onwards and the Bambara since 1946) are evidence of this.⁴

It became clear in the course of this work that African peoples had, like others, reflected on their own customs, that these customs stemmed from norms which were proper to themselves but which were nevertheless fundamental standards which it was indispensable for the ethnographer to understand. Enquiry, enriched by such an approach, was at the same time complicated by it, for it was by no means easy for minds attached to occidental logic to penetrate systems of thought such as these in which analogies and the power of symbols have the value of facts. Thus for example African techniques, so poor in appearance, like those of agriculture, weaving and smithing, have a rich, hidden content of significance. Religious gestures, whether spectacular or secret, and generally uncomprehended by outsiders, show themselves under analysis to be of an extreme subtlety in their implications. The smallest everyday object may reveal in its form or decoration a conscious reflection of a complex cosmogony. The observer needs not only finesse but also infinite patience. But the reward for such effort is that these forms and gestures become intelligible and perfectly clear expressions. Thus a checkered coverlet is a text in which the woven designs constitute signs expressed by its makers and known to initiates. A basket for carrying in the harvest represents when upturned the rainbow on which humanity descends from the sky to the earth. Its square base connotes space and the cardinal points. The paintings successively made at different periods of the year on a totemic sanctuary with materials derived from different cereals are at the same time a writing and form of numeration. The sacrifice of a humble chicken, when accompanied by the necessary and effective ritual gestures, recalls in the thinking of those who have experienced it an understanding that is at once original and coherent of the origins and functioning of the universe.

The Africans with whom we have worked in the region of the Upper Niger have systems of signs which run into thousands, their own systems of astronomy and calendrical measurements, methods of calculation and extensive anatomical and physiological knowledge, as well as a systematic pharmacopoeia. The principles underlying their social organization find expression in classifications which embrace many manifestations of nature. And these form a system in which, to take examples, plants, insects, textiles, games and rites are distributed in categories that can be further divided, numerically expressed and related one to another. It is on these same principles that the political and religious authority of chiefs, the family system and juridical rights, reflected notably in kinship and marriages, have been established. Indeed, all the activities of the daily lives of individuals are ultimately based on them.

In African societies which have preserved their traditional organization the number of persons who are trained in this knowledge is quite considerable.⁵ This they call 'deep knowledge' in contrast with 'simple knowledge' which is regarded as 'only a beginning in the understanding of beliefs and customs' that people who are not fully instructed in the cosmogony possess.⁶ There are various reasons for the silence that is generally observed on this subject. To a natural reserve before strangers who, even when sympathetic, remain unconsciously imbued with a feeling of superiority, one must add the present situation of rapid change in African societies through contact with mechanization and the influence of school teaching. But among groups where tradition is still vigorous, this knowledge, which is expressly characterized as esoteric, is only secret in the following sense. It is in fact open to all who show a will to understand so long as, by their social position and moral conduct, they are judged worthy of it. Thus every family head, every priest, every grown-up person responsible for some small fraction of social life can, as part of the social group, acquire knowledge on condition that he has the patience and, as the African phrase has it, 'he comes to sit by the side of the competent elders' over the period and in the state of mind necessary. Then he will receive answers to all his questions, but it will take years. Instruction begun in childhood during assemblies and rituals of the age-sets continues in fact throughout life.

These various aspects of African civilization gradually became clear in the course of intensive studies undertaken among several of the peoples of Mali and Upper Volta over more than a decade. In the case of the Dogon, concerning whom there have already been numerous publications,⁷ these studies have made possible the elaboration of a synthesis covering the greater part of their activities.

We should now record the important occurrence during the field expedition of 1947 which led to the writing of this particular study. From 1931 the Dogon had answered questions and commented on observations made during previous field trips on the basis of the interpretation of facts which they call 'la parole de face'; this is the 'simple knowledge' which they give

But the Dogon came to recognize the great perseverance of Marcel Griaule and his team in their enquiries, and that it was becoming increasingly difficult to answer the multiplicity of questions without moving on to a different level. They appreciated our eagerness for an understanding which earlier explanations had certainly not satisfied, and which was clearly more important to us than anything else. Griaule had also shown a constant interest in the daily life of the Dogon, appreciating their efforts to exploit a difficult country where there was a serious lack of water in the dry season, and our relationships, which had thus extended beyond those of ethnographical enquiry, became more and more trusting and affectionate. In the light of all this the Dogon took their own decision, of which we learned only later when they told us themselves. The elders of the lineages of the double village of Ogol and the most important totemic priests of the region of Sanga met together and decided that the more esoteric aspects of their religion should be fully revealed to Professor Griaule. To begin this they chose one of their own best informed members, Ogotemméli who, as will be seen in the introduction, arranged the first interview. This first exposition lasted exactly the number of days recorded in Dieu d'Eau, in which the meandering flow of information is faithfully reported. Although we knew nothing of it at the time, the progress of this instruction by Ogotemméli was being reported on daily to the council of elders and priests.

The seriousness and importance of providing this exposé of Dogon belief was all the greater because the Dogon elders knew perfectly well that in doing so they were opening the door, not merely to these thirty days of information, but to later and more intensive work which was to extend over months and years. They never withdrew from this decision, and we should like to express here our grateful thanks to them. After Ogotemméli's death, others carried on the work. And since Professor Griaule's death they have continued with the same patience and eagerness to complete the task they had undertaken. These later enquiries have made possible the publication of the many further studies cited in the bibliography and the preparation of a detailed treatise entitled Le Renard Pâle, the first part of which is now in the press. And in 1963, as this is written, the investigation still continues.

PREFACE

IN one of the most remarkable mountain areas in Africa lives a population of peasant-warriors who were one of the last peoples to lose their independence and come under French rule. Many Europeans have regarded the Dogon as savages, if not the most backward race in the whole region. They have been thought to practise human sacrifice and to offer resistance to outside influence all the more effectively because of the natural difficulties of the country they inhabit. Writers have described their fears when embarking on what were thought to be rash expeditions. In the light of these stories, and on account of unsuspected revolts, often the result of misunderstandings, whole villages have sometimes been laid under an interdict.

The Dogon, in short, were thought to present one of the best examples of primitive savagery, and this view has been shared by some Muslim Africans, who are no better equipped intellectually than Europeans to understand those of their brothers who cling to the traditions of their ancestors. Only those officials who have undertaken the hard task of governing these people have learnt to love them.

The author of this book and his numerous fellow-workers have been associated with the Dogon for some fifteen years, and through their published works these people are today the best-known tribe in the whole of the Western Sudan. Les Ames des Dogon, by G. Dieterlen (1941), Les Devises, by S. de Ganay (1941), and Les Masques, by M. Griaule (1938), have furnished scholars with proof that the life of these Africans was based on complicated but orderly conceptions and on institutional and ritual systems in which there was nothing haphazard or fantastic. Ten years ago these works had already drawn attention to new facts concerning the 'vital force', about which sociologists have been telling us for half a century past. They have shown the primary importance of the notion of the person and his relations with society, with the universe, and with the divine.

Thus Dogon ontology has opened new vistas for ethnologists and placed the problem on a broader basis.

More recently, too, in his notable book La Philosophie bantoue (1945) the Rev. Fr. Tempels presented an analysis of conceptions of this kind, and raised the question of whether 'Bantu thought should not be regarded as a system of philosophy'.

As a result of patient and methodical research, pursued for fifteen years from the time when the first steps were taken in the rocky cliffs of Bandiagara, this question can now be answered so far as the Dogon are concerned: for these people live by a cosmogony, a metaphysic, and a religion which put them on a par with the peoples of antiquity, and which Christian theology might indeed study with profit.

The teaching on these subjects was imparted to the author by a venerable individual, Ogotemmêli, of Lower Ogol. This man, a hunter who had lost his sight by an accident, was able as a result of his infirmity, to devote long and careful study to these things. Endowed with exceptional intelligence, a physical capacity which was still apparent in spite of his affliction, and a wisdom, the fame of which has spread throughout his country, he had quickly appreciated the interest attaching to the ethnological work of the Europeans, and had been waiting fifteen years for an opportunity to impart his knowledge to them. He was anxious, no doubt, that they should be acquainted with the most important institutions, customs, and rituals of his own people.

In October 1946 he summoned the author to his house, and on thirty-three successive days, in a series of unforgettable conversations, he laid bare the framework of a world system, the knowledge of which will revolutionize all accepted ideas about the mentality of Africans and of primitive peoples in general.

It might be thought that we are here concerned with esoteric teaching; some have even suggested, on a first impression, without waiting for further details, that it was a case of personal speculations of merely secondary interest. These are, moreover, the very people who will devote a lifetime to the presumably personal ideas of Plato or Julian of Halicarnassus.

But although the full range of this teaching is known only to the elders and to certain initiates, it is not esoteric in character, since anyone who reaches old age can acquire it. Moreover, totemic priests of all ages are acquainted with those parts of the doctrine which specially concern them, while the ritual observances attaching to this corpus of beliefs are practised by the whole people.

Obviously the ordinary people do not apprehend the profounder significance of their actions and their prayers; but this is true of all peoples. The Christian dogma of Transubstantiation cannot be called esoteric merely because the man in the street is ignorant of the word and has only vague ideas as to its meaning.

Similar reservations might be made as to the explanatory and representative value of these doctrines and their bearing on African mentality in general. It might be maintained, for example, that what is true of the Dogon is not true of the other peoples of the Western Sudan.

To that contention the author and his colleagues have a convincing reply: the thought of the Bambara is based on an equally systematic and equally rich metaphysic, the fundamental principles of which are comparable to those of the Dogon. The works of Madame G. Dieterlen and Madame de Ganay present evidence that this is so. The same is true of the Bozo fishermen of the Niger, of the Kouroumba farmers of the Niger bend, and of the mysterious iron-workers of these same regions, on which research is only just beginning.

We are not concerned, therefore, in the present instance, with a single unusual system of thought, but rather with the first example of a series which will prove to be a long one.

In his work in this connection the author hopes to attain two objects: on the one hand to present to a non-specialist public, and without the usual scientific apparatus, a work which would customarily be addressed only to experts. On the other hand he is concerned to pay a tribute to the first African in French West Africa who has revealed to the European world a cosmogony as rich as that of Hesiod, poet of a dead world, and a metaphysic that has the advantage of being expressed in a thousand rites and actions in the life of a multitude of living people.

The Ogols

THE sun had risen abruptly from the plain of the Gondo, and was shining down upon the roofs of Lower Ogol. The birds had ceased their song, leaving the sun to take the centre of the stage. In the courtyard of the caravanserai, typical of every camping place in the French Sudan, the last moments of peace were slipping away. Round a forgotten dish of food remaining from the previous day traces of asses' hooves marked the tracks of the night's visitors. Four neat heaps of dung, which might have served as specimens for the Mammals' department of a museum, had not yet at that hour become a centre of attraction for the dung-beetles.

A large sloping rock of pinkish-grey served as a low table in the service-yard in front of the cube-shaped building of cracked earth, which faced away from the rising sun and looked out from all its entrances on the Dolo valley. No mountain broke the view in any direction except to the east, where by going up to one of the roofs it was possible to discern the gentle slope of Ninu rising above the debris of Banani.

We were engulfed in a turbulent sea of sandstone, cleft by narrow sandy valleys and broken by wave-like ridges of rock which reflected the sunlight. The only shelter was provided by folds in the arid landscape, and faces and bodies were scoured by the sand with which the air was laden.

In the shadowy interior of the building, open to every wind since it was without doors or windows, the first stirrings of early morning activity were beginning. Four Europeans under mosquito-nets were exchanging the usual trivial remarks. In the courtyard, now bathed in a subdued pinkish-yellow light, a figure flooded with sunlight appeared between two pillars of the surrounding wall. He paused for a moment to contemplate the scene inside, still arranged for the night. He saw the bowl and the ass-droppings and, fallen in the dust, the barrier of mats which should have screened the kitchen. Eventually his glance came to rest on the window of the store-room, and he noticed the disorder of the millet stalks put up to keep out the cats.

Ményu was a gentle African of Upper Ogol, the devoted servant of the four foreigners, whom he had known for a long time. He stifled an oath and, waving his arms in the wide sleeves of his long white coat, advanced to deal with these calamities.

The action of the day began to take shape. Apurali, the steward, had already exchanged interminable greetings with his colleague. Other Dogon made their appearance, filling the courtyard; woman with their children on their backs needing eye-treatment; a girl with a skull injury; naked babies with bulging stomachs settled themselves to watch the spectacle which was going to last all day. On the walls, on the rock in the centre, on the steps of the house, informants and interpreters waited in groups till their names were called. The scene was a repetition of what had happened the day before and the day before that, and every day for fifteen years past whenever white men visited the southern ridge of Upper Ogol.

In a corner of the verandah a European was continuing an enquiry, begun the day before, into a mysterious sacrifice which had taken place in a cleft in the Gorge of I. On the previous day he had penetrated into the caves and funnels in the sandstone and, descending by ledges in the rocks, had come to some ruins where the scent of wild animals and bats was strong. An elderly Dogon was giving scraps of information in reply to his questions, reluctantly surrendering the bare bones of the truth, now going back on what he had said before, now proffering lies, smiling or abashed, but resolutely clinging to his mysteries. His brown Phrygian cap hung down over one ear, covering his dark face with its only slightly thick lips, his thin nose and eyes without lashes.

In the north gallery actions were more animated. A young European woman was conducting a choir of four Dogon belonging to different groups, each speaking a dialect of its own; since each possessed a rich vocabulary and a great number of verbs of action, the four speakers soon became impassioned actors, miming the attitudes they were expressing and shouting examples.

The north room was more like a confessional; priests of the cult of the ancestors were speaking in lowered voices to a European woman who was at once patient and persistent.

In the south gallery another white woman was writing down the text of prayers to Komo at the dictation of a bright-eyed Bambara.

'Komo! Killer of fat dead!'

'Shroud of the living!'

All four points of the compass therefore were full of the usual daily sequence of rumour, short-lived outbursts, and slackening of tension.

But now a novelty was approaching in the person of Gana, son of the Hogon, the oldest man, and consequently the religious chief, of Ogol. He was coming towards the building along the embankment a bare handsbreadth wide between two fields of high millet. Between his lips he had a chewing-stick, which he took in his hand when he wished to greet his acquaintances. His baggy breeches and full tunic introduced a touch of brown colour among the cornstalks.

On reaching the rocky slope of Upper Ogol, he proceeded to climb it, following the track worn smooth by thousands of feet. He saluted the building from the outside before entering the courtyard. There he came up to the European and smiled; his ears seemed to draw closer to each other on either side of his narrow skull.

'A hunter wishes to see you.'

'Is he sick?'

When an African asks to see a European, it is usually because he is sick; otherwise he is not particularly interested in meeting a white man.

'No! He wishes to sell you an amulet.'

'What amulet?'

'The amulet you ordered ten years ago in return for the bullets.'

'I have no recollection of that.'

The European bit his lip, realizing suddenly the unusual character of this request. 'Good!' he said and, continuing his conversation with the man who had offered the sacrifice, sent Gana to fetch the amulet.

The latter with his chewing-stick in his mouth made his way back along the path he had come by, leaping down the rocks of Upper Ogol and crossing through the millet, till he was lost to view in the tangle of houses in Lower Ogol. Here he entered a courtyard, and said something in a low voice in front of an open door. A thin hand emerged from the shadows within to hand him a trapeze-shaped piece of leather covered with dried blood.

Gana made his way back along the same path, and appeared before the European.

'And the formula?' said the white man. 'Have you got that?'

'What formula?'

'The formula for its manufacture and use. Go and get it!'

'I know it,' said the man who had offered the sacrifice, speaking when Gana's back was turned, and proceeded at once to repeat it to the European, who wrote it down.

Theseventeen-year-old Gana knew well enough what to make of these concerns of his elders and betters. Once again he leapt down the rocks of Upper Ogol, but this time he remained standing stiffly on the track, and with a quick movement took his chewing-stick from his mouth: he had got a thorn in his foot. Then he proceeded on his way limping, and again sought out the courtyard in the labyrinth of narrow streets. Sitting down on the threshold of the African's house he spoke at length, while he removed a splinter from his toe. A slow voice answered him, to which he listened respectfully. Then with a slight sigh he returned to the white man, whom he now found alone on the verandah. To him, after removing his chewing-stick, he repeated the formula, forgetting three verses, which his interlocutor promptly read out to him from his notes. Gana's jaw dropped for a moment in astonishment.

'But who is this old hunter?' the white man asked.

He did not understand. He thought that the European wanted to know the man's device.

'Vizé!' he said. 'Vizé karandiang!'

Which means: 'A man to keep away from! A terrible man!'

Ogotemméli

LOWER Ogol, like all Dogon villages, was a collection of houses and granaries all crowded together, flat roofs of clay alternating with cone-shaped roofs of straw. Picking one's way along its narrow streets of light and shade, between the truncated pyramids, prisms, cubes or cylinders of the granaries and houses, the rectangular porticoes, the red or white altars shaped like umbilical hernias, one felt like a dwarf lost in a maze. Everything was mottled by the rains and the heat; the mud-walls were fissured like the skins of pachyderms. Over the walls of the tiny courtyards might be seen, under the floors of the granaries, fowls, yellow dogs, and sometimes great tortoises, symbols of the patriarchs.

At a turn of the street there was a door, shaped with an axe, but, even when new, it could never have fitted the entrance built of earthen pillars with a pediment of wooden blocks. The door was as wide as a man's two shoulders; winter rains had ploughed wave-like furrows in the wood between which the knots looked like open eyes. Drought, clutching hands, and the muzzles of goats had worn it away so that it grated on its hinges and swung back against the wall with a bang like a gong, revealing a squalid courtyard, which belonged to the most remarkable man of the plains and rocks from Oropa to Nimbé, Asakarba and Tintam.

The white man stepped over the scanty midden of an old man with no family. A row of cabins, broken by a low door on the ground floor and a flat panel on the floor above, stood in the middle of the courtyard forming a façade which concealed the main building behind it. In the pediment were ten swallows' nests, and the edge of the roof was adorned by eight cones with flat stone tops. To right and left were six granaries in a row like big dice, two of them facing the neighbouring house, to which they belonged. Of the other four one was empty, another rickety, and the third split across like a half-bitten fruit. Only one of them was in use: it was half full of grain.

Opposite, between the main building and the granaries, a low house, in which there were faint sounds of life, completed the enclosure of the courtyard. On the right in a store-room open to the sky there was a perpetual whirl of down blown about by a light breeze.

The man accompanying the European pronounced the usual words of greeting. Immediately a voice replied clearly and distinctly:

'God brings you! God brings you!'

'Greetings! How is your health?'

Slowly the voice drew nearer. From the shadows of the interior came the sound of hands feeling their way along walls and woodwork. A stick tapped on the floor: there was a sound of hollow earthenware: some tiny chickens made their way out one by one through the cat-hole, thrust out by the great being who was approaching.

At last there appeared a brown tunic, drawn in at the seams and frayed by long use like the standards of the warriors of old. Then a head bent beneath the lintel of the door, and the man stood up to his full height, turning towards the stranger a face that no words can describe.

'Greetings!' he said, 'Greetings to those who are athirst!'

The thick lips spoke the purest Sanga language. So alive were they that one saw nothing else. All the other features seemed to be folded away, particularly as, after the first words, the head had been bent. The cheeks, the cheek-bones, the forehead and the eyelids seemed all to have suffered the same ravages; they were creased by a hundred wrinkles which had caused a painful contortion as of a face exposed to too strong a light or battered by a hail of stones. The eyes were dead.

The two visitors came from outside, and might therefore be supposed to have been working in the heat. Accordingly the old man leaning on his stick greeted them with the words:

'Welcome! Welcome after weariness! Welcome from the sun!'

The longest task of the first day was the choice of a place for the conversations. The space in front of the dwelling-house, even if the aged Ogotemmêli remained indoors, and even if the white man bent his head towards him and spoke in low tones as if in the confessional, was, according to Ogotemmêli, open to the objection that interviews there might excite the eternal curiosity of the women. The minute courtyard on the other side of the building, on the other hand, which was exposed to all the winds from the north, might be watched by children hidden in the ruined granary. There remained the courtyard itself with its wretched dung-heap, its hollow stone, its ashes and its dilapidated wall with a gap in the middle of it just high enough for curious eyes to look through.

Ogotemmêli still hesitated; he had much to say about the inconvenience of the courtyard for the purpose of conversations between men of mature years. The European for his part did not open his mouth except to agree; he even stressed the indiscreet nature of walls and the stupidity of men and, naturally, the unconscionable curiosity of women and their insatiable thirst for novelties. All these precautions interested him: they seemed so out of proportion to the simple sale of an amulet.

The white man was beginning to realize that the sale of the amulet was only a pretext. There was no reference to it in the subsequent conversations, and the underlying reason for the old man's action never transpired. But from various details it appeared, as time went on, that Ogotemmêli wished to pass on to the foreigner, who had first visited the country fifteen years before, and whom he trusted, the instruction which he himself had received first from his grandfather and later from his father.

But he was waiting. He was perplexed by the result of his own approaches to this man whom he could not see. Not that the man was unknown to him: for fifteen years he had been hearing about groups of Europeans, who came, under this man's guidance, to live rough and to ride about the country studying the customs of the people.

He had even followed their work since the beginning, for he had been closely associated with Ambibê Babadyé, the great dignitary of the masks and the white men's regular informant, who had only recently died. Many times in the last fifteen years Ambibê had come to Ogotemmêli for information and advice. From what Ambibê had told him, and from the reports of a number of other persons, he had formed a correct idea of the aims and objects of his interlocutor and his unwearying passion for research.

But the situation was unique. How was one to instruct a European? How could one make him understand things and rites and beliefs? Moreover this white man had already found out about the masks, and knew their secret language. He had been all over the country in every direction, and about some of its institutions he knew as much as he knew himself. How then to set about it?

The European relieved him of his embarrassment.

'When your gun exploded in your face, what were you firing at?'

'At a porcupine.'

The white man was trying by an indirect approach to lead the conversation to hunting and the attitude towards the animal world, and so to totemism.

'It was an accident,' said the old man. 'But it was also a last warning. I knew by divination that I was to give up hunting if I wanted to protect my children. Hunting is a work of death, and it attracts death. I have had twenty-one children, and now only five are left.'

All the tragedy of African mortality was in his words, and all the deep questionings of these men about death and their defencelessness in the face of it. They clung to their beliefs, as do all men everywhere, but though beliefs may console and explain, they cannot avert the experience.

It was on this plane of suffering that Ogotemmêli's personality was revealed, in itself and in its relation with supernatural powers. From the age of fifteen he had been initiated in the mysteries of religion by his grandfather. After the latter's death his father had continued the instruction. It seemed that the 'lessons' had gone on for more than twenty years, and that Ogotemmêli's family was not one that took these things lightly.

Ogotemmêli himself, no doubt, had from a very early age shown signs of an eager mind and considerable shrewdness.

Until he lost his sight, he was a mighty hunter who, though one-eyed from childhood as a result of smallpox, would always come back from the chase with a full bag, while the others were still toiling in the gorges. His skill as a hunter was the fruit of his profound knowledge of nature, of animals, of men and of gods. After his accident he learnt still more. Thrown back on his own resources, on his altars and on whatever he was able to hear, he had become one of the most powerful minds on the cliffs.

Indeed his name and his character were famous throughout the plateau and the hills, known (as the saying was) to the youngest boy. People came to his door for advice every day and even by night.

Phrygian caps were even now showing above the walls, and the women were making signs from a distance. It was time to go, and make room for the clients. But contact had now been made, and the conversations thereafter came about by tacit consent, according to a sort of programme and at convenient times.

SECOND DAY

The First Word and the Fibre Skirt

OGOTEMMÊLI, seating himself on his threshold, scraped his stiff leather snuff-box, and put a pinch of yellow powder on his tongue.

'Tobacco,' he said, 'makes for right thinking.'

So saying, he set to work to analyse the world system, for it was essential to begin with the dawn of all things. He rejected as a detail of no interest, the popular account of how the fourteen solar systems were formed from flat circular slabs of earth one on top of the other. He was only prepared to speak of the serviceable solar system; he agreed to consider the stars, though they only played a secondary part.

'It is quite true,' he said, 'that in course of time women took down the stars to give them to their children. The children put spindles through them and made then spin like fiery tops to show themselves how the world turned. But that was only a game.'

The stars came from pellets of earth flung out into space by the God Amma, the one God. He had created the sun and the moon by a more complicated process, which was not the first known to man but is the first attested invention of God: the art of pottery. The sun is, in a sense, a pot raised once for all to white heat and surrounded by a spiral of red copper with eight turns. The moon is the same shape, but its copper is white. It was heated only one quarter at a time. Ogotemmêli said he would explain later the movements of these bodies. For the moment he was concerned only to indicate the main lines of the design, and from that to pass to its actors.

He was anxious, however, to give an idea of the size of the sun.

'Some,' he said, 'think it is as large as this encampment, which would mean thirty cubits. But it is really bigger. Its surface area is bigger than the whole of Sanga Canton.'

And after some hesitation he added:

'It is perhaps even bigger than that.'

He refused to linger over the dimensions of the moon, nor did he ever say anything about them. The moon's function was not important, and he would speak of it later. He said however that, while Africans were creatures of light emanating from the fullness of the sun, Europeans were creatures of the moonlight: hence their immature appearance.

He spat out his tobacco as he spoke. Ogotemmêli had nothing against Europeans. He was not even sorry for them. He left them to their destiny in the lands of the north.

The God Amma, it appeared, took a lump of clay, squeezed it in his hand and flung it from him, as he had done with the stars. The clay spread and fell on the north, which is the top, and from there stretched out to the south, which is the bottom, of the world, although the whole movement was horizontal. 'The earth lies flat, but the north is at the top. It extends east and west with separate members like a foetus in the womb. It is a body, that is to say, a thing with members branching out from a central mass. This body, lying flat, face upwards, in a line from north to south, is feminine. Its sexual organ is an ant-hill, and its clitoris a termite hill. Amma, being lonely and desirous of intercourse with this creature, approached it. That was the occasion of the first breach of the order of the universe.'

Ogotemmêli ceased speaking. His hands crossed above his head, he sought to distinguish the different sounds coming from the courtyards and roofs. He had reached the point of the origin of troubles and of the primordial blunder of God.

'If they overheard me, I should be fined an ox!'

At God's approach the termite hill rose up, barring the passage and displaying its masculinity. It was as strong as the organ of the stranger, and intercourse could not take place. But God is all-powerful. He cut down the termite hill, and had intercourse with the excised earth. But the original incident was destined to affect the course of things for ever; from this defective union there was born, instead of the intended twins, a single being, the Thos aureus or jackal, symbol of the difficulties of God.

Ogotemmêli's voice sank lower and lower. It was no longer a question of women's ears listening to what he was saying; other, non-material, ear-drums might vibrate to his important discourse. The European and his African assistant, Sergeant Koguem, were leaning towards the old man as if hatching plots of the most alarming nature.

But, when he came to the beneficent acts of God, Ogotemmêli's voice again assumed its normal tone.

God had further intercourse with his earth-wife, and this time without mishaps of any kind, the excision of the offending member having removed the cause of the former disorder. Water, which is the divine seed, was thus able to enter the womb of the earth and the normal reproductive cycle resulted in the birth of twins. Two beings were thus formed. God created them like water. They were green in colour, half human beings and half serpents. From the head to the loins they were human: below that they were serpents. Their red eyes were wide open like human eyes, and their tongues were forked like the tongues of reptiles. Their arms were flexible and without joints. Their bodies were green and sleek all over, shining like the surface of water, and covered with short green hairs, a presage of vegetation and germination.

These spirits, called Nummo, were thus two homogeneous products of God, of divine essence like himself, conceived without untoward incidents and developed normally in the womb of the earth. Their destiny took them to Heaven, where they received the instructions of their father. Not that God had to teach them speech, that indispensable necessity of all beings, as it is of the world-system; the Pair were born perfect and complete; they had eight members, and their number was eight, which is the symbol of speech.

They were also of the essence of God, since they were made of his seed, which is at once the ground, the form, and the substance of the life-force of the world, from which derives the motion and the persistence of created being. This force is water, and the Pair are present in all water: they are water, the water of the seas, of coasts, of torrents, of storms, and of the spoonfuls we drink.

Ogotemmêli used the terms 'Water' and 'Nummo' indiscriminately.

'Without Nummo,' he said, 'it was not even possible to create the earth, for the earth was moulded clay and it is from water (that is, from Nummo) that its life is derived.'

'What life is there in the earth?' asked the European.

'The life-force of the earth is water. God moulded the earth with water. Blood too he made out of water. Even in a stone there is this force, for there is moisture in everything.'

'But if Nummo is water, it also produces copper. When the sky is overcast, the sun's rays may be seen materializing on the misty horizon. These rays, excreted by the spirits, are of copper and are light. They are water too, because they uphold the earth's moisture as it rises. The Pair excrete light, because they are also light.'

While he was speaking, Ogotemmêli had been searching for something in the dust. He finally collected a number of small stones. With a rapid movement he flung them into the courtyard over the heads of his two interlocutors, who had no time to bend down. The stones fell just where the Hogon's cock had been crowing a few seconds before.

'That cock is a squalling nuisance. He makes all conversation impossible.'

The bird began to crow again on the other side of the wall, so Ogotemmêli sent Koguem to throw a bit of wood at him. When Koguem came back, he asked whether the cock was now outside the limits of the Tabda quarter.

'He is in the Hogon's field,' said Koguem. 'I have set four children to watch him.'

'Good!' said Ogotemmêli with a little laugh. 'Let him make the most of what remains to him of life! They tell me he is to be eaten at the next Feast of Twins.'

He returned to the subject of the Nummo spirits, or (as he more usually put it, in the singular) of Nummo, for this pair of twins, he explained, represented the perfect, the ideal unit.

The Nummo, looking down from Heaven, saw their mother, the earth, naked and speechless, as a consequence no doubt of the original incident in her relations with the God Amma. It was necessary to put an end to this state of disorder. The Nummo accordingly came down to earth, bringing with them fibres pulled from plants already created in the heavenly regions. They took ten bunches of these fibres, corresponding to the number of their ten fingers, and made two strands of them, one for the front and one for behind. To this day masked men still wear these appendages hanging down to their feet in thick tendrils.

But the purpose of this garment was not merely modesty. It manifested on earth the first act in the ordering of the universe and the revelation of the helicoid sign in the form of an undulating broken line.

For the fibres fell in coils, symbol of tornadoes, of the windings of torrents, of eddies and whirlwinds, of the undulating movement of reptiles. They recall also the eight-fold spirals of the sun, which sucks up moisture. They were themselves a channel of moisture, impregnated as they were with the freshness of the celestial plants. They were full of the essence of Nummo: they were Nummo in motion, as shown in the undulating line, which can be prolonged to infinity.

When Nummo speaks, what comes from his mouth is a warm vapour which conveys, and itself constitutes, speech. This vapour, like all water, has sound, dies away in a helicoid line. The coiled fringes of the skirt were therefore the chosen vehicle for the words which the Spirit desired to reveal to the earth. He endued his hands with magic power by raising them to his lips while he plaited the skirt, so that the moisture of his words was imparted to the damp plaits, and the spiritual revelation was embodied in the technical instruction.

In these fibres full of water and words, placed over his mother's genitalia, Nummo is thus always present.

Thus clothed, the earth had a language, the first language of this world and the most primitive of all time. Its syntax was elementary, its verbs few, and its vocabulary without elegance. The words were breathed sounds scarcely differentiated from one another, but nevertheless vehicles. Such as it was, this ill-defined speech sufficed for the great works of the beginning of all things.

In the middle of a word Ogotemmêli gave a loud cry in answer to the hunter's halloo which the discreet Akundyo, priest of women dying in childbirth and of stillborn children, had called through the gap in the wall.

Akundyo first spat to one side, his eye riveted on the group of men. He was wearing a red Phrygian cap which covered his ears, with a raised point like a uraeus on the bridge of the nose in the fashion known as 'the wind blows'. His cheek-bones were prominent, and his teeth shone. He uttered a formal salutation to which the old man at once replied and the exchange of courtesies became more and more fulsome.

'God's curse,' exclaimed Ogotemmêli, 'on any in Lower Ogol who love you not!'

With growing emotion Akundyo made shift to out-do the vigour of the imprecation.

'May God's curse rest on me,' said the blind man at last, 'if I love you not!'

The four men breathed again. They exchanged humorous comments on the meagreness of the game in the I valley. Eventually Akundyo took his leave of them, asserting in the slangy French of a native soldier that he was going to 'look for porcupine', an animal much esteemed by these people.

The conversation reverted to the subject of speech. Its function was organization, and therefore it was good; nevertheless from the start it let loose disorder.

This was because the jackal, the deluded and deceitful son of God, desired to possess speech, and laid hands on the fibres in which language was embodied, that is to say, on his mother's skirt. His mother, the earth, resisted this incestuous action. She buried herself in her own womb, that is to say, in the anthill, disguised as an ant. But the jackal followed her. There was, it should be explained, no other woman in the world whom he could desire. The hole which the earth made in the anthill was never deep enough, and in the end she had to admit defeat. This prefigured the even-handed struggles between men and women, which, however, always end in the victory of the male.

The incestuous act was of great consequence. In the first place it endowed the jackal with the gift of speech so that ever afterwards he was able to reveal to diviners the designs of God.

It was also the cause of the flow of menstrual blood, which stained the fibres. The resulting defilement of the earth was incompatible with the reign of God. God rejected that spouse, and decided to create living beings directly. Modelling a womb in damp clay, he placed it on the earth and covered it with a pellet flung out into space from heaven. He made a male organ in the same way and having put it on the ground, he flung out a sphere which stuck to it.

The two lumps forthwith took organic shape; their life began to develop. Members separated from the central core, bodies appeared, and a human pair arose out of the lumps of earth.

At this point the Nummo Pair appeared on the scene for the purpose of further action. The Nummo foresaw that the original rule of twin births was bound to disappear, and that errors might result comparable to those of the jackal, whose birth was single. For it was because of his solitary state that the first son of God acted as he did.

'The jackal was alone from birth,' said Ogotëmméli, 'and because of this he did more things than can be told.'

The Spirit drew two outlines on the ground, one on top of the other, one male and the other female. The man stretched himself out on these two shadows of himself, and took both of them for his own. The same thing was done for the woman. Thus it came about that each human being from the first was endowed with two souls of different sex, or rather with two principles corresponding to two distinct persons. In the man the female soul was located in the prepuce; in the woman the male soul was in the clitoris.

But the foreknowledge of the Nummo no doubt revealed to him the disadvantages of this makeshift. Man's life was not capable of supporting both beings: each person would have to merge himself in the sex for which he appeared to be best fitted.

The Nummo accordingly circumcised the man, thus removing from him all the femininity of his prepuce. The prepuce, however, changed itself into an animal which is 'neither a serpent nor an insect, but is classed with serpents'. This animal is called a nay. It is said to be a sort of lizard, black and white like the pall which covers the dead. Its name also means 'four', the female number, and 'Sun', which is a female being. The nay symbolized the pain of circumcision and the need for the man to suffer in his sex as the woman does.

The man then had intercourse with the woman, who later bore the first two children of a series of eight, who were to become the ancestors of the Dogon people. In the moment of birth the pain of parturition was concentrated in the woman's clitoris, which was excised by an invisible hand, detached itself and left her, and was changed into the form of a scorpion. The pouch and the sting symbolized the organ: the venom was the water and the blood of the pain.

The European, returning through the millet field, found himself wondering about the significance of all these actions and counteractions, all these sudden jerks in the thought of the myth.

Here, he reflected, is a Creator God spoiling his first creation; restoration is effected by the excision of the earth, and then by the birth of a pair of spirits, inventive beings who construct the world and bring to it the first spoken words; an incestuous act destroys the created order, and jeopardizes the principle of twin-births. Order is restored by the creation of a pair of human beings, and twin-births are replaced by dual souls. (But why, he asked himself, twin-births at all?)

The dual soul is a danger; a man should be male, and a woman female. Circumcision and excision are once again the remedy. (But why the nay? Why the scorpion?)

The answers to these questions were to come later, and to take their place in the massive structure of doctrine, which the blind old man was causing to emerge bit by bit from the mists of time.

Over the heads of the European and Koguem the dark millet clusters stood out against the leaden sky. They were passing through a field of heavy ears, stiffly erect and motionless in the breeze. When the crop is backward and thin, the ears are light and move with the slightest breath of wind. Thin crops are therefore full of sound. An abundant crop, on the other hand, is weighed down by the wind and bows itself in silence.

The Second Word and Weaving

ANYONE entering the courtyard upset its arrangements. It was so cramped that the kites, most cunning of all the acrobats of the air, could not get at the poultry. In a hollow stone there were the remains, or rather, the dregs of some millet-beer, which the poultry, cock, hen and chickens, were glad to drink. So was a yellow and white striped dog with tail erect like an Ethiopian sabre. When the door banged, all these creatures dispersed, leaving the courtyard to the humans.

Ogotemmêli, ensconced in his doorway, proceeded to enumerate the eight original ancestors born of the couple created by God. The four eldest were males: the four others were females. But by a special dispensation, permitted only to them, they were able to fertilize themselves, being dual and bisexual. From them are descended the eight Dogon families.

For humanity was organizing itself in this makeshift condition. The permanent calamity of single births was slightly mitigated by the grant of the dual soul, which the Nummo traced on the ground beside women in childbirth. Dual souls were implanted in the new-born child by holding it by the thighs above the place of the drawings with its hands and feet touching the ground. Later the superfluous soul was eliminated by circumcision, and humanity limped towards its obscure destiny.

But the divine thirst for perfection was not extinguished, and the Nummo Pair, who were gradually taking the place of God their father, had in mind projects of redemption. But, in order to improve human conditions, reforms and instruction had to be carried out on the human level. The Nummo were afraid of the terrifying effect of contact between creatures of flesh and blood on the one hand and purely spiritual beings on the other. There had to be actions that could be understood, taking place within the ambit of the beneficiaries and in their own environment. Men after regeneration must be drawn towards the ideal as a peasant is drawn to rich farmland.

The Nummo accordingly came down to earth, and entered the anthill, that is to say, the sexual part of which they were themselves the issue. Thus, they were able, among other tasks, to defend their mother against possible attempts by their elder, the incestuous jackal. At the same time, by their moist, luminous, and articulate presence, they were purging that body which was for ever defiled in the sight of God, but was nevertheless capable of acquiring in some degree the purity required for the activities of life.

In the anthill the male Nummo took the place of the masculine element, which had been eliminated by the excision of the termite-hill clitoris, while the female Nummo took the place of the female element, and her womb became part of the womb of the earth.

The Pair could then proceed to the work of regeneration, which they intended to carry out in agreement with God and in God's stead.

'Nummo in Amma's place,' said Ogotemmêli, 'was working the work of Amma.'

In those obscure beginnings of the evolution of the world, men had no knowledge of death, and the eight ancestors, offspring of the first human couple, lived on indefinitely. They had eight separate lines of descendants, each of them being self-propagating since each was both male and female.

The four males and the four females were couples in consequence of their lower, i.e. of their sexual, parts. The four males were man and woman, and the four females were woman and man. In the case of the males it was the man, and in the case of the females it was the woman, who played the dominant role. They coupled and became pregnant each in him or herself, and so produced their offspring.

But in the fullness of time an obscure instinct led the eldest of them towards the anthill which had been occupied by the Nummo. He wore on his head as head-dress and to protect him from the sun, the wooden bowl he used for his food. He put his two feet into the opening of the anthill, that is of the earth's womb, and sank in slowly as if for a parturition a tergo.

The whole of him thus entered into the earth, and his head itself disappeared. But he left on the ground, as evidence of his passage into that world, the bowl which had caught on the edges of the opening. All that remained on the anthill was the round wooden bowl, still bearing traces of the food and the finger-prints of its vanished owner, symbol of his body and of his human nature, as, in the animal world, is the skin which a reptile has shed.

Liberated from his earthly condition, the ancestor was taken in charge by the regenerating Pair. The male Nummo led him into the depths of the earth, where, in the waters of the womb of his partner he curled himself up like a foetus and shrank to germinal form, and acquired the quality of water, the seed of God and the essence of the two Spirits.

And all this process was the work of the Word. The male with his voice accompanied the female Nummo who was speaking to herself and to her own sex. The spoken Word entered into her and wound itself round her womb in a spiral of eight turns. Just as the helical band of copper round the sun gives to it its daily movement, so the spiral of the Word gave to the womb its regenerative movement.

Thus perfected by water and words, the new Spirit was expelled and went up to Heaven.

All the eight ancestors in succession had to undergo this process of transformation; but, when the turn of the seventh ancestor came, the change was the occasion of a notable occurrence.

The seventh in a series, it must be remembered, represents perfection. Though equal in quality with the others, he is the sum of the feminine element, which is four, and the masculine element, which is three. He is thus the completion of the perfect series, symbol of the total union of male and female, that is to say of unity.

And to this homogeneous whole belongs especially the mastery of words, that is, of language; and the appearance on earth of such a one was bound to be the prelude to revolutionary developments of a beneficent character.

In the earth's womb he became, like the others, water and spirit, and his development, like theirs, followed the rhythm of the words uttered by the two transforming Nummo.

'The words which the female Nummo spoke to herself,' Ogotemméli explained, 'turned into a spiral and entered into her sexual part. The male Nummo helped her. These are the words which the seventh ancestor learnt inside the womb.'

The others equally possessed the knowledge of these words in virtue of their experiences in the same place; but they had not attained the mastery of them nor was it given to them to develop their use. What the seventh ancestor had received, therefore, was the perfect knowledge of a Word—the second Word to be heard on earth, clearer than the first and not, like the first, reserved for particular recipients, but destined for all mankind. Thus he was able to achieve progress for the world. In particular, he enabled mankind to take precedence over God's wicked son, the jackal. The latter, it is true, still possessed knowledge of the first Word, and could still therefore reveal to diviners certain heavenly purposes; but in the future order of things he was to be merely a laggard in the process of revelation.

The potent second Word developed the powers of its new possessor. Gradually he came to regard his regeneration in the womb of the earth as equivalent to the capture and occupation of that womb, and little by little he took possession of the whole organism, making such use of it as suited him for the purpose of his activities. His lips began to merge with the edges of the anthill, which widened and became a mouth. Pointed teeth made their appearance, seven for each lip, then ten, the number of the fingers, later forty, and finally eighty, that is to say, ten for each ancestor.

These numbers indicated the future rates of increase of the families; the appearance of the teeth was a sign that the time for new instruction was drawing near.

But here again the scruples of the Spirits made themselves felt. It was not directly to men, but to the ant, avatar of the earth and native to the locality, that the seventh ancestor imparted instruction.

At sunrise on the appointed day the seventh ancestor Spirit spat out eighty threads of cotton; these he distributed between his upper teeth which acted as the teeth of a weaver's reed. In this way he made the uneven threads of a warp. He did the same with the lower teeth to make the even threads. By opening and shutting his jaws the Spirit caused the threads of the warp to make the movements required in weaving. His whole face took part in the work, his nose studs serving as the block, while the stud in his lower lip was the shuttle.

As the threads crossed and uncrossed, the two tips of the Spirit's forked tongue pushed the thread of the weft to and fro, and the web took shape from his mouth in the breath of the second revealed Word.

For the Spirit was speaking while the work proceeded. As did the Nummo in the first revelation, he imparted his Word by means of a technical process, so that all men could understand. By so doing he showed the identity of material actions and spiritual forces, or rather the need for their co-operation.

The words that the Spirit uttered filled all the interstices of the stuff: they were woven in the threads, and formed part and parcel of the cloth. They were the cloth, and the cloth was the Word. That is why woven material is called soy, which means 'It is the spoken word'. Soy also means 'seven', for the Spirit who spoke as he wove was seventh in the series of ancestors.

While the work was going on, the ant came and went on the edge of the opening in the breath of the Spirit, hearing and remembering his words. The new instruction, which she thus received, she passed on to the men who lived in those regions, and who had already followed the transformation of the sex of the earth.

Up to the time of the ancestors' descent into the anthill, men had lived in holes dug in the level soil like the lairs of animals. When their attention was drawn to the bowls which the ancestors had left behind them, they began to notice the shape of the anthill, which they thought much better than their holes. They copied the shape of the anthill accordingly, making passages and rooms as shelters from the rain, and began to store the produce of the crops for food.

They were thus advancing towards a less primitive way of life; and, when they noticed the growth of teeth round the opening, they imitated these too as a means of protection against wild beasts. They moulded great teeth of clay, dried them and set them up round the entrances to their dwellings.

At the moment of the second instruction, therefore, men were living in dens which were already, in some sort, a prefiguration of the place of revelation and of the womb into which each of them in due course would descend to be regenerated. And, moreover, the human anthill, with its occupants and its store-chambers for grain, was a rudimentary image of the system which, much later, was to come down to them from Heaven in the form of a marvellous granary.

These dim outlines of things to come predisposed men to take advice from the ant. The latter, after what it had seen the Spirit do, had laid in a store of cotton-fibres. These it had made into threads and, in the sight of men, drew them between the teeth of the anthill entrance as the Spirit had done. As the warp emerged, the men passed the thread of the weft, throwing it right and left in time to the opening and shutting movements of the jaws, and the resulting web was rolled round a piece of wood, fore-runner of the beam.

The ant at the same time revealed the words it had heard and the man repeated them. Thus there was recreated by human lips the concept of life in motion, of the transposition of forces, of the efficacy of the breath of the Spirit, which the seventh ancestor had created; and thus the interlacing of warp and weft enclosed the same words, the new instruction which became the heritage of mankind and was handed on from generation to generation of weavers to the accompaniment of the clapping of the shuttle and the creaking of the block, which they call the 'creaking of the Word'.

All these operations took place by daylight, for spinning and weaving are work for the daytime. Working at night would mean weaving webs of silence and darkness.

The Third Word and the Granary of Pure Earth

OGOTEMMÊLI had no very clear idea of what happened in Heaven after the transformation of the eight ancestors into Nummo. It is true that the eight, after leaving the earth, having completed their labours, came to the celestial region where the eldest Pair, who had transformed them, reigned. It is true also that these elders had precedence of the others, and did not fail to impose on them at once a form of organization and rules of life.

But it was never quite clear why this celestial world was disturbed to the point of disintegration, or why these disorders led to a reorganization of the terrestrial world, which had nothing to do with the celestial disputes. What is certain is that in the end the eight came down to earth again in a vast apparatus of symbols, in which was included a third and definitive Word necessary for the working of the modern world.

All that could be gathered from Ogotemmêli, by dint of patient attention to his words, was the evasive answer:

'Spirits do not fall from Heaven except in anger or because they are expelled.'

It was obvious that he was conscious of the infinite complexity of the idea of God or the Spirits who took his place, and was reluctant to explain it. However an outline, slight but nevertheless adequate, of this obscure period was eventually obtained.

The Nummo Pair had received the transformed eight in Heaven. But though they were all of the same essence, the Pair had the rights of the elder generation in relation to the newcomers, on whom they imposed an organization with a network of rules, of which the most onerous was the one which separated them from one another and forbade them to visit one another.

The fact was that, like human societies in which numbers are a source of trouble, the celestial society would have been heading for disorder, if all its members had gathered together.

Though this rule was their security, the new generation of Nummo, however, proceeded to break it and thereby overthrew their destiny; and this was how it came about.

God had given the eight a collection of eight different grains intended for their food, and for these the first ancestor was responsible. Of the eight, the last was the Digitaria, which had been publicly rejected by the first ancestor when it was given to him, on the pretext that it was so small and so difficult to prepare. He even went so far as to swear he would never eat it.

There came, however, a critical period when all the grains were nearly exhausted except the last. The first and second ancestors, who incidentally had already broken the rule about separation, met together to eat this last food. Their action was the crowning breach of order, confirming as it did their first offence by a breach of faith. The two ancestors thereby became unclean—that is to say, of an essence incompatible with life in the celestial world. They resolved to quit that region, where they felt themselves to be strangers, and the six other ancestors threw in their lot with them and made the same decision. Moreover, they proposed to take with them when they left anything that might be of use to the men they were going to rejoin. It was then that the first ancestor, no doubt with the approval and perhaps with the help of God, began to make preparations for his own departure.

He took a woven basket with a circular opening and a square base in which to carry the earth and puddled clay required for the construction of a world-system, of which he was to be one of the counsellors. This basket served as a model for a basket-work structure of considerable size which he built upside down, as it were, with the opening, twenty cubits in diameter, on the ground, the square base, with sides eight cubits long, formed a flat roof, and the height was ten cubits. This framework he covered with puddled clay made of the earth from heaven, and in the thickness of the clay, starting from the centre of each side of the square, he made stairways of ten steps each facing towards one of the cardinal points. At the sixth step of the north staircase he put a door giving access to the interior in which were eight chambers arranged on two floors.

The symbolic significance of this structure was as follows:

The circular base represented the sun.

The square roof represented the sky.

A circle in the centre of the roof represented the moon.

The tread of each step being female and the rise of each step male, the four stairways of ten steps together prefigured the eight tens of families, offspring of the eight ancestors.

Each stairway held one kind of creature, and was associated with a constellation, as follows:

The north stairway, associated with the Pleiades, was for men and fishes;

The south stairway, associated with Orion's Belt, was for domestic animals.

The east stairway, associated with Venus, was for birds.

The west stairway, associated with the so-called 'Long-tailed Star', was for wild animals, vegetables, and insects.

In fact, the picture of the system was not easily or immediately grasped from Ogotemméli's account of it.

'When the ancestor came down from Heaven,' he said at first, 'he was standing on a square piece of Heaven, not a very big piece, about the size of a sleeping-mat, or perhaps a bit bigger.'

'How could he stand on this piece of Heaven?'

'It was a piece of celestial earth.'

'A thick piece?'

'Yes! As thick as a house. It was ten cubits high with stairs on each side facing the four cardinal points.'

The blind man had raised his head, which was almost always bent towards the ground. How was he to explain these geometrical forms, these steps, these exact measurements? The European had begun by thinking that what was meant was a tall prism flanked by four stairways forming a cross. He kept returning to this conception in order to get it quite clear, while the other, patiently groping in the darkness which enveloped him, sought for fresh details.

At last his ravaged face broke into a kind of smile: he had found what he wanted. Reaching into the inside of his house and lying almost flat on his back, he searched among a number of objects which grated or sounded hollow as they scraped the earth under his hand. Only his thin knees and his feet were still visible in the embrasure of the doorway; the rest disappeared in the shadows within. The front of the house looked like a great face with the mouth closed on two skinny shin-bones.

After much tugging, an object emerged from the depths and appeared framed in the doorway. It was a woven basket, black with dust and soot of the interior, with a round opening and a square base, crushed and broken, a wretched spectacle.

The thing was placed before the door, losing several strands in the process, while the whole of the blind man's body reappeared, his hand still firmly grasping the basket.

'Its only use now is to put chickens in,' he said.

He passed his hands slowly over its battered remains, and proceeded to explain the world-system.

FIFTH DAY

The Third Word and the Classification of Things

The basket had been put away, with some embarrassment; returned to the place of mystery behind Ogotemméli's back, no one ever alluded to it again. The exposure of this ruin to the light of day had been, as it were, a defiance of worldly vanity; but it had served its purpose. All was now clear and the divine geometry was defined. It was possible to make a beginning with the detailed enumeration of the beings posted at the four cardinal points of the structure.

The west stairway was occupied by wild animals. From the top stair to the bottom stair it was given up to antelopes, hyenas, cats (two stairs for these), reptiles and saurians, apes, gazelles, marmots, the lion, and the elephant.

After the sixth step came the trees from the baobab to the Lannea acida, and on each of them were the insects commonly found there today.

On the south stairway were the domestic animals, beginning with fowls, then sheep, goats, cattle, horses, dogs and cats.

On the eighth and ninth steps were the chelonians, the giant tortoises, which today in each family take the place of the family heads, while these are absent, and the smaller tortoises, which are slowly done to death in the regional purification sacrifices.

On the tenth step were mice and rats (house and field).

The east stairway was occupied by birds. On the first step were the larger birds of prey and the hornbills; on the second were ostriches and storks; on the third, the small bustards and lapwings; on the fourth, vultures. Then came the smaller birds of prey, and then the herons. On the seventh step were the pigeons; on the eighth, turtle-doves; on the ninth, ducks; and last of all, the great bustards, white and black.

The north stairway was that of men and fish.

This clearly presented complications, for Ogotemméli had to go through it more than once before he could give a satisfactory account of it.

He certainly thought the men were Bozo, the original inhabitants of the Niger and still regarded by all the peoples of the Niger Bend as the only true fishermen. But their several positions on the different steps embarrassed Ogotemméli, and it was not until his second reference to the subject at the end of the day that he arrived at a final version, probably after consultation with another elder.

On each of the first two steps stood a male Bozo with a fish attached to his navel and hanging between his legs. The attachment to the navel had a significance for Ogotemméli which the European could not grasp. The man's navel was nipped between the fins of the fish: that is to say, the fish was quite clear of the man's belly. On the other hand, the name that the Dogon give to the Bozo was thought by Ogotemméli to indicate that the fish was in process of passing into the body of the man.

This name sologonon or sorogonon, from which is derived Sorko, another name for the Bozo, does in fact mean 'which has not completely passed'. It would apply therefore primarily to the fish, but ultimately to the Bozo himself, the two (i.e. the man and the fish) being twin brothers, as indicated by the umbilical connection.

On each of the next two steps was a Bozo woman, also attached to a fish. On the fifth step was a Bozo woman standing alone.

The five last steps were empty.

A question occurred to the European: 'Only some of the animals and vegetables were on the building; where were the rest?'

'Each of those mentioned was as it were a file-leader. All the others of his kind were behind him. The antelope on the first step of the west stairway is the walbanu, the red antelope. After him come the white, the black and the kā antelopes. So too on the first step of the south stairway, where the poultry stand, the guinea-fowl, the partridge and the rock-fowl are behind.'

'How could all these beasts find room on a step one cubit deep and one cubit high?'

The European had calculated that, according to the slope of the walls, the tread of each step must be six-tenths of a cubit deep, but he made no mention of the fact out of politeness, so as not to seem to be examining heavenly matters too closely.

'All this had to be said in words,' said Ogotemméli, 'but everything on the steps is a symbol, symbolic antelopes, symbolic vultures, symbolic hyenas.' He paused for a moment, and added: 'Any number of symbols could find room on a one-cubit step.'

For the word 'symbol' he used a composite expression, the literal meaning of which is 'word of this (lower) world'.

Ogotemméli, having described the structure as a granary, now proceeded to explain its design.

'The whole thing,' he said, 'with its stairways is called the "Granary of the Master of Pure Earth". It is divided into eight compartments, four below and four above. The door opens to the north on the sixth stair. It is as it were the mouth, and the granary is the belly, that is the interior, of the world.'

The structure having set the pattern for present-day granaries, the European wished to get a closer view of the arrangement of the system, and whispered to his assistant Koguem that he ought to see one of these constructions.

In point of fact nearly half the circumference of the courtyard was surrounded by granaries, some half a dozen of them in number. But to poke one's head into a granary is to invade the privacy of the family, to pry into its secrets. To scrutinize the foodstuffs, the seeds and ears of grain lying steeped in the darkness, is to measure up present resources and intrude into the provision for future needs.

Koguem put the point to the old man, suggesting a visit to an empty house he had noticed in Dyamini-Kuradondo, a village belonging to another family: but perhaps, he said, they could find a specimen nearer at hand.

Ogotemméli reflected. Obviously he was considering, in his blindness, possible ruined granaries in the locality. At the end of his list appeared no doubt his own granaries, for he pointed to two of these in the backyard.

The farthest of these was a ruin; it was there that Koguem used to throw stones a dozen times a day at the children who came to listen with ears alert to catch the secrets that were being talked about. The other granary was in good condition, empty but closed. A pair of hoes were needed to open it, for the door was fastened as if in the jaws of a vice. Ogotemmêli waited on his threshold, his hands crossed as always above his head. From time to time Koguem reported on the progress of the work. When the door at length gave way, the European took up his position in the embrasure, from which came the smell of old grain.

The four lower compartments in a Dogon granary are separated by two intersecting partitions, the junction of which forms a cup-like depression in the earth big enough to hold a round jar. This jar, containing grain or valuable objects, is the centre of the whole building. The door opens above these compartments, and is only just wide enough to admit the passage of a man's body.

Above the door is the upper storey comprising four other compartments, two of them in a line along the back wall and the other two along the side walls. They form a sort of ledge round the three sides, leaving the space at the entry free so that if a man crouched on the top of the lower compartments his shoulders would be level with the balcony.

In the celestial granary these compartments had a numbered order. The first was to the right of the entry on the lower floor, the second was the one on the right at the back, and so on round the building. The fifth was on the upper floor on the right and so on to the eighth, which was to the left on the upper floor.

Each of these compartments contained one of the eight seeds given by God to the eight ancestors in the following order: little millet, white millet, dark millet, female millet, beans, sorrel, rice and Digitaria. With each of these seeds were all the varieties of the same species.

But the eight compartments were not merely receptacles for the seeds which were to be introduced to human use. They also represented the eight principal organs of the Spirit of water which are comparable to the organs of men with the addition of the gizzard, for the Spirit has the speed of birds.

These organs were disposed in the following order: stomach, gizzard, heart, small liver, spleen, intestines, great liver, gall-bladder.

A round jar in the centre symbolized the womb; a second smaller jar closed the first; it contained oil of Lannea acida, and represented the foetus. On top of it again was a still smaller jar containing perfume, and on the top of this last was a double cup.

All the eight organs were held in place by the outer walls and the inner partitions which symbolized the skeleton. The four uprights ending in the corners of the square roof were the arms and legs. Thus the granary was like a woman, lying on her back (representing the sun) with her arms and legs raised and supporting the roof (representing the sky). The two legs were on the north side, and the door at the sixth step marked the sexual parts.

The granary and all it contained was therefore a picture of the world-system of the new order, and the way in which this system worked was represented by the functioning of the internal organs. These organs absorbed symbolic nourishment which passed along the usual channels of the digestion and the circulation of the blood. From compartments 1 and 2 (stomach and gizzard) the symbolical food passed into compartment 6 (the intestines) and from there into all the others in the form of blood and lastly breath, ending in the liver and the gall-bladder. The breath is a vapour, a form of water, which maintains and is indeed the principle of life.

As Ogotemmêli spoke, the deserted granary seemed to come to life, and the setting sun lighting up the west beyond the I gorges heightened the illusion. The walls of the building became tinged with rose colour, and cast gleams of light on the sandstone surfaces and the straw of the dung-heap. On the roof a bunch of purple sorrel stood out like fire. The moment was near when all the western walls of Upper and Lower Ogol would be aflame. All the visible surface of the granary shared in this prodigal display of light, while in the dark interior the wonders of the past came to life again.

Ogotemmêli, his head bowed and his hands on the nape of his neck, was lost in the past history of the heavens. At last he arrived at the final stratum of symbols which showed the universe compressed within the walls of the primal granary, a body filled with life and absorbing food.

'What is eaten,' he said, 'is the sunlight. What is excreted the dark night. The breath of life is the clouds, and the blood the rain that falls on the world.'

SIXTH DAY

The Third Word The Descent of the Granary of Pure Earth and Death

QUOTEMMÊLI had omitted to find a place in his system for the scorpion and the ray. He now placed them underneath the granary in the circle symbolizing the sun.

The ancestral constructor had assembled on the flat roof the tools and implements of a forge, for his future task was to teach men the use of iron to enable them to cultivate the land.

The bellows was made out of two vessels of unfired powdered earth and a white sheepskin; the two vessels were joined to one another like two twins, the wide opening being closed by a skin. An earthen duct led from each to the nozzle.

The hammer was in the form of a large iron block with a cone-shaped handle and a square strike. The anvil similarly shaped was fixed in a wooden beam.

The ancestral smith was equipped with an iron bow and spindles for arrows. One of these arrows he aimed at the granary roof at the centre of the circle representing the moon and he wound a long thread of gossamer round the shank to form a bobbin, so that the whole edifice became a gigantic spindle-whorl. Taking a second arrow, he attached the other end of the thread to it, and shot it into the vault of the sky to give it purchase.

A whole constellation of symbols was now to appear. In the first place there was the miraculous granary itself symbolizing the world-system, set in place and classified into categories of creatures. It was the plaited basket, which its constructor had copied, and which was to serve men as a unit of volume. The unit of length was the tread or the rise of the steps in the stairways, or one cubit. The unit of area was provided by the flat roof, whose sides were eight cubits. The two primary geometrical figures were shown in the square of the roof and the circular base, which, in the basket, was in fact the opening. This was the model granary in which men were to store the crops.

As such it was the ideal and ultimate realization of the arrangement of the anthill, which had already served as a model for men in the transformation of their underground dwellings.

It was also the spindle-whorl, the deadhead of the arrow which the smith had shot at the flat roof, and which served as the axis for the winding of the downward thread.

Symbolically it represented the shape of the iron used for spinning cotton, a shuttle, pointed at each end, in outline resembling a smith's hammer.

It was the head of the hammer; and, according to popular belief, it was in his hammer that the smith brought the seeds of men.

It was also the four-sided anvil, which is female, forged in imitation of the hammer, which is male.

It was the webbed hand of the Nummo, of which the hammer was the image; it was the upper half of the Nummo's body, which is also symbolized by the hammer; two opposite surfaces represent his breast and back: the others are his arms.

Lastly, it was the bodily form of the female element of the smith, who, like all beings, was dual.

All was now ready for departure except that there was no fire in the smithy. The ancestor slipped into the workshop of the great Nummo, who are Heaven's smiths, and stole a piece of the sun in the form of live embers and white-hot iron. He seized it by means of a 'robber's stick' the crook of which ended in a slit, open like a mouth. He dropped some of the embers, came back to pick them up, and fled towards the granary, but his agitation was such that he could no longer find the entrances. He made the round of it several times before he found the steps and climbed to the flat roof, where he hid the stolen goods in one of the skins of the bellows, exclaiming 'Gouyo!', which is to say, 'Stolen!'

The word is still part of the language, and means 'granary

It is a reminder that without the fire of the smithy and the iron of hoes there would be no crops to store.

Without losing a moment the smith flung the truncated pyramid along a rainbow. The edifice stood without turning on itself, and the thread unwound in serpentine coils suggesting the movement of water.

With hammer and bow in his hands, the smith stood ready to defend himself against attack from outer space. But the attack, when it came, was unexpected; to the accompaniment of a clap of thunder a brand flung by the female Nummo hit the flat roof. The smith in self-defence snatched one of the skins of the bellows and brandished it above his head—thus making a buckler of it. The skin, inasmuch as it had been in contact with a piece of the sun, had absorbed the essence of the sun, and the celestial fire could not prevail against it. The ancestor thereupon extinguished with water from his leather bottle the burning brand which was setting the edifice on fire. This brand, whose name was bazu, was to become the origin of the worship of the female fire.

A second thunderclap followed the first. It came this time from the male Nummo, but was no more effective than its predecessor. The smith extinguished the second brand, named anakyé, which was to become the origin of the worship of the male fire.

The granary then pursued its course along the rainbow, but its speed increased owing to the impetus given by the thunder.

The smith meanwhile resumed his position of defence on the roof, but, tired of holding his hammer clasped in his hand, he laid it across his arms raised slightly in front of him. The anvil he carried in a kind of sling made of a long leather strap round his neck hanging down over his shoulders behind. The wooden beam in which the anvil was fixed knocked against his legs.

During his descent the ancestor still possessed the quality of a water spirit, and his body, though preserving its human appearance, owing to its being that of a regenerated man, was equipped with four flexible limbs like serpents after the pattern of the arms of the Great Nummo.

The ground was rapidly approaching. The ancestor was still standing, his arms in front of him and the hammer and anvil hanging across his limbs. The shock of his final impact on the earth when he came to the end of the rainbow, scattered in cloud of dust the animals, vegetables and men disposed on the steps.

When calm was restored, the smith was still on the roof standing erect facing towards the north, his tools still in the same position. But in the shock of landing the hammer and the anvil had broken his arms and legs at the level of elbows and knees, which he did not have before. He thus acquired the joints proper to the new human form, which was to spread over the earth and to devote itself to toil.

It was in order to work that his arm was bent, for the flexible limbs were ill-fitted for the labours of forge and field. For hammering red-hot iron or for digging the land the leverage of the forearm was needed.

On making contact with the soil, therefore, the ancestor was ready for his civilizing work. He came down the north stairway and marked out a square field, ten times eight cubits on each side, oriented in the same way as the flat roof on which he had descended, and on which the unit measurement of land holdings was to be based.

The field was divided into eighty times eighty squares of one cubit a side, which were distributed among the eight families descended from the ancestors whose destiny it was to remain on earth. Along the median line of the square from north to south eight dwelling-houses were built, in which the earth was mixed with mud taken from the granary. The smithy was set up to the north of this line.

'They put celestial mud in the field,' said Ogotemmêli, 'and thus purified the soil; and later, as the land was gradually cleared, the impurity of the earth receded.'

The blind man always insisted on this matter of the impurity of the soil, the cause of the first disturbance of the order of the world.

'Originally, at the creation, the earth was pure. The lump flung by God was of pure clay. But the offence of the jackal defiled the earth and upset the world-order. That is why the Nummo came down to reorganize it. The earth which came down from Heaven was pure earth, and wherever it was put, it imparted its purity to the spot and to all the ground that was cleared. Wherever cultivation spread, impurity receded.'

The renewal of the soil was not the only work to be done. The granary came down full of new foods, intended for the regeneration and renewing of men. But the beginning of these labours was not without other incidents.

The smith, formerly a Nummo, could not by himself carry out his task as guide. Besides, his role was mainly that of a technician, and other forms of instruction were needed as well. Immediately after the smith, the first ancestor, the seven other ancestors descended. The ancestor of the leather-workers and the ancestor of the minstrels followed in order, each with his tools or instruments, and the others after them according to their rank. It was then that the incident occurred which was to determine the course of the reorganization.

The eighth ancestor, breaking the order of precedence, came down before the seventh, the master of Speech. The latter was so greatly incensed that, on reaching the ground, he turned against the others and, in the form of a great serpent, made for the granary to take the seeds from it.

According to another version, he bit the skin of the bellows in order to scatter the seeds which had been put in it. Others say that he came down at the same time as the smith in the form of the granary itself. On the ground he assumed the body of a great serpent, and a quarrel broke out between the two Spirits.

Be that as it may, the smith, in order to rid himself of an adversary and carry out the great purposes of God, advised men to kill the snake and eat its body and give him the head.

'According to others,' said Ogotemmêli, who attached the utmost importance to this turning-point in the history of the world and was concerned to make the attitude of the Spirits quite clear, 'according to others the smith, on his arrival, found the men of the eight families, and set up his smithy in their midst. When he put down the skins of the bellows, the great serpent suddenly appeared and fell upon them, scattering the millet all around. The men, seeing this newcomer and taken aback by its action, killed it. The smith thanked them, gave them the carcase to eat, and kept the head. But all agree as to what happened after the death of the serpent.'

'When he had the head, the smith took it to the stone that he used as a seat when hammering the iron; he made a hole buried it and put the stone on top.'

'Then is the Nummo seventh ancestor in every smithy today' asked the European.

'Yes,' said the blind man. 'Every smith when at work, is as we were sitting on the serpent's head.'

But there were other intricacies in the story. The Nummo seventh ancestor in the form of a serpent was killed by men, and his head was buried. But it might also be said that he was the granary which came down from Heaven, and that it was broken up and divided into pieces, and that the mud of its walls was spread over the primal field and mixed with the earth of the houses, while the seeds that were in it were buried in the soil at the time of sowing. It can be said that the serpent was killed, destroyed, and buried as serpent, as granary, and as seed.

'And why should this happen to him?'

'Because he was master of Speech.'

'And why did the master of Speech have to die?'

Ogotemmêli did not at once reply. His chin resting on his knees, which were drawn up to his breast, his hands against his cheeks, he looked into the night of his blindness.

'He died about the middle of November,' he said at last.

The European took his leave. The fact that his question had not been answered was none the less promising; he remembered that two days before, when he asked what was in the granary, the old man replied:

'Wolo!'

Which being interpreted means 'Nothing!'

SEVENTH DAY

The Third Word and the Regurgitation of the World-System

IN Ogotemmêli's courtyard everyone lived cheek by jowl with the poultry, whose moments of agitation and subsequent quiet were both short-lived; the universal panic aroused by the throwing of a stone or a piece of wood was never followed by more than a few moments of peace. This is because, in African villages, the fowls rarely get enough to eat. Their life is one incessant frenzied search for food, all the more so since the area in which they have to seek it is confined to the courtyards and narrow streets. Their wretchedly low weight makes them an easy prey for kites, and their only safe refuge is in the crowded living areas where the skimming flights or dives of their enemies are impossible.

Ogotemmêli was no sooner seated on his threshold and the European absorbed by the enquiry than the farmyard began to marshal its forces; chickens poked into the calabashes with dregs of beer in them or scratched in the hollow rocks, ready to make for the wall at the slightest shadow passing overhead. Some of them, in the heat of the day, would even roost on the stranger's canvas shoes, so that he no longer dared move a toe.

The chickens with their twittering voices were good company, but the cocks, and especially the Higon's cock, disturbed the sequence of Ogotemmêli's cosmogonies and interrupted his sentences by their loud cries and flapping movements. Ogotemmêli, looking up from the embrasure of the doorway, cursed them vigorously, voicing the hope that they would meet an early end in the cooking-pot. A moment afterwards he would resume, in slow monotonous tones, the discourse which had been broken off in the middle of the smith's thundering and the mechanism of heaven.

There had been a long week's gap of work in the northern country, between the sixth and seventh days of interviews with Ogotemmêli, and the European was anxious to renew the conversations. He sat down on his usual rock-seat, put his topee on the ground and threw into it the guavas on which he proposed to lunch.

'From the time of the smith's coming,' said Ogotemmêli, 'men had joints. Up till then they had flexible bones which would not bend enough. A flexible arm is no good for work.'

But arms alone, he added, and bare hands were limited in what they could do. Accordingly, in the months which followed, the smith gave men iron in the form of hoes which he helved. The hoe gave man a longer arm.

The introduction of the hoe was inevitably the signal for agricultural labour. Till that time there had only been a few plants on the earth, such as cotton, which was picked for weaving but not cultivated. Similarly, before the descent of the celestial granary there were only a few animals such as the ant, the termite, the jackal, and perhaps also the scorpion and the so-called 'Sun' lizard.

But the use of the hoe to break up the ground and the sowing of seed were not enough to start agriculture on its course. For that abundance of rain was needed.

It was also necessary for men to be organized if all the purposes of God were to be fulfilled.

Eight families, descendants of the eight ancestors, were living on the earth; and the oldest of all these men belonged to the eighth family.

Though all the families were equal in rank, the eighth enjoyed a special privilege.

'Seven,' said Ogotemmêli, 'is the rank of the master of Speech; $1 + 7 = 8$. The eighth rank is that of Speech itself. Speech is separate from the one who teaches it, that is, the seventh ancestor; it is the eighth ancestor. The eighth ancestor is the foundation of the speech which all the other ancestors used and which the seventh taught.'

The oldest man then living, therefore, because he belonged to the eighth family, was of all living beings on earth the most truly representative of the Word. His name was Lébé.

But men possessed an older Word, the second, which they had learnt from weaving; and this Word had to give place to the third Word. The new Word should have been imparted by the seventh ancestor Nummo, who had been killed by men, and whose head was now lying under the seat in the smithy in the northern section of the primal field.

The oldest man had to die in order to pass into the same world as the seventh ancestor, and so enable the purposes of God to be fulfilled. So he died.

'But not really,' said Ogotemmêli: 'only in appearance. The common people were told that he was dead, just as they had been told that the seventh ancestor had been killed and eaten. But in reality neither of them was dead. The old man could not die, because Death did not appear on the scene till later. The seventh ancestor could not die, because he was a Nummo.'

'Then why deceive the people?' asked the European.

'To make them understand things better,' said the blind man.

He proceeded further:

When the old man died they laid him on the ground while they dug a grave, oriented north-south in the field not far from the smithy. In this they buried him lying flat on his back with his head to the north, that is, in the position of the earth, and exactly in its navel, that is, its centre.

The reason why they laid him flat on his back was in order that the purposes of God might be fulfilled, and also because men knew nothing of death or of funerary ceremonies. As time went on, when people died, they were laid in the bottom of graves or in caves with their heads to the north, males on their right sides and females on their left, in the position in which they slept on the platform-bed of the second room. They did not bend their limbs for a few moments, as they were to do later with all their dead, so as to give them temporarily the form of the foetus and so prefigure the regeneration.

The primal field thus contained on the one hand the body of the oldest man, who belonged to the eighth family, which was of the rank of the Word. It also contained, under the smith's stone, the head of the seventh ancestor.

The first sounds of the smithy began to be heard. They penetrated into the depths of the earth and reached the seventh ancestor, whom men had killed. As the rhythmic sounds of the bellows blowing up the fire and the hammer striking the anvil came down to him, the seventh ancestor Nummo took his spirit form of a human trunk ending in a reptile. Rising up on his tail, with regular movements of his arms held out in front of him, and rhythmic jerks of his body he swam into the first dance movements, which brought him underground to the tomb of the old man.

To the rhythm of the work of the smith he made his way to the north of the body where the skull was, and proceeded to swallow it. He took it into his womb and gave new life to it. Then, always in time to the same sounds, he expelled into the tomb a torrent of water and the transformed being.

On the place where the body had been, this water, symbol of rushing torrents and of stagnant pools, lay in a great sheet, from which issued five rivers flowing in the directions of the head and the limbs.

The water was also the water of parturition. The Nummo's womb had transformed the man's bones into coloured stones, and ejected them into the bottom of the tomb so as to form the outline of a skeleton laid out flat on its back in the place where the body had been, with its head to the north.

'The seventh ancestor,' Ogotemméli explained, 'swallowed the old man head-first, and brought up the dougué stones, putting them in the shape of the stretched-out body. It was like a drawing of a man picked out with stones.'

The outline was also like the outline of a man's soul which the Nummo makes at every birth, and he indicated, by the arrangement of the stones, the order of human society.

'He organized the world,' said Ogotemméli, 'by vomiting the dougué stones in the outline of a man's soul.'

He placed the stones one by one, beginning with the one for the head, and with the eight principal stones, one for each ancestor, he marked the joints of the pelvis, the shoulders, the knees, and the elbows. The right-hand side came first; the stones of the four male ancestors were placed at the joints of the pelvis and shoulders, that is, where the limbs had been attached, while the stones of the four female ancestors were placed at the other four joints.

'The joints,' said Ogotemméli, 'are the most important part of a man.'

Next came the stones of secondary importance designating the long bones, the vertebral column and the ribs.

All these dougué were covenant-stones which the totemic priests were later to wear round their necks. They were pledges of the affection of the eight ancestors, repositories of their life-force, which they desired to put into circulation again in their descendants.

The dougué were eight in number like the eight ancestors or the eight sorts of seed. They represented the eight elders at the origin of mankind; and the eight men, the eight seeds and the eight joints are all the same order as the dougué.

All the colours of the rainbow, along which the smith had descended, were represented, but not in their natural order: the left leg was almost black, the right leg and left arm were reddish, and the right arm almost white. But only the dominant colour of each member was distinguishable: the skeleton as a whole was multi-coloured.

The colours of the eight principal dougué, assigned to the different ancestors according to their rank, recalled either the colours of the organs of the celestial granary or those of the corresponding seeds.

The first stone, chestnut-yellow like the Dogon dress, was the colour of the stomach (compartment 1);

the second, reddish with a white line across it, was the colour of the gizzard (compartment 2);

the third was red like the heart (compartment 3);

the fourth was whitish like female millet (compartment 4);

the fifth was brown like beans (compartment 5);

the sixth was black like crushed sorrel (compartment 6);

the seventh was pink like the liver (compartment 7);

the eighth was green and white like gall (compartment 8).

The Nummo also spat out the dead man's nails in the form of cowries, eight for each hand and each foot. He put them in the place of the hands and feet beginning with the right in the following order:

One cowrie on the second finger and another on the forefinger, to indicate that the first two ancestors were twins;

one cowrie on the thumb, the third ancestor having been born singly;

one on the ring-finger and one on the little finger for the fourth and fifth ancestors, who were also twins;

one in addition on the thumb, forefinger and second finger for the sixth, seventh and eighth ancestors.

The European noted, by the way, that cowries 7 and 8, the numbers relating to speech, were placed on two fingers (forefinger and second finger), which among the Dogon 'divide' words.

FIG. 4b. Social system of the Third Word

Ogotemmêli did not offer much explanation on this point. He said, however, that when any suspicion of foul play attached to a death, the dead man's second finger was left outside the shroud and slightly curved, in order to point to and 'catch' the guilty man.

But he reverted to the cowries.

'Later,' he said, 'when trade was invented, cowries were placed in heaps of eight in the order of the fingers. Beyond that number men counted by as many times eight as there were nails on the two hands, that is by eighties. Eight times eighty, or 640, was the limit.'

Between the legs of the outline the Nummo put copper, the product of his digestion and the metal which was later used to make bracelets for ritual purposes.

The arrangement of the eight stones of the joints later came to determine the system of marriages based on the principle of alternation between left and right, upper and lower, odd and even, male and female, as follows:

third family (right arm, male) with sixth family (left leg, female);

The principle of alternation was carried so far that in the case of upper and lower, for example, it was not only between the upper and lower parts of the body but between the upper and lower parts of a limb that unions were authorized. For instance, a thigh (lower part of the body but upper part of a limb) with a forearm (upper part of the body but lower part of a limb). The system of marriages was so arranged that the sum of the numbers representing the rank of the two families was always 9, which is the rank of chieftainship.

FIG. 5. Numerical value of the fingers

As for the stone in the place of the skull, that also had the rank of 9, as it was to be assigned to the chieftainship in each family.

The cowries put in the place of the fingers also indicated the marriage system, the second finger having the rank of 1 and 8, the forefinger that of 2 and 7, and the thumb that of 3 and 6. The idea was to show that the mating of ranks was indicated on a single finger. Mating and marrying meant uniting in one.

The 4 and 5 of the ring and little fingers represented the mating of twins of opposite sexes, that is to say, of two beings forming only one. (Were not the fourth male and fifth female ancestors twins?)

Ogotemmêli's account had not proceeded without interruptions. To begin with, he had had considerable difficulty in his exposition of the joints. As it was impossible for him to make drawings in the dust, he gave concrete form to his calculations by tapping on his thighs or forearms. In addition to this, his discourse was interrupted a score of times by fowls, dogs and inquisitive women. For instance, when he was describing the subterranean dance of resurrection, Koguem hurled himself into the courtyard, waving his arms, puffing and whistling like a snake. He had come back to hand to the European the dilapidated pieces of a guava, which a hen with six chickens had stolen from his topee.

'Poor brutes!' said the European, throwing the fruit to the hen, who made off, taking it for a stone.

'What is happening?' asked the blind man.

Koguem explained; Ogotemmêli, looking up from the doorway, was indignant. Stretching out his hands he asked for the fruit, which he then proceeded to divide into three and distribute between the three of them.

'A hen,' he grumbled, 'is not entitled to eat guava.'

The Third Word and the Work of Redemption

THE millet harvest had long been over. Between the two Ogols in the Hogon's field, the dry stalks rustled in the slightest breath of wind. The earth had to wait through a whole season of wind and sun before it would be opened up again. Not for a long time would the peasants begin to reckon the crop by its height, anxiously watching its growth in the meantime and assisting it by sacrifices of fowls, by unremitting prayer and complicated precautions. It would be months before the first appearance of the young stalks would be hailed as 'nose tips' or the first sign of the leaves bending to the wind as 'cock tails', or before the earth, disappearing under a carpet of green growth, would be described as 'hidden mounds' or the expression 'swallow the beasts' would indicate that the stalks were high enough to hide a sheep from view.

The European walked along the raised tracks above the harvested fields in which the baobabs stood out pinkish-green against the rising sun. He knew the names of all those in the Ogol country and the chronological order of their planting for twenty years back. He admired from a distance the eighth on the list, Adama, the largest of them all. Nine men with linked arms would hardly be able to encircle its trunk. Adama was larger than the Gravel baobab, whose seeds were like sand; larger than the Ropy baobab, whose fruit yielded a cream running like cheese, larger too than the Tall one, or gnarled Ancestor, or Small Seeds, High Bosom, Little Bulk or Place Plac, whose fragile fruits burst as they fall. Then, as he made his way into the narrow streets and took up his position in Ogotemméli's courtyard, he cast a glance at the topmost branches, visible above the roofs, of the tree known simply as the Baobab without further qualification, the ancestor of all these monster growths.

'The old man whom the seventh Nummo ate,' said Ogotemméli, 'was called Lébé. The stones which all priests wear round their necks are his bones.' But men had no knowledge of the subterranean resurrections at the time when they occurred. They did not acquire the treasure of the stones immediately after they had been placed there. They did not know what caused the rains which now began to fall and were the signal for the clearing of the field marked out by the smith.

These first rains indeed were for the purpose of purification. The seventh Nummo, a pure spirit, in swallowing the old man, had assimilated defiled human nature and the lapsed second Word. When he vomited to the rhythm of the blows on the anvil, there was ejected, with the pure covenant stones, a liquid which carried away the impurity. This liquid spread out into stagnant pools and flowing rivers, carving out valleys and flooding hollows. It had to be swept away and replaced by water which was pure and beneficent. This was done by the rain, which the Great Nummo in Heaven sent to help the seventh Nummo in his labours.

But this water from Heaven did not merely drive back the flood of the rivers; it also watered the primal field, and thus made it possible for the smith to teach the art of sowing.

It was much later, according to some, that men learnt of the prodigious events which had taken place underground. The land became too small for their needs, and they decided to emigrate en masse. Wishing, however, to keep their links with the past, and to have the same soil under their feet, they opened Lébé's grave, intending to take the bones and the earth with them when they went. It was then that they discovered the arrangement of stones thrown up by the seventh Nummo and the Spirit himself in the form of a serpent.

According to others, they made this discovery in the first year of cultivation, when the time came to give the field its first dressing.

Others again say that they buried Lébé and sowed the seed the same day. It was at the harvest that they opened the grave, thinking the old man had risen again like the millet.

In this way, therefore, the spiritual and the material organization went hand in hand. As in the case of the first and second Words, instruction concerning the third Word was embodied in technical processes.

'But why,' said the European, returning to his former question, 'why should the seventh ancestor be killed? And why should he eat Lébé on account of his being a descendant of the eighth ancestor?'

'The seventh Nummo ate Lébé,' replied Ogotemméli, 'in order that men should believe that the stones were his bones digested and transformed . . . in order that the affair should be an affair of men and not of heaven, so that something of heaven should become part of human nature; it was to make men believe that the aged Lébé, the oldest and most venerable of them all, and he alone, was present in the covenant-stones. It was so that men might understand all the things he had done that the Nummo came down on to the skeleton of a man.'

'You speak of "making" people "believe". Was there then something secret, which they were not to know?'

'If you wanted to explain what happened to someone who knew nothing about it, to an ordinary man, you would say that a Power came down from heaven to eat the old man and change his bones into beneficent stones.'

'But what is the truth?'

'If one wanted to explain it to you, a Nazarene, one would say that someone came down from heaven like a woman with a woman's dress and ornaments, and ate the old man, and that the stones are not his bones but her ornaments.'

'The stones and cowries,' he added, 'were contained in the jar at the meeting point of the partitions in the centre of the granary.'

'But why,' the European insisted, 'was the seventh ancestor killed?'

There was no reply.

'The seventh Nummo,' went on Ogotemméli as though talking to himself, 'sacrificed himself. He alone could do it, he the master of Speech, which is to say the master of the world. Without him no reorganization was possible. He might say—he did not say it, but he might have said—"What I did, the work that I accomplished and the word that I spoke, is: ku ma inné déga dá bébadou," which means "My head has fallen for man's salvation".'

Lébé was eaten because he was a descendant of the eighth ancestor, of the family of the Word. The Word is the most important thing in the world. In eating Lébé the seventh Nummo, the master of Speech, took all that there was of good in the earlier Word and incorporated it in the stones. All that was impure was cast out with the water and carried away by the rains.

The seventh ancestor, dead only in appearance, ate Lébé, also dead only in appearance. In eating the man he took what was good in him but, for his own part, he gave his life-force to the human flesh of the man, that is to say, to men: for in doing this for the oldest man he did it for all mankind. Thus because the seventh ancestor consumed Lébé, descendant of his brother the eighth ancestor, their respective life-forces were mingled.

'And what of their souls? What happened to them?'

'Their souls were joined together and, though they remain distinct, they are never parted. Every year, at the Great Sacrifice in honour of Lébé, the men who eat the victim representing the ancestor ask that it shall always remain so. They go to the sanctuary and say: "May Nummo and Lébé never cease to be the same good thing they now are! May they never lose this identity!"'

'In short,' said the European, 'it is a case of human and celestial natures indissolubly linked.'

But the European was never greatly interested in his own speculations.

'All the same,' observed Ogotemméli, 'the new Lébé who emerged from the vomit, the Lébé whom we honour today . . .'

He pulled himself together. It was a difficult thing to explain. Moreover the Hogon's wife had just come into the courtyard and greeted them. She was an old woman with a gentle voice, which broke at certain words because of palpitations of the heart; bending her small round head forward, wide-eyed and open-mouthed, she listened intently to what the European said to her.

'God brings you!' she said. 'Give me a cure for my heart!'

'It is old stuff,' he explained. 'How can one make a new heart out of an old one?'

He repeated this joke to her every time they met, because he knew it made her laugh till she cried.

Ogotemmêli had ceased speaking after the interminable greetings were concluded and remained silent as long as the old woman was moving about in the courtyard until he heard her go.

'One cannot speak of Lébé,' he said, 'before the Hogon's wife.'

The Hogon is in fact the priest of Lébé, the oldest man of the group and the highest religious dignitary.

'Women have ears,' he whispered as if imparting the most sensational confidence.

This scene was repeated a dozen times a day. Now it was the Hogon's wife, now the wife of a totem-priest, now an uncircumcised girl, now a mistrustful old man, now a smith, who wandered into the courtyard, or showed their heads at the gap in the stone wall.

One could not speak of the Lébé in front of the Hogon's wife, of the eight ancestors in front of a priest's wife, of the Nummo in front of a smith or of anything before fools.

'Lébé,' said Ogotemmêli, continuing his discourse, 'was something new in the record of the eight.' He meant by this that eight was in a certain sense the last of the symbolic numbers, and there was nothing beyond it. By 'Lébé' he meant, not the original old man, but the new elemental being resulting from the union of the old man and the Nummo.

'Lébé,' he said, 'is in some sort of ninth Power, as if he had been created by the seventh Nummo ancestor and the descendant of the eighth ancestor.'

He also meant that the descendant of the eighth ancestor was like the eighth ancestor himself. But in the series of Nummo ancestors the seventh and eighth are both female.

'Lébé is a new Word created by two females. This ninth Power is the offspring of an unknown father, like a bastard; it is not known which of the two, the seventh or the eighth played the part of the male.'

But Ogotemmêli was careful to explain that all this was a manner of speaking, and that he was merely trying to explain to the Nazarene the absence of a father. Incidentally the principle of dual beings might explain this creation. Since all beings were dual and bisexual (though with one or the other sex predominating) they were all capable of procreation, subject apparently to the intervention of a third being. In the case therefore of the two Nummo ancestors, the seventh and the eighth, believed to be female but with a non-dominant male element, it was possible that the female element in the one was fertilized by the male element (even though not dominant) in the other.

'Lébé,' concluded Ogotemmêli, 'proceeding as he did from the seventh and the eighth, ranks as 9; and that is the rank of chieftainship. It is indicated by the stone placed in the grave in the position of the skull, and it derives from the transformation of the central jar of the granary. It is at once the skull and the jar containing the eight other stones.'

At this moment Koguem's comrade Allaye brought him a calabash of ten francs' worth of milk, half of which had been paid for by Koguem.

'You drink first,' said Allaye.

Koguem drank in long gulps, his eyes upturned so as not to lose sight for a moment of the other, who watched him narrowly.

'Enough!' cried Allaye, taking back the vessel. 'Enough! I know how much five francs' worth of milk is!'

The Third Word and the Drums

By almost imperceptible signs the fact that it was market day became apparent. The Dogon week has five days, the number of fingers on one hand; market day therefore recurred with a frequency which agreeably disturbed the European's customary reckoning of time. Market day had its own sounds and its silences, its light and its shadows, from the subdued craftiness of the early morning, through the feverish clamour of midday, to the relaxation of the evening. The night before the small fires of the merchants could be seen from Gôna, flickering on the sandstone flats which stretched towards the Kamma country. All the sky-line was ringed with bales of merchandise wrapped in skins, fat asses relieved of their loads, clamour of men chattering or dreaming of gain. At sunrise, men and merchandise, with a thud of unshod feet, would pour into the Ogols.

There was also a notable change in the volume of barking at the approaches to the market; the dogs were clustering round the butchers' yards, attracted by the blood trickling under the doors or through the holes in the walls.

From the third hour of the day the great rock of Dolo was bathed in sunlight and crowded with men. Not a single tree cast the slightest shade on the stones which formed the rough divisions between the pitches of the salesmen. To the west the sun sloped abruptly to the valley with its flat slabs of rock, between which tepid trickles of water made their way. Men and women clung to this outfall as they dragged themselves up to the market-place, brimming with sun, heat and pungent smells and venting its overflowing stench into the hollows below.

Everyone was wearing his best clothes of white or toast-coloured cotton cloth. The men swept along in their full-sleeved tunics cut low at the neck, where the ritual stones hung. Adults wore short breeches fitting tightly round the calf but very full in the seat and billowing to right and left. The older men wore them longer reaching nearer the ground, while those of important persons were of vast size, though none of them approached the dimensions of the garment worn by the untouchable Hogon, who never went outside the village. The width of the seat varied with the status of the wearer.

Young boys were dressed in long white tabard-like garments, some of which were open at the sides exposing the thighs. These were called 'Pick me up, Mum!' because young children in these were easier to pick up and carry.

All the women, their bodies naked and their breasts flabby or firm, wore loin-cloths of four strips, bracelets at the bend of the arm or on the wrist, and necklaces of green or red beads, while their ears were edged with eight metal studs and the lobes were adorned with a red triangular pendant.

Owing to conditions overseas during recent years, there was little evidence of those frilled costumes, ridiculous umbrellas, useless spectacles and other tasteless trade goods which had formerly poured into the country. Distant wars had, for the time being, protected these lands from the invasion of such rubbish.

The market stirred the emotions of all the men and many of the animals from Kamma to Yugo. By midday all were immersed in its busy hum with ears burning and eyes on the watch for modest but exciting purchases.

The hubbub was not confined to the market-place and the tracks which led to it; eddies and incidents reached the very foundations of the houses. The old people, too dignified to satisfy their curiosity by mingling with the crowd, and the Hogon himself, without leaving his rock-dwelling, knew hour by hour every happening, great or small, in Dolo; and Ogotemmêli in ordinary times—that is to say, before his acquaintance with Nazarenes—was at the very centre of the news.

He used in those days to have clients who took advantage of their journey to seek medical attention; and from them he gathered first-hand information as to events in Yennndumman, Mendéli, Ninu and Pêguê. Plain, plateau and scree all discharged their sick and their sportsmen, the latter eager to learn how to be sure of killing a bush-buck. Ogotemmêli gave them all advice or powders, and his reputation continued to spread from street to street and from courtyard to courtyard.

Seeing the Nazarene there, the flood of visitors had retreated into the square of perplexity. Ever since the fourth day of the conversations, which happened to be a market-day, they had avoided the Tabda quarter. But this time a few bold spirits had ventured as far as the gap in the wall, and called their greetings. The unusual presence of the stranger had frightened some and put the others out of countenance.

A modus vivendi had had to be found for these exceptional days of crowd and confusion; and the conversation had been resumed in spite of the hubbub. Ogotemmêli was expounding the gift of the third Word and the work of civilization and resurrection in which it was embodied.

The most important of all drums, he said, was the armpit drum. The Nummo made it.

It consists of two hemispherical wooden cups connected through their centres by a slender cylinder. It is like an hour-glass with a very long narrow neck. With this instrument tucked between his left arm and armpit, the drummer, by pressing on the hollow structure of thin wood, can tighten or relax the tension on the skins and so modify the tone.

'The Nummo made it. He made a picture of it with his fingers, as children do today in games with string.'

Holding his hands apart, he passed a thread ten times round each of the four fingers, but not the thumb. He thus had forty loops on each hand, making eighty threads in all, which, he pointed out, was also the number of teeth in each of his jaws. The palms of his hands represented the skins of the drum, and thus to play on the drum was, symbolically, to play on the hands of the Nummo. But what do they represent?

Cupping his two hands behind his ears, Ogotemmêli explained that the spirit had no external ears but only auditor holes.

'His hands serve for ears,' he said; 'to enable him to hear he always holds them on each side of his head. To tap the drum is to tap the Nummo's palms, to tap, that is, his ears.'

Holding before him the web of threads which represented the web of the Spirit, the Spirit with his tongue interlaced them with a kind of endless chain made of a thin strip of copper. He coiled this in a spiral of eighty turns, and throughout the process he spoke as he had done when teaching the art of weaving. But what he said was new. It was the third Word, which he was revealing to men.

For the technique of making a drum was similar to the technique of weaving; and the bodkin with which the craftsman pierces the edge of the skins to thread the tension-cord through is a symbol of the shuttle and of the Nummo's tongue. Beating the drum is also a form of weaving. The blows of the drumstick make the sound leap from one skin to the other inside the cylinder, as the shuttle and its thread pass from one hand to the other in the warp.

'But why the copper spirals? Ordinary drums do not have these.'

'The drum with the copper winding is easier for the Nummo to hear. It is reserved for the chieftainship of the Aru. Ordinary people do not have it. Moreover it is not played except on rare occasions.'

'As for the copper spiral, it is the channel for the sound, which is to say, for the Word. Beating the skin animates the copper and the Word which Nummo took through the interlacing of the tension thread and the metal band. From the copper the sound passes to the drum; it then returns to the copper-strip, and from there reverberates in the ears of the Spirit, which are already alerted because the skins represent them. But the drum was not intended merely to link men with the Nummo. It taught them the new Word, complete and clear, of the new age.'

But the armpit drum was not enough to teach this Word, which had to take many forms to meet the various needs of men. Accordingly the head of each of the eight families made a drum for his own group following the instructions of the seventh Nummo.

For the size of his drum and the tension of the skin the smith of the first family took his bellows as a model. The body of the bellows suggested the idea of the sound-box, and the leather with its fastening served as a pattern for the skin to be beaten.

Thus a drum was made from half a baobab fruit, on which was stretched the skin of a frog or toad. It resembles a woman's breast, and its sound is like that which an infant makes when sucking. On this drum the smith beat the first rhythms he had heard on the double skin of the bellows, when he blew up the fire at the time of the subterranean resurrection of the Nummo.

FIG. 6. Range of drums and languages

The second family had an armpit drum of smaller size. The third family had the one taught them by the Nummo. The fourth family constructed a cylindrical box recalling the small stature of the first men. The fifth family did the same with a larger block of wood, which gave out a loud sound like the roar of a lion.

The sixth family stretched a skin over the opening of a large spherical calabash in the shape of a woman's belly. Its sound is like the groans of childbirth. The seventh family made a box out of a trunk of different dimensions from that of the fifth family. The eighth family had the largest box. It is like the belly of a cow, and owing to its size gives a fine rolling sound.

Each drum had a sound of its own, and so each family had its own language, which is the reason why there are different languages today.

The first two families, settled in the south, spoke two dialects of Toro, not very different from each other; the third family spoke Mendéli; the fourth spoke Sanga; the fifth another form of Toro; the sixth Bamba; and the seventh Irelli. Lastly the eighth family was given a language which is understood in all parts of the cliff. Just as the eighth drum dominates all the others, so the eighth language is understood everywhere.

It was thus that men were given the third Word, final, complete and multiform to suit the new age. It was closely associated, like the first and second Words, and even more than they, with material objects.

At this point an odd reflection occurred to the European.

The first imperfect Word was associated with a technical process, simple in character and no doubt the most archaic of all processes, which had produced the most primitive form of clothing made of fibre. The fibre, which was neither knotted nor woven, flowed in a wavy line, and might be said therefore to be of one dimension. The second Word, less restricted than the first, arose from weaving, done on a wide warp crossed by vertical threads forming a surface, that is to say, having two dimensions. The third Word, clear and perfect in character, took shape in a cylinder with a strip of copper winding through it, that is to say, in a three-dimensional figure.

These three technical processes (as he further remarked) all proceeded by following a line, either undulating or zig-zag, and each was characterized by three distinct features: humidity of the fibres, ensuring the freshness necessary for procreation; light for the weaving, that being a daylight process, prohibited at night on pain of blindness; sonority of the drum.

There was also a development, from the material point of view, from trimmed bark to cotton thread, and from thread to leather strips and to a copper band.

Throughout this day's conversation Ogotemméli had seemed absent-minded. He was no doubt in touch, through invisible channels, with all the commercial and political activities of the district. His thoughts were probably occupied also with certain friends to whom he had entrusted commissions, among them the close friend who was to bring him his tobacco.

His pre-occupation on this last account had been noticeable more than once during the morning's conversation, and allusions to the signal service rendered by tobacco had punctuated his account of the third Word.

By evening, his pre-occupation had grown into a certain perceptible impatience. He had indeed received the tobacco, but he would have liked to prepare it: for the leaves had to be reduced to powder by beating them on a stone and crushing them like grain.

In the end he could no longer restrain his impatience and said he would be fined.

'Fined?'

'Is it not forbidden to beat the ground at night?'

The stranger had indeed forgotten that at night silence must be preserved, in particular no sound of blows on the ground may be heard, or grinding in the hollows of the rock or in mortars.

Tobacco, which clarifies ideas, was well worth an interruption in the cosmogonic narrative.

The European took his leave. He went by a roundabout way through the tangle of narrow lanes, finally arriving in the street which ran through all five quarters of the village. It was the hour of after-market exhaustion, the hour of satiety, of chewing over successful business transactions. In every courtyard digestion was proceeding, digestion of a day of words.

TENTH DAY

The Word and the Craft of Weaving

ON the previous day the European had not been to Ogotemmêli's house. He had been anxious to make soundings elsewhere in order to verify and correct what he had learnt. He had been to Ongnonlu, a man of weight in the Dudyia quarter, father of the priest-designate of the sanctuary erected at Ogoiné.

The entrance to Ongnonlu's house was through a low room giving on to an open shed, which itself opened on to the dung-heap. All Dogon houses seem to be made for small men. Koguem had to sit first on a rock and later on an umbilical-shaped hen-house in which a broody hen was clucking. Ongnonlu squatted on a piece of wood laid across the dung-heap, which occupied the whole courtyard. The European sat on a tin, the seat of honour. Seventeen sheep and lambs wandered back and forth unceasingly like the waves on a beach. None of them could decide to lead the others along the street to an open place. From time to time the woolly tide blocked a corner holding up the traffic.

Ongnonlu proved to be a first-rate source of information. There were slight reticences when the conversation touched on certain reserved subjects; but on the whole he provided admirable cross-checks on Ogotemmêli's information.

The sheep passed through the narrow space between the European and Koguem, who were seated less than a yard apart. For a moment the ranks of the intruders widened, only to be narrowed again as they passed between two women spinning, till finally after a moment's hesitation they disappeared into the narrow entry of the dwelling-house. But the women and Ongnonlu were so intent on talking to the European, watching him out of the corners of their eyes, and generally getting used to his presence, that they took no notice of the sheep.

Ongnonlu was expounding the mystery of Death, the pomp and circumstance of man, and the invention of materials. Suddenly he pricked up his ears: his dark face, puckered into a pleasant smile, relaxed as he turned towards the back of the courtyard. He leapt up with a shout, pulling on his Phrygian cap (which was slipping) and, followed by the women who dropped the pestles they had in their hands, rushed into the low doorway which opened into the dark interior. A great noise followed, and three clouds of dust poured from the door and the openings in the side-walls. One by one the sheep emerged and stood there shyly, dazzled by the light. Ongnonlu's head appeared above a mass of wool. Spitting and fuming he drove the flock into a blind alley between the wall and the granary and blocked the opening with a large basket.

The door of the house having now been shut, the actors in this comedy returned, the one to his conversation and the two others to their mortars.

Suddenly one of the women paused—Ongnonlu was at the moment rooted to the spot—and hurried to the door, through which she vanished. New shouts! More dust! The biggest of the rams, which his master had shut up in his haste, burst out and the rest of the imprisoned animals, smashing the basket, joined him and, charging between the European and Koguem, made straight for the entry to the yard, stopped short, urinated and settled down to sleep.

There was a quarter of an hour of peace, during which Ongnonlu explained the symbolism of the crooked seat used in initiations of the major sort.

But two lambs were still on the dung-heap, and finding nothing to eat there, bleated. The fifteen others at once rallied to the charge.

Compared to this chaos Ogotemmêli's courtyard was full of peaceful charm.

The previous conversations had brought out the pre-eminence of weaving; and the European now asked Ogotemmêli to talk of its technique. He had just seen women spinning—as he had done a score of times before since he first came to Africa —and in so doing had witnessed a native craft in actual operation.

The apparatus of the craft consists of four vertical stakes planted in the earth and connected by horizontal bars, forming a prism, where a man and his tools can be comfortably accommodated. The warp, narrow and endless, comes from a sledge heaped with stones, passes over a horizontal support, and reaches the weaver at an angle. In the operative part between the horizontal support and the beam, round which the finished web is wound, the warp passes through the heddle and thence through the bars of the batten, the teeth of which are made of chips of reed. The heddle, worked by the foot, causes the threads of the warp to rise and fall alternately by means of a block attached to a cross-beam of the loom. The batten is balanced at the end of a small cord fastened at both ends. The shuttle, made of wood sharpened to a point at each end, is thrown by hand.

Spinning, which is woman's work, is done with a spindle consisting of a thin rod, one end of which is inserted in a thick lump of dried earth. With her right hand the woman twirls the spindle, and adjusts the thread over a skin which protects the work from dust. In her left hand she holds the mass of fibres from which the thread is drawn. She dries her fingers with white ash from a small calabash.

First, however, she will have ginned the raw cotton by rubbing the fibres on a flat stone with an iron roller a span long, thickened in the middle. The carding is done with a stick. She keeps the seeds, putting them to dry till the next sowing on the lintel of the second door of the house, where they symbolize her sex and the humidity essential for germination.

'A woman spinning,' said Ogotemmêli, 'is the seventh Nummo. The ginning-iron, like the smith's hammer, is a symbol of the celestial granary, and thus is associated with seeds. The carding stick is like the rod with which the smith sprinkled water on his fire to damp it down. The skin on which the woman spins is the sun, for the first leather so used was that of the bellows of the smithy, which had contained the solar fire.

'The twirling of the spindle is the movement of the copper spiral which propels the sun, and is often represented by the white lines decorating the middle of the spindle-whorl. The thread coming from the woman's hand, which is wound round the spindle, is the gossamer down which the world-system came to earth from heaven.

'The spindle itself is the arrow which, with the gossamer attached to it, pierced the vault of the sky. It is also the arrow buried in the celestial granary.

'The calabash containing the ashes for drying the fingers is the female Great Nummo. It recalls the calabash on the head of the celestial ram, an avatar of the male Great Nummo. The ash is the ram itself, and also its seed: the fluffy cotton from which the thread is drawn is its wool.

'The hank of thread which is drawn out to form the warp is the path of the seventh ancestor Nummo, and also the Nummo himself in his reptilian form. The large bobbin, which is wound off in spinning is the sun rolling in space.'

'Did the craft of weaving come down with the smithy in the world-system?'

'Yes, but symbolically. The north stairway of the granary represented the warp: the four beams coming out from the façade at the level of the upper storey were the four vertical stakes. The chest of the weaver was the door of the granary; the shuttle is the lock which moves this way and that as it opens or shuts. The block is the triangular bit of wood which holds together the two sections of the door.

'The craft of weaving, in which the craftsman works facing south, is the house of the seventh Nummo, and the structure of the loom is composed of all the eight ancestors. The four vertical stakes (male) mark the bedroom; the four horizontal bars (female) represent the flat roof.

'The craft is also the grave of Lébé in the primal field. The weaver's seat is the earth-platform on which the dead body was laid before burial. The warp thread stands for the opening and shutting of the door of the tomb, through which the Nummo goes in or out in the form of the woof-thread, which represents a reptile, whose tongue is the shuttle. The foot-rest of the right foot corresponds to the throwing of the shuttle by the right hand, suggesting the entry of the serpent: the left foot-rest and the action of throwing by the left hand suggest the exit. The lock of the door is the block, to which the heddle is attached.

'The heddle with its eighty threads is the symbol of the seventh Nummo's jaws. The carding-comb with its eighty notches marks the passing of the eighty heads of families, the issue of the eight ancestors and themselves represented by the eighty odd and eighty even threads of the warp.

'The web rolled round the beam, against which the weaver leans, symbolizes the serpent devouring the dead body: for the weaver is the symbol of Lébé devouring and risen again.

'The typical product of the craft is the cloth which serves as a pall to cover the dead. It is made of alternate black and white squares composed of the eighty odd and eighty even threads of the warp and the eighty movements to and fro of the woof. The pall is made up of eight strips sewn together, and each strip should consist of eighty squares, but they are woven from twenty components only.

'The co-operation of man and woman, in storing the seeds, sowing and growing the cotton, has the same meaning as spinning and weaving, symbols of love.

'Spinning cotton and weaving clothing is exactly the same as a man and a woman entering the house to sleep together and produce children.

'The weaver, representing a dead man, is also the male who opens and closes the womb of the woman, represented by the heddle. The stretched threads represent the act of procreation. The cotton threads of the weavers and the numerous men in the world are all one. The making of the cloth symbolizes the multiplication of mankind.

'The craft of weaving in fact,' said Ogotemméli in conclusion, 'is the tomb of resurrection, the marriage bed and the fruitful womb.'

It remained only to speak of the Word, on which (he said) the whole revelation of the art of weaving was based.

'The Word,' said the old man, 'is in the sound of the block and the shuttle. The name of the block means "creaking of the word". Everybody understands what is meant by "the word" in that connection. It is interwoven with the threads: it fills the interstices in the fabric. It belongs to the eight ancestors; the first seven possess it: the seventh is the master of it; it is itself the eighth.'

He repeated: 'The words of the seven ancestors fill the gaps and form the eighth. The Word, being water, follows the zigzag line of the woof.

The weaver, he explained, sings as he throws the shuttle, and the sound of his voice enters into the warp, adding to and taking along with it the voice of the ancestors. For the weaver is Lébé, the man of the eighth family and consequently the Word itself.

Blind Ogotemméli began to murmur in an archaic language two lines of a funeral chant, which the Onndom weavers sing when they weave palls for the dead.

*... Sloth for the shapeless neck!
Eighty minstrels and only one drum!*

The Nazarene returned to his house at the end of the day by way of the Dodyu-Oreil quarter, to the south of Lower Ogol which juts out like a promontory on the shore of the pool of Bananga. In the small square, broken on all sides by the corner of houses, there were a few looms opposite the council shelter. Nearby there was an earth mound, altar of the seventh Numme.

Denuded of weavers and of their warps, the meagre collection of stakes with their connecting bars of wood looked like rubbish thrust into a corner. The weavers, according to rule, had stopped work the moment the sun touched the horizon.

Weaving, like smithing, is daytime labour, for warp and woof symbolize a being of light and language, while the spinner's spindle turns on a skin sun, and her calabash of white ash is fertilized sun. It is only fitting, therefore, that the sun should shine on the craft. Weaving by night would produce a web of silence and shadow. A weaver who worked after sunset, when God shuts the door of the world, would become blind.

ELEVENTH DAY

The Word and the Cultivation of the Land

'It's a fowl that Amadigué, Gana and I bought together,' said Koguem.

Koguem had been helping Amadigué in his efforts to catch the creature, which had escaped. After a wild chase in the fields and among the rocks, the bird had found a refuge under an unapproachable rock containing sacred objects.

Amadigué accordingly sat down on the spot to wait till thirst drove his property out into the open. The others left him on watch, wishing him success.

On the swollen spur of Upper Ogol some sheep, sluggish after two thousand years of domestication, made shift nevertheless to leap from rock to rock, with tails waving rakishly, in flight from a very small shepherd-boy wearing a hat as wide as a buckler and carrying a stick and a gourd-bottle.

Leaving Upper Ogol on the left, they forebore to talk to some women on their right, who were crushing the fruit of the Lannea acida, because speech was thought to impair the clarity of the oil. They then came down the rocky path which led to the field of the Hogon, priest of Lébé, leaving behind them the little bare patch unturned by any hoe, which symbolizes the tomb of Lébé. To the left, climbing the sandstone slopes and entering the Guëndoumman quarter, was the slippery track by which Lébé, in the form of a great glittering serpent, passes every night to the sanctuary in the town. Further away at the edge of the field could be seen the cave in which he lives by day. They had also to pass above the heap of stones which is one of the principal altars of Lébé.

Not counting the sites of baobabs, reckoned as places with names of their own, it was necessary, in going from the camp to Ogotemmêli's house, to walk through or alongside five fields or rocks, all with names and well-defined boundaries—Tenné, Ba Diguilou, Goummo, Ogo Digou, Toummogou. In Lower Ogol it was necessary to skirt three different quarters—Amtaba, Guinna, and Tabda. The distance from start to finish, as the crow flies, was less than two hundred metres.

Each section of the ground, moreover, was divisible into places with recognized names, and in the built-up areas, especially, with their houses and public squares, it was necessary to manoeuvre in order to avoid places to which access was forbidden. Seen from the air, the tangle of dwelling areas, rocks, gaps, altars, and trees, all with names of their own, which made up the village of Upper Ogol, would seem to be inextricable.

Here the land was level plateau, but in the cliff area, rock walls no longer constituted boundaries; the very earth reared itself up, plots rising in tiers, some overhanging others, presenting insuperable difficulties to any attempt at land survey.

Fragmentation of land holdings was unrestricted, division of the soil proceeding apparently by virtue of occupation, as if the inhabitants had organized it rock by rock and mound by mound, impregnating it with their life, giving their names to it, and laying out each settlement, symbolically, after the pattern in which the earth had first been organized around the spot where the heavenly granary had come to rest.

On the plain, the cultivated land is like a chequer-board, the squares marked out by small ridges less than a hand's-breadth wide; these look more like swellings on the earth than raised barriers. In the rocky country, where the ground is broken, the divisions are irregular, and in Sanga, Lulli's fields are cited as an example of the rules for partitioning land.

But the cutting up into squares was carried to extremes in the dry-season onion gardens, where the plots, less than a yard wide, form a series of regular pans bordered by clearly defined embankments of soil. In this way rain or irrigation water is retained at the base of the plants and does not flow away.

The basic division of land is the field.

'The land,' said Ogotemmêli, 'is cultivated in squares, eight cubits a side, surrounded by embankments of earth.'

The area of each plot, he explained, is that of the flat roof of the celestial granary; and the plot is orientated so that each side faces a cardinal point of the compass.

'The old method of cultivation,' he went on, 'is like weaving; one begins on the north side, moving from east to west and then back from west to east. On each line eight feet are planted and the square has eight lines recalling the eight ancestors and the eight seeds.'

Furthermore, inside the line the cultivator advances first on one foot and then on the other, changing his hoe from one hand to the other at each step. When the right foot is in front, the right hand on the handle is nearest the iron, and vice versa when he changes step.

Cultivation being thus a form of weaving, a field is like a blanket made of eight strips, the black and white squares being represented by the alternation of the mounds made at each step and the gaps between them; a mound and its shadow represent a black square.

The whole collection of fields round a village together with the village itself may also be said to recall a large coverlet, the houses with roofs shining in the sunlight being the white squares, and the courtyards lying in shadow, the black. The streets are the seams joining the strips.

If a man clears ground and makes a new square plot and builds a dwelling on the plot, his work is like weaving a cloth.

Moreover, weaving is a form of speech, which is imparted to the fabric by the to-and-fro movement of the shuttle on the warp; and in the same way the to-and-fro movement of the peasant on his plot imparts the Word of the ancestors, that is to say, moisture, to the ground on which he works, and thus rids the earth of impurity and extends the area of cultivation round inhabited places.

But, if cultivation is a form of weaving, it is equally true to say that weaving is a form of cultivation. That part of the warp which has no woof is the uncultivated land or bush. The finished web is the symbol of the cultivated field. The four stakes of the loom are the trees and bushes which are felled by the shuttle, symbol of the axe. To pull the carding-comb towards oneself is to carry wood to chop for faggots; and to draw the thread of the woof through the warp, is to bring life, water, and purity, to the desert.

The Word, Dress and Love

'It's Menyu's son,' said tall Allaye. 'Ever since I gave him some milk he has been coming to the camp. He has a flat head like his father.'

He passed his hand over the top of his head as he spoke, to show what he meant.

From early morning the camp was surrounded by naked children waiting for the thousand and one miracles with which the life of the Nazarenes is diversified. They were also waiting till the departure to Ogotemmêli's gave them a chance to lay hands on small articles, exclaiming in triumph to the European who could not even keep his pencil safe from their depredations. A minute being was holding it aloft like an arrow pointed skywards.

The caravan filed off by the ordinary route with a few delays caused by the porters, who stopped to blow their noses with their fingers and wipe them carefully on the soles of their feet. The party spread out in the Hogon's field, then poured into the street that divided Guinna from Amtaba, and dropped their small burdens, like a flood discharging wreckage, on the rocks and hollow stones of the courtyard. Their thin bodies then disappeared in Tabda.

'The first woven garment,' began Ogotemmêli, 'was a woman's loin-cloth. It was sewn when they took the fibres away from her.'

This garment, which has four strips in token of her femininity, is worn crosswise with the seams horizontal. It covers the body from the navel to the knees, and is wound round the wearer without any fastening.

The woman's loin-cloth is open, because her sexual parts are open. Otherwise she could not be impregnated.

The second garment to be woven was a man's trousers, the coat consisting of three strips (the token-number of masculinity), passing between the legs and covering the belly and loins, with three additional strips on each side for the thighs. The body is thus wrapped in three times three strips, a total which includes the token-numbers of both femininity and masculinity.

Trousers are closed with a cord, because the man's sex organ is closed. The knot which fastens them is a symbol of love, the right-hand end of the cord being the man and the left-hand end the woman.

The third woven garment was the so-called 'sleeved' gown, made of four long strips behind and four in front and three strips each side.

The four strips at the back recall the four male ancestors, and the four in front the female ancestors. For the man looks to have the woman he desires in front of him for coition.

The three side-strips are the male number.

The fourth thing to be woven was the covering for the dead, made of eight strips of black and white squares, which are the eight families multiplied and which reproduce the lay-out of cultivated land. The covering or pall is thus a symbol of life and resurrection. In it the dead man is folded for a short time, like a foetus in the womb, so that in it he may be immersed again in the web of the living and in the germinating fields.

The fifth article of clothing was the cap made of two strips symbolizing a pair. It was invented at the time of the organization of the world, and was originally reserved for the Hogon, that is, the chief.

Originally all clothing was white, the colour of cotton. Then men began to be afraid of turning pale like the material, and dyed their garments saffron yellow, the colour of earth, in order to look like their land. Later on, they invented the blue-black colour for the pall for the dead, for the first pall, which was wrapped round the body of Lébé.

There was much discussion about the colour to be adopted in these cases, and it was some time before agreement could be reached. But they settled on blue-black as the colour nearest to coal, which itself resembles the colour of men's skins. In the past, however, men were called banu, that is, red, which is what they still call light-coloured skins. But they were also thinking of the smith's skin, blackened as it was by coal dust.

Ogotemméli attached no particular importance to these matters of colour and number. They were simple and obvious.

'Clothing,' he said, 'man's clothing, is the seventh Nummo.'

He meant by this remark that to put on a garment (soy) was to clothe oneself in the words (so) of the Nummo, seventh (soy) of the name; he meant also, and especially, that a woman by wearing ornaments (sey) assumed the disguise of the seventh Nummo.

On this point he began with the unexpected observation that women's mouths were weaving implements.

He reminded his hearers of the teaching of the seventh Nummo when sunk in the earth; how he opened to the sun, light his anthill mouth, from which were drawn the threads of the warp.

Teeth filed to a point are the sharp teeth of the Spirit through which the threads were drawn. The copper stud fixed to the centre of the lower lip is the bobbin of thread. The four studs (the feminine number again) on the sides of the nose are the stakes of the loom, and the pendants of beads from the septum are its pivotal axis.

When women—or men for that matter—file their teeth, they do it to recall the threading of the eighty odd and eighty even threads, which symbolize the multiplication of families. They are also indicating their respect for the Word embodied in these threads, for the moist Word coming from the mouth, and for the water we drink, the essence of the master of Speech. The zigzag line formed by each row of teeth also symbolizes the path of water and the Word.

'Thus all that adorns the Spirit of water belongs also to women.'

He meant that women's ornaments recalled the Nummo's appearance, and especially certain details of his green body. The circlet of green beads on the temple is the Nummo's glittering forehead: the necklace represents the wrinkles of his neck. The two red beads at the corners of the nostrils are his eyes.

The copper bracelets at the wrists and the bend of the arm have the shape and occupy the place of the circular bones which distend the skin of the Spirit in this part of his limbs, for his arms are flexible although they are furnished with long unjoined bones. These bracelets are four in number, the feminine number.

The row of beads or the copper ring on the right ankle recalls the circular bone at the end of the Spirit's tail; strictly speaking no ornament should be worn on the left ankle.

Copper rings are worn on the first finger, ring finger, and little finger, because these are the only fingers in a webbed hand which show circular swellings in the place of joints, and the rings imitate these swellings. But no rings are worn on the thumb or the third finger because in the Spirit they are smooth and supple so that rings would not stay on them. No rings should be worn on the toes, because the Spirit has no feet.

Ogotemméli passed on to the ear, one of the most important apertures (said he) of the body.

The ear is bi-sexual in both man and woman. The external ear protects the auditory channel, which represents the female sex organ. The red triangular pendants are the testicles. The eight copper studs in the form of a large crescent worn on the edge of the helix are the eight ancestors.

The part played by the ear in the act of generation was to form the subject of another conversation.

The scarifications practised by women reproduce those of the Nummo. They consist usually of two lines of incisions—one vertical stretching from the level of the breasts to the navel, while the other is horizontal, lying across the belly from one side to the other. The lines are in two rows of short slanting incisions forming a series of Vs without points.

Four parallel incisions (feminine number) are made on the temples.

Each of these incisions is a representation of the organ of sex, cut with a razor symbolizing the male organ. They are always moist because they are open at the name of the Spirit of Water. It is thus that the women's fertility is multiplied.

'What of the hair? Has that a meaning?'

'Women's hair,' replied Ogotemméli, 'is the Nummo's hair.'

The comb which makes the parting is like the carding-comb which separates the threads of the warp. When the hair is dressed in the Kou tari style there ought really to be six partings in the middle and ten each side, making eighty in all to recall the eight families; but this is not possible. Moreover the rules about dress are not strict, and very few women wear all these ornaments.'

On the social aspects of clothing Ogotemmêli had much to say.

'The loin-cloth is tight,' he said, 'to conceal the woman's sex, but it stimulates a desire to see what is underneath. This is because of the Word, which the Nummo put into the fabric. That word is every woman's secret, and is what attracts the man. A woman must have secret parts to inspire desire. If she went about in the market with nothing on, no one would run after her even if she were very beautiful. Undressed and unadorned she is not desirable; but dress and ornament make men desire her, even if she is not beautiful. From a very beautiful woman without adornment men turn away.'

He reflected a few moments before adding:

'To be naked is to be speechless.'

On the way back to camp Koguem commented on what had been said about dress.

'Clothes,' he said, 'give satisfaction, not only to the wearer but also to the spectator. It is true that women attract by their dress; but they too are attracted by a well-dressed man.'

He described how the desire for clothes was causing a number of young people to leave the country. Every year, he said, the Government deplores, here in the cliffs just as elsewhere, the mass emigration of workers in the prime of life, who go to the Gold Coast to earn money and often live there for years and sometimes die there.

These young people, he said, who go off to the Gold Coast or Bamako or elsewhere, go mainly for clothes. They make money there and spend it all, the day before they come back, on gewgaws, turbans or umbrellas, and peacock about in them on market days or at funerals. Dress helps them to get married. The more clothes a man has, the more elegant he is, and the more the women go after him.

Koguem too preferred an ordinary woman decked with ornaments—mere clothing hardly counted with him—to a pretty woman without beads or bracelets.

'Ogotemmêli is right,' he said. 'Adornment excites love. It fulfils its purpose of attracting the male, as the Nummo meant it to do. And, if there is a connection between ornaments and love, that is because the first ornaments of all, those of the female Nummo, were in the centre-jar of the celestial granary, on which the smith came down; and that jar is the symbol of the world's womb.'

The Smithy

IN the rock-mass, which on the south forms the central square of Upper Ogol, in a small corner of land the smithy is hidden away. It stands on a roughly circular site with low walls of dry stones unmortared and full of openings. Resting on these and supported in the middle by a stake, is a thin layer of branches through which splashes of sunlight fall on the shadows within.

The tools and implements are scattered on the dusty ground without any apparent order. Though the smith has only just left, the smithy looks as if it has been deserted for years. The double bellows, its skins limp, points its two ducts at the dead fire. The anvil like an enormous iron thorn stands on the ground fixed in a beam, which is buried in the earth. Over against it are tongs and some shapeless pieces of iron. The hammer, symbol of the webbed hand of the Spirit of Water, is not to be seen: either it is hidden or the smith has taken it away. Against the wall there is an oven, made of puddled clay, with an opening at the bottom leading to a bowl-shaped outlet above. Close by is a hollow stone from which the water has evaporated.

In the silence and the sunlight all the poverty of the smithy is laid bare. That technique which revolutionized the world, which came down from heaven, and with its tools broke the limbs of the first smith who blew up the fire—a 'fragment of the sun'—still exists even in this decay.

The European had made a point of going to see the smithy before questioning Ogotemméli about it. Having first studied weaving, a craft held in the highest estimation, bearer of the gift of speech, he wanted to learn from the old man the significance of this most primitive of tools.

'The smithy,' said the blind man, 'is like a dwelling-house, or again like a person, whose head is the oven and his two arms the bellows with its two ducts.'

In the primal field, in which the flying granary landed, the smithy was erected on the north side at the edge of the land which was to be cleared. That is why today smithies are always erected on the north side of the central square, which itself is always to the north of the village.

'You can see,' said Ogotemméli, turning his head to one side, 'you can see over the wall.'

The central square of Lower Ogol was indeed there behind the ruined granary of the backyard on the left. The high central rock, the square millstone of the council house, the cube-shaped stone known as the 'Stone of the Brave' and, on the left, facing full north, a smithy sister to that of Upper Ogol, were all clearly to be seen.

But here all was according to rule, whereas in the other village the plan of the building was completely different.

'At first,' said Ogotemméli, 'the smith did not have all the tools that he has today. He had no hafted hammer, no file and no tongs. The red-hot iron was held in the bare hand; and that is something one can still see today, when the smiths come together for funerals. As they chant the dirges for the dead, they pick up red-hot iron in their hands in memory of the practice of the first smiths.'

The chief tool, he went on to say, is the hammer. The celestial granary was a hammer; and everybody believes that it was in this hammer that the seeds came down from heaven. The hammer is the webbed hand of the Water Spirit. The arm is the cone-shaped handle, and the hand itself is the four-sided face of the tool with which it strikes.

The hammer is also the whole body of the Water Spirit, the male Great Nummo in heaven. Two of the opposite sides are his arms, and the other two his back and chest. The cone-shaped handle is the serpent's tail in which the lower part of his body ends.

The anvil is something like the implement reapers use; it is the female form of the hammer, and represents the female Great Nummo. The slab at the top is very narrow but rectangular, and it ends in a blunt point. There is often a small hole at this lower end, reminiscent of the part played by the hammer, that is, by the granary, in the organization of the world, when its interior, symbolized by this hole, was full of organs and seeds.

The beam in which the anvil is embedded is made of a medium-sized tree-trunk about a cubit in length, roughly squared. It is sunk in the earth in a line north-south, as all men's beds should lie.

The wood of the anvil is the bed of the two great Water Spirits. When the hammer strikes the iron, the two come together.

The two earthenware pots of the bellows are modelled in clay, with which wool from a white sheep is mixed. This addition gives greater cohesion to the material, which is not baked but dried slowly in the air. The sheep's wool is a symbol of the celestial Ram, avatar of the Nummo.

The two spherical pots symbolize the sun; being of the same shape, while the wool in their clay comes from the fleece of the Spirit, which is of copper, the sun's excrement. They are also associated with that luminary by the skins which cover them and by means of which air is conveyed to the fire. The other, which the smith in flight brandished over his head, had already acquired a fiery quality from contact with its fellow-skin, and was able to sustain unscathed the discharge of the thunderbolts.

The ducts of dry earth which connect the pots with the fire-grate afford a passage for the air expelled by the skins; and this air is a breath of the sun, and so animates the fire.

From the hollow stone the smith draws water with a stick, with which to damp down the fire. The Nummo is in this puddle as in all water, and he moved in it by swimming, his movements following the rhythm of the blows on the anvil and the alternating puffs of the bellows.

The European had known for years the magical function of the sounds of a smithy. He had been present many times at rituals in the course of which at a certain point a smith would strike the rock with his hammer or with the iron part of his anvil. By producing sound from the iron, in which the mythical first smith had brought so many benefits to mankind, he was reminding his fellow-men of the supreme power of Amma and the Water Spirit. He was assisting their prayers and strengthening them by the sounds he made; he was appeasing the possible wrath of the celestial Beings by this acknowledgement of their pre-eminence. When men quarrelled with one another, he would intervene between the parties, hammer in hand, and strike the rocks, thus bringing a divine note into the human disorder and calming the passions aroused.

To questions on these points Ogotemmêli made no reply, but continued to develop his exposition.

'The smith,' he said, 'in striking the anvil is asking the earth to restore to him the strength of which he had formerly emptied himself.'

For, when the smith of the celestial granary came down to the defiled earth, he put into it a great portion of his own pure strength, depriving himself in order to give the soil a life-force favourable to the great work he was about to do.

As a result he and his descendants became endowed with a special quality, which made them different from men, whether 'impure' (puru) or 'living' (omo) or 'white' (pili).

The 'impure' are the descendants of the first initiates of the Great Mask, the upholders of the spiritual principles of the first dead man; the 'living' are the other Dogon; the 'whites' are people like shoemakers, minstrels and men of the various peoples dwelling in the plains.

The characteristic feature of the smiths is a diminished life-force, which removes them from the category of the 'living'. But this diminishment is not like the effect of death, which separates them also from the 'impure'. Nor are they comparable to the 'whites', for these are insensitive to certain sources of impurity. Though they have, like other people, individual altars for both head and body (kutogolo, djabyé), they have to be constantly engaged on some other means of self-support; and this is provided for them by the exercise of their craft.

'By striking the anvil,' said Ogotemmêli, 'they get back from the earth some of the life-force they gave it. Their blows recover it.'

But blows on the iron must be dealt by day. The smith's work is day labour, no doubt because the smithy fire, being a fragment of the sun, could not shine at night. That is why it is forbidden, not only for smiths but for everybody, to strike blows on iron or stone or earth in the night-time. No blow of hammer or tap of pestle should be heard, whether loud or soft, in the silent hours. To strike blows at night would destroy the effect of the blows struck by day. It would mean the rejection of all that had been gained, so that the smith would lose what ever he had recovered during the day of the life-force of which he formerly divested himself.

The fines inflicted on those who strike blows by night are used to provide victims for the foundation altar of the village, which in former times was erected above a man buried standing, who had offered his strength and his body for the stability of the human settlement on the new earth.

Thus was restored the broken order of that relationship between the earth and the one who emptied himself to purify it and to enable men to pursue their life-giving labours.

In the primal field the smith had assigned to his own family one of the eight sectors marked out around the point of impact of the granary. But what he was concerned to do was merely to establish his right to the produce from it, for he was not at any time to cultivate it himself.

His part is to forge the implements of cultivation, but never to use them with his own hand; the hoes that he makes are for the men of the seven other families, and it is for them in return to supply him with food. So we see how, every year at harvest-time, the smith leaves his forge and goes about the country to collect the grain from the plots which the implements of his forging have worked. He knows all the fields which owe him tribute: there is nothing he does not know about their growth and their maturity.

So it is that, when the sweating peasant opens up to the sunlight the soil which lay in the shade of the growing corn, and reaps the last ear, he sees seated at the edge of the field, watching him open-mouthed and in silence, the smith.

Pottery

Pottery was born in the smithy. The smith's wife was drying in the sun a pot which she had modelled like one of the spheres of the bellows; but, finding it did not harden quickly enough, she put it near the fire. She then discovered that the clay was baking and becoming hard, and so she got into the habit of putting the pots she modelled by the fire.

She worked on a small square mat woven with eighty strings on a warp of the same number. First she made a rough model shaped like a section of an inverted cone, into which she threw with considerable force a round pebble, which made a bed for itself in the clay, and this became larger and larger until finally it took the shape of a sphere. When the inside surface of the clay was pressed it took the pattern of the mat.

Women today copy the processes of the mythical potteress; but the craft is no longer the prerogative of the wives of smiths. Any woman can be a potter, if she wishes.

'The mat,' said Ogotemméli, 'on which the woman works, is a symbol of that of the first human couple. The craft of pottery is like a person on a mat. In moulding the clay the woman is imitating the work of God, when he modelled the earth and the first couple. She is creating a being, and the round pot is like a head resting on the mat, a head or a womb. A pot without ornament symbolizes a man, a pot with two small breasts a woman.'

Ogotemméli had before him one of the pots used for brewing millet-beer. He passed his hand over its belly as he spoke to feel the pattern imprinted on it.

'The mat on which the potter works has eighty threads one way and eighty threads the other. It is woven like one square of the pall that covers the dead, but with fibres of baobab instead of cotton.'

Baobab fibres are much used among the Dogon for cords and plaited objects of all kinds. One sees rings a couple of cubits deep round the trunks of trees from which the bark has been torn.

'This fibre-plaiting is men's work and resembles weaving. The best work is done in Banani. Patterns made on pots in this way make one think one has one's mat with one for repose wherever one goes.'

'And what,' said the European, 'of the pebble with which the clay is struck?'

'The stone,' was the reply, 'which the woman rolls in the clay is the symbol of the food which will be cooked in the pot.'

'How was meat cooked before there were clay pots?'

'Before pottery was invented,' said Ogotemméli, 'men ate their meat raw.' In an earlier conversation he had compared the moon to a pot heated a quarter at a time. This symbol has another application.

'Before the clay has been baked,' he went on to explain, 'the open end of the pot recalls the circumference of the moon. After the baking it represents the circumference of the sun. That is intelligible enough,' he added, 'for one must suppose the moon is less completely cooked than the sun.'

So a humble pot is an epitome of the universe, with its own mat on its surface.

FOURTEENTH DAY

The Large Family House

OGOTEMMÊLI's house was not a typical specimen. Its external appearance was poverty-stricken, with dusty niches filled by altars commemorating dead children. No odours of stored grain emanated from its wretched cellars. There were only holes where swallows nested, opening towards the west in expectation of future flights.

Amadigué's house, on the other hand, was chequered with flat surfaces and recesses, a combination of doors, holes, and the traditional cone-shaped decorations.

The front elevation was twelve cubits wide and eight cubits high; it was pierced by ten vertical rows of eight square niches, their sides measuring a handsbreadth; these niches extended from ground level to a horizontal line of swallows' holes which lay under the shelter of a roof of small wooden billets no larger than a cubit in size. The whole façade was finished off by a series of slender columns like sugar loaves, each one topped by a flat stone intended to catch the rain; but the water had worn them away so that some of them had come to look like hour-glasses.

In the centre, two doors, one above the other with two niches between them, divided the chequer-board into two parts; the door on the ground floor, a little wider than a man's chest and less than a man's height, was made of two bare planks; the one in the upper storey, which was the same width but considerably lower, was decorated with several rows of sculptured figures in relief and was fastened by a conspicuous lock surmounted by two geometrical figures.

The plan of the building was a square with sides measuring eight cubits (the same dimensions as the agricultural plots) flanked by four rectangles of equal length. It might also be compared to a Greek cross with very thick, short transverse arms. But in Amadigué's house the front was wider, and in each of the angles formed by its extremities was a recess.

The square constituted the principal room, used by the married couple for sleeping and by the woman for work. Four posts in a square on the diagonals supported the ceiling. To the left a platform of earth was placed in the corner against the wall. In the room, above the door, cotton-seeds in their white fibres were heaped on the lintel.

The rectangle at the front of the house formed the vestibule, the entrance to it facing the door of the room. The rectangle at the back served as a kitchen, and the two side rectangles were store-rooms.

These four rooms, consisting in fact of narrow passages, opened on to the central room by doors in the middle of the walls, which in the case of the store-rooms were mere bays. The sole entrance in the centre of the front wall was in a line with the openings into the principal room and kitchen.

The hearth was composed of two large stones placed two handsbreadths from the back wall and two handsbreadths from one another. A round pot rested on them and against the wall.

The plan of the upper storey was the same, except for the kitchen, the ceiling of which was higher than the roof of the building, which it overlooked by means of an opening that also served as an outlet for the smoke. Like most of the houses in Upper Ogol, Amadigué's house faced west so as to avoid the rains brought by the prevailing winds. It formed one side of a narrow lane, the other side of which was a series of granaries with carefully closed doors. But in front of the central door there was an opening leading to the dung-heap of a rich man. At the top of the façade, attached to beams projecting beyond the mud wall, hung bronze-red bunches of the millet known as 'eyes staring out of their head' because of its big round seeds.

It seemed to the European that he was coming into an ordered accumulation of riches, overflowing roofs, floors, niches and cellars alike.

Indeed, all kinds of produce, in measured quantities, were drying on the roofs—red pepper, purple-fruited sorrel, yellow millet, which makes a clear sound in falling and is called 'tinkling gold'.

'The front wall with its eight rows of ten niches,' said

Ogotemméli, 'represents the eight ancestors and their descendants, numerous as the fingers on their hands.'

In the vertical direction the two series of five columns, he explained, are the ten fingers, and when one looks at the front elevation of a house one sees two hands spread out.

The niches are the homes of the ancestors, who occupy them in order of birth beginning with the highest row. The niches should never be closed, for the ancestors need to breathe the outdoor air. On the carved door of the upper storey there are, or should be, eight rows of eighty figures, picturing the men and women of the whole world descended from the original ancestors.

The lock is the altar of the ancestors, and the two figures above it are the custodian and his wife. The pair of taller figures that are sometimes carved above the panel, represent the original human couple.

The circular holes in the pediment, ten in number like the fingers of the hand, are occupied by swallows' nests, the poultry yard of the ancestors. They are called 'swallows' holes'—and so euphemistically are all the niches in the front wall—out of respect for the old people, of whom one must not speak lightly.

The eight small columns on the top of the wall are the altars of the ancestors, beginning with the first ancestors on the left. In a narrow house with only two or three vertical rows of niches the columns are fewer. In a wider house there may be ten or more, but the traditional number is eight, one for each ancestor.

FIG. 7. A house

The whole façade, with its eight rows of ten dark holes separated by lighter plane surfaces, is a symbol of the pall used to cover the dead, made in eight strips of black and white squares, which itself is a representation of cleared and marked out land.

This façade gives its name to the tallest mask, the top of which is ten cubits above the wearer's head. The pole of this mask is divided into ten sections each consisting of a perforated rectangular grating with four or five bars; between each of these is a flat plane. The pole itself is a symbol of the warp in weaving, and is lowered towards the east and the west in imitation of the daily course of the sun.

The European recalled the hortatory chants intoned in the 'storeyed house' ceremony:

*'They say the houses of Molu in Tomboké are fine,
That the houses of Molu are fine.
In Molu the houses have storeys.
But it is the men who are fine,
Not the storeyed houses!'*

'The soil of the ground-floor,' said Ogotemmêli, 'is the symbol of the earth and of Lébé, restored to life in the earth.'

The flat roof, square like that of the flying granary, represents heaven, and the ceiling which separates the upper storey from the ground-floor represents the space lying between heaven and earth. The four small rectangular roofs around it indicate the four cardinal points, as does the hearth itself.

The hearth derives its living flame from the celestial fire that came from the fire purloined by the smith. When the house is correctly sited, that is to say, is open to the north, the pot on the fire indicates the same point, the stones indicating east and west, while the wall, the third support for the pot, marks the south.

Inside the house, the several rooms represent caves of this world inhabited by men. The vestibule, which belongs to the master of the house, represents the male partner of the couple, the outside door being his sexual organ. The big central room is the domain and the symbol of the woman; the store-rooms each side are her arms, and the communicating door her sexual parts. The central room and the store-rooms together represent the woman lying on her back with outstretched arms, the door open and the woman ready for intercourse.

The room at the back which contains the hearth and looks out on to the flat roof, shows the breathing of the woman, who lies in the central room under the ceiling which is the symbol of a man, its beams representing his skeleton; their breath finds its outlet through the opening above. The four upright poles (feminine number) are the couple's arms, those of the woman supporting the man who rests his own on the ground. When a child is to be born, the woman in labour is seated on a stool in the middle of the room, her back to the north, and is supported by women. The infant is delivered on the ground and takes possession of its soul in the place where it was conceived.

The earthen platform that serves as a bed, lies north and south and the couple sleep on it with their heads to the north, like the house itself, the front wall of which is its face. The man lies on his right side facing west, and the woman on her left side facing east, which are the positions they will occupy in the grave.

Under the bed are put all the seeds for sowing except cotton seeds, which are placed on the lintel of the second door, symbol of the female sex.

In sexual intercourse the man is sowing; he is like a Water Spirit causing fertilizing rain to fall on the earth and on the woman, on the sown seeds. Thus agricultural and conjugal acts are linked.

When the pair lie with a covering over them, as in death, the bed is also a grave; it is the grave of Lébé, into which the seventh Nummo enters, and from which he emerges, by means of the two openings set between the doors of the façade.

Just as Lébé returned to life within the earth by the efforts of the Spirit, so the seeds are made to germinate, and children are procreated, by the action of the couple lying under the funeral pall, symbol of numerous lineages and cultivated lands.

But a house of this sort is only one feature of the village, which consists of a tangle of dwellings surrounded by granaries and outbuildings. Streets run through it in every direction, splitting it into blocks. Each village is divided into quarters, and in each quarter there is an extended family possessing a large house of its own. Each quarter has its council shelter built on a small open square; but the village has a more important shelter, belonging to one of the quarters but built on a larger square where important ceremonies take place.

'The village,' said Ogotemméli, 'should extend from north to south like the body of a man lying on his back. Lower Ogol is almost correct. The head is the council house, built on the chief square, which is the symbol of the primal field.'

It appeared also, from the blind man's earlier explanations, that the village should be in the form of a square with one side facing north and the streets running from north to south and east to west. But this is not possible except in the plain; on the contorted plateau and in the scree of the cliffs the village has to be adapted to the irregular terrain.

On the north side of the square is the smithy, as was that of the bringer of civilization. To the east and west are houses for menstruating women; they are round like wombs and represent the hands of the village. The large family houses are its chest and belly; the communal altars at the south of the village are its feet.

The stones on which the fruit of the Lannea acida is crushed, placed in the centre of the village, represent its female sexual parts. Beside them should be set the foundation altar, which is its male sex organ; but out of respect for the women this altar is erected outside the walls.

Within the village each quarter is a complete whole, and should be laid out in the same way as the village, like a separate entity. Seen from the air, the village is like the ancestor's house with its eighty niches, or like the great pall for the dead with its black and white squares. The buildings are the filled in areas of the façade of the house, while the courtyards and approaches are holes. The flat roofs shining in the sunlight and the shadows thrown on the ground reproduce the black and white colours of the pall. The streets running from north to south are the seams joining the strips together.

The men's shelter, which is to be found in each public square and particularly in the central square of the village, is a very different building from the dwelling-houses. In Sanga it consists of a square stack composed of several layers of trussed millet-stalks, the whole resting on a rough framework of tree-trunks balanced on three parallel rows of dry-stone or wooden pillars. The men meet in the shelter during the heat of the day to rest and chat. The elders in particular confer there and take decisions on matters of public interest. In the past, when a village was founded, the shelter and the women's houses were the first buildings to be erected.

It was under some such shelter as this that the eight ancestors used to take counsel in the days when they had human form before their transformation into Water Spirits.

Today shelters may be circular, with a millstone shaped like a section of an inverted cone on top; but otherwise they are, or should be, orientated according to the cardinal points. They have, or should have, three rows of pillars lying north to south, the two side-rows having three supports and the middle-row two supports, arranged in the form of a quincunx. These stumpy pillars, made of firmly balanced stones, sometimes covered with a coating of whitish grey mud, stand like the trunks of the eight ancestors when seated in council with their heads in the rafters of the roof.

To an observer sitting inside the building and facing north these columns appear in numerical order, the first in the north-west corner, the second in the west, the third in the south-west, the fourth in the south-east, and so on round the points of the compass. The seventh is in the middle to the north, and the eighth behind it.

Thus the ground plan of the series of eight pillars resembles a serpent coiled along a broken line and surrounding the symbols of the seventh ancestor, the master of Speech, and the eighth ancestor, who is the Word itself.

FIFTEENTH DAY

The Sanctuary

IN earlier conversations Ogotemmêli had let it be understood that the dwelling-house had not been the first building to be constructed. The very first was a Binu sanctuary erected in the Dâlê region by the priest of the ancestor Dewa-out-of-the-Stick. To be exact, it was near the Guibêlé marsh in Kunnu that this took place; and the shape of this sanctuary was later taken as a model for dwelling-houses.

'But,' Ogotemmêli had added, 'a sanctuary is a tomb, whereas a house is a place to live in.'

A Binu sanctuary is erected in honour of an ancestor, Binu, whose name is a contraction of two terms, one of which means 'gone' and the other 'come back'. This ancestor was apparently dead, that is to say, gone to another world, then returned to the world of men, to his own people to protect them and to help and succour them.

The conversations with Ogotemmêli presupposed a knowledge of this important institution, which may in some degree be called totemic in default of a better term. A subsequent conversation was to confirm the European's reservations on the subject of Dogon 'totemism', but he felt that the term was useful and less open to objection if properly defined.

He felt also that the ideas and images revolving in the mind of his remarkable informant were all that mattered, and that neither his own ideas nor the speculations of Western students were of any interest.

The symbolism of a Binu sanctuary was to be the programme for the fifteenth day, and it was with keen interest that the European made his way to the dung-heap which was the scene of the old man's revelations.

He recalled the hundreds of sanctuaries which he had studied in the course of his travels over the plateau and cliffs. In particular he remembered the two great towers in the form of shells, which framed the façade of the temple of the Nummo of Nandouli, situated under the baobabs at the head of a dry valley in harsh surroundings suggesting the creation of the world. He had had to discard every stitch of clothing and enter naked a third tower, the shape of the white crown of the Pharaohs, where, among other extraordinary objects, he found smith's tools decorated with cattle-bells, iron sandals and an iron crown resembling that of the Lombards. There, before the altar-throne of the Water god he was at the heart of the problem.

In the south of the plateau, at Dyombolo, he had seen the square house with rounded corners of the Binu Arsana, and was dazzled by the red, black and white colours of its paintings that represented masks, a sun, and a base of alternating triangles forming a zigzag pattern. A huge serpent, in relief, with a speckled body, entered the building by a hole in the wall and came out somewhere else.

At Banani and Yugo Pilu, villages of the scree, at the foot of the towering rock-walls, he had seen temples that were no more than façades laid over a hollow in the rock or an open shed. They were approached by means of ledges from which the scree could be seen descending to the plain, with thinly scattered trees as in an orchard.

FIG. 9. Totemic shrine and its paintings

In Yugo Dogoru all the altars were grouped together in a narrow gorge which became even narrower as it entered the heart of the mountain-mass. They seemed to be thrust like stoppers into chinks in the horizontal galleries open throughout on to empty space. The rock ledges were so narrow that the altars were reduced to the thickness of stage sets, bearing on their façades a few drawings of chevrons.

At Bababi the priest offered sacrifice in the sight of all the people; but at Yugo Dogoru he disappeared into the bowels of the rock.

But, whether it is an actual building exposed to the sunlight or a recess at the end of a gorge, the sanctuary always contains a simple chamber either square (often rounded at the corners) or circular. The sanctuary of the Sodamma quarter of Upper Ogol, a village which is full of altars, measures four cubits by five. Its front is pierced by a door surmounted by two holes and crowned with four excrescences like rounded sugar-loaves. This building stands in a small courtyard, and like all those similarly placed, is very small.

The temple of Binu Sangabilu in the Do quarter, on the other hand, is built on a fairly large open space away from the dwelling-houses. It is a cube measuring some six cubits a side, its front wall flanked by towers at the corners, slightly conical in shape and topped with two mounds, between which there is an iron hook. The door, measuring one by two cubits, is surmounted by two square niches placed on the same level. To the right of the door is a platform of earth which serves as a seat for the priest during ceremonies. To the left are placed some hollow stones, in former times used for grinding, and now containing stone axes or round pebbles.

The roof is a flat one, from which the rain is led off by a wooden gutter, while the two corner towers are topped by flat projecting stones which protect the roof-ridges from rain. Inside the sanctuary are the cult objects—a hollow stone full of water or thunder stones, earthenware vessels of various kinds, iron or wooden implements and altars made of earth.

'A sanctuary,' said Ogotemmêli, 'should face north. But, as with the big house, it is the rain which decides the orientation.'

The two flanking towers and the central cones are the large and small altars of this world. Those in the centre receive libations of millet-gruel and the blood of sacrificial victims. At the time of sacrifice the white gruel and the red blood trickle down the front of the building and drip in long lines to the ground.

'Where you see the iron hook between the mounds,' said Ogotemmêli, 'is the place where the ancestor smith began to work at his smithy in the primal field.'

'But the hook? What is that?'

'The hook is the anvil. It is buried in a cross-beam.'

'A cross-beam of the roof?'

'No! There is a short piece of wood on the pediment, not to be confused with the roof timbers. It is the symbol of the beam in which the anvil is fixed.'

The roof of the sanctuary, it appeared, is the symbol of the primal field, and the interior of the building beneath is the tomb of Lébé.

The platform outside is the place where the dead body rested before it was buried. The door is the hole by which the men entered when they wanted to exhume the bones in order to take them into new countries. The two niches above the door are where the seventh ancestor came and went when he cast his human skin and took the form of a serpent: he entered by the aperture on the right when he came to swallow the dead man and regenerate him, and he came out by the one on the left.

Within the sanctuary, the hollow stone full of water, pebbles, and cowries contains the seventh ancestor's vomit, the waters of torrents and marshes, the dead man's bones changed into covenant-stones, and his nails changed into cowries. The sanctuary is the chamber of the swallowing, where the seventh ancestor consumed the human nature of Lébé and cast out the outline of the organization of the world.

But the sanctuary is also a smithy. The hook on the pediment is the anvil, and the hollow stone outside the building recalls the one from which the smith pours water to cool his red-hot iron. The two hemispherical altars in the sanctuary, the priest's personal altars, dedicated the one to his head and the other to his body, are the pots of the bellows. They are placed close by a red ochre mark which represents the fire which the bellows quicken. The hammer is represented by a conical altar.

But the most important of all these objects is the iron hook fixed in the pediment which is the anvil of the smithy. The hook is most often a double one, each of its branches ending in a tight curl. This is the horned forehead of the celestial ram, whose curved horns hold the rain-clouds. The two curled ends are also thought of as two hands which will retain moisture and secure abundance.

Instead of a hook, however, there is sometimes a square or cylindrical iron shaft, as thick as a thumb and a handsbreadth in height, narrowing from its middle point into a cone, ending in a blunt point. Halfway up the shaft two small flat pieces of iron extend like arms on either side; these are slightly curved upwards and widen out at their ends into a sort of flattened hand, edged like the teeth of a saw to represent fingers.

This object, which is also called a 'hook', has a slight resemblance, because of its vertical shaft, both to the anvil and to the hammer of the smith, while because of its branches, which are arms, it is a symbol of the Water Spirit, already represented by that same hammer and anvil. These two arms raised slightly have the same function as the curled hands of the hook: their curved shape retains the rain and with it the crops necessary to men.

Because of the beneficent properties of these iron hooks and in memory of the eight ancestors, eight ears of corn gathered at the harvesting of the field belonging to the sanctuary are hung up at the top of the façade. For the same reason, when sowing is to begin, the ears which are to provide the seed are spread out on the roof. There they absorb the moisture and the forces of renewal are inherent in the curled horns and the outstretched arms.

It is from this roof, that is to say, from the primal field, whose depths once witnessed a death and a resurrection, that the ears, heavy with life, are flung to the people mingled with the seed corn.

Paintings on the Façade of the Sanctuary

THIS iron Christ fixed in an anvil beam on the pediment of a tomb had robbed the Nazarene of his sleep. To tell the truth, the slumbers of the whole community were apt to be short. The revelations of the Bambara transplanted to Sanga, linguistic study, and exacting researches into the main cycles of Dogon activity, left little time for repose or peace of mind.

On his return from the last conversation the European had sprung the news on his companions.

'Now I understand the spear of Orosongo,' he said. 'You know that very long iron spear we photographed nearly ten years ago. Well, it must be a variant of the hooks, it is of the same spirit.'

He was alluding to an object which had for years excited his curiosity and which he had seen in a temple on the Wazuba plateau. Fixed on the point of the weapon was a human figure, half the size of a hand, in forged iron, with its arms outstretched as on a cross.

He was still curious about the curving arms of this anvil-Christ.

'No doubt,' he said, 'Ogotemmêli sees in this a system of hooking together. The arms are to hold water and seeds and abundance. The anvil in fact, if I may say so, has its arms full.'

But he thought of the seventh ancestor's last revelation, of the string-game between his webbed hands for the demonstration, which was a kind of weaving, of the armpit drum. This iron planted on a tomb was, as it were, a reminder of the third Word, a musical word.

But Ogotemmêli would never utter a word about this.

In the course of the sixteenth conversation the Nazarene asked why the different objects in the sanctuary (which was also a tomb and a smithy) were so scattered that it was impossible to understand their meaning.

'The objects are scattered,' replied Ogotemmêli, 'in order to conceal their symbolism from those who would like to understand them.'

In short for the uninitiated, the interior and the whole structure of the building and its accessories constituted a riddle without an answer.

But there was another riddle for the onlookers; at the time of sowing, the façade of a sanctuary is transformed into a picture of white, and sometimes also red and black, figures. With millet-gruel, ochre and coal the titled sacrificing priests decorate the walls for the new agricultural cycle.

Owing to the ignorance or inadequate instruction of these people, and for other reasons as well, fancy appears to reign unchecked in the choice of the subjects, objects and figures represented. But the rule governing the arrangement was known to Ogotemmêli.

Viewed from the front, the façade of the temple is divided into three parts—the right, reserved for female beings and cult objects, the left, reserved for males, and the space above the door.

The principal figure on the right is a ram, shown in profile, urinating, looking to the left and, above him, a series of spots representing stars.

'But the right is reserved for females!'

Ogotemmêli raised his head.

'Between his two horns,' he said, 'the ram wears a calabash, which is a symbol of woman and of the sun, who is female. That is how the ram comes to be on the right.'

He had already made frequent mention of this animal, well known to the peoples of the French Sudan as an avatar of the Water Spirit. Everyone mistrusts the rams which prowls around the marshes, especially if they are wearing a glistening calabash, to which the oil of Lannea acida lends red reflections. The calabash, it is true, acts as protection against the rays of the sun; but the ram uses it mainly as a bait to attract men.

Someone sees a calabash between the horns of a ram; what an astonishing sight! But it is beautiful, he thinks, shining like the sun. He wonders why such a pretty thing, so red and shiny, should appear on the head of a ram; perhaps the ram should be caught before he breaks it. (A Dogon's attention is always attracted by material objects.) So, quick as thought, he rushes at it, but the calabash has vanished like a dream from the ram's horns and is floating on the water, drawing its rash pursuer into the power of the spirits who drink his blood from his nostrils.

But these are earthly manifestations. There are a hundred well-established local legends of enterprising rams who prowl around ponds and pools in the wet season, seeking to attract girls and luring their unhappy victims into the water, among the water-lilies.

'Who is this ram?' said the stranger.

'It is the Great Nummo of heaven, the Nummo Pair.'

'A pair?'

'The ram is the male and the calabash the female. It is a ram of gold. Before every storm in the rainy season he may be seen moving in the vault of heaven.'

The European grumbled at this new complication. A ram of gold? That was the first mention so far of gold.

'Gold,' said Ogotemméli, 'is a younger brother of copper.'

Was gold then a by-product, a metal of secondary rank?

'The fleece,' continued the old man, 'is really copper; and copper is the cluster of rays coming from the rain-clouds when the sun is hidden. Copper is excreted by the Water Spirits in the damp atmosphere of heaven.'

He dilated on the notable part played by the sun in sucking up the clouds, and on the transformation into copper of the luminous rays excreted by the Nummo.

'The Ram Nummo,' he said, 'rolls in his own excrement.'

'When he appears in heaven,' he added, 'he wears a calabash between his horns. It is like a soldier's cap, and glistens with Lannea acida oil.'

The ram is also a symbol of the world-system; the calabash is the sun, his body is the earth, his forehead is the moon, his eyes are the stars in the sky. The copper fleece is also a fleece of water, for copper consists of wet rays. It is also a fleece of leaves, for water and vegetation are of the same essence.

His nose and mouth represent the breathing of all living creatures in the world, for his hindfeet are those of the large animals, his forefeet the small ones, and his tail the reptiles.

But the calabash is also the female Nummo, the essential Woman, whose breasts on the body of the beast are the two excrescences of the throat.

The ram puts the calabash (woman) on his head to hold her between his horns, which are testicles, and to have intercourse with her by means of the organ on his forehead. The Nummo, having taken the form of the ram, urinates from his lower member showers and mists, and with his frontal member he fertilizes the feminine element of the sun, and the woman and the sown seeds.

In all this Ogotemméli saw the fundamental truth of the universal life process.

'The sun's rays,' he went on, 'are fire and the Nummo's excrement. It is the rays which give the sun its strength. It is the Nummo who gives life to this star, for the sun is in some sort a star.'

It was difficult to get him to explain what he meant by this obscure statement. The Nazarene made more than one fruitless effort to understand this part of the cosmogony; he could not discover any chink or crack through which to apprehend its meaning.

He was moreover confronted with identifications which no European, that is, no average rational European, could admit. He felt himself humiliated, though not disagreeably so, at finding that his informant regarded fire and water as complementary, and not as opposites.

The rays of light and heat draw the water up, and also cause it to descend again in the form of rain. That is all to the good. The movement created by this coming and going is a good thing. By means of the rays the Nummo draws out, and gives back the life-force. This movement indeed makes life.

The old man realized that he was now at a critical point. If the Nazarene did not understand this business of coming and going, he would not understand anything else. He wanted to say that what made life was not so much force as the movement of forces. He reverted to the idea of a universal shuttle service.

'The rays drink up the little waters of the earth, the shallow pools, making them rise, and then descend again in rain.'

Then, leaving aside the question of water, he summed up his argument:

'To draw up and then return what one had drawn—that is the life of the world.'

But one could not remain for ever on these metaphysical heights. Moreover this ram had the power of movement: once he had risen to the heavens, he moved about there. He went about his business: he did not merely stay still and urinate. He moved among the high clouds leaving a track of four colours from the earth shaken off his hooves. His left forefoot made a black track, his right a red track, the two others one green and one yellow. That fourfold track was called 'the Nummo's track'. It is the rainbow.

But the rainbow has an end. The Golden Ram came down by it from heaven, and plunged into the great pools of the earth.

'You can see him, when there is a violent storm, plunging into the Bananga marsh south of Lower Ogol. Have you never seen him?'

The old man pointed with his wizened hand to the south, as he added:

'He plunges among the water-lilies, crying: "The water is mine! Water is mine!"'

SEVENTEENTH DAY

THE chief figure on the right-hand section of the façade should therefore represent the Water Spirit, the Nummo, in his marvellous form of a golden or copper ram in a bed of stars.

One point, which Ogotemméli had forgotten, is of interest to mammalogists.

'The horns of the beast are straight or curved: they can be either, but the curved sort are the oldest.'

The millet-gruel spread on the mud wall with chicken's feathers or brushes made of asses' hair was intended to give the impression that the fleece was made of leaves and, to draw attention to the processes of germination, the tail ending in a serpent's head was shown above an ear of millet standing erect.

To the right of the ram, two footprints, often shown in relief, represent the sandals of the priestly master of the sanctuary as well as the footprints of the first man. They are also the sandals of the Nummo Pair. As their bodies end in a reptile's tail, one sandal does for each, the left for the male and the right for the female.

On each sandal are eight spots recalling the cowries put in the place where the feet of the ancestor Lébé rested in the tomb of the resurrection. They also represent the eight ancestors, the eight seeds and the eight covenant stones. Lastly they are the eight cowries adorning the ritual sandals worn by candidates for the priesthood on the day of their inauguration.

Above the ram and the stars, three horizontal lines, coloured red, white, and blue-green, curving downwards at either end, represent the rainbow. Thus the painting on the right-hand side of the door is a complete picture of the sky with its light and its rain.

The objects or creatures shown on the left are of the earth. A prominent feature is a serpent who, in Sanga, is the seventh ancestor. He is often depicted as a wavy line, indicating the movement of water, which is also very commonly seen in the form of vertical zigzag lines representing the course of terrestrial streams as well as the way in which the Nummo falls on to the earth from heaven in the form of rain. And this movement may sometimes be suggested by the picture of an ostrich, whose body, shown by concentric circles, is marked with chevrons, and whose zigzag course, when pursued, is unlike that of any other winged creature of the plain.

Zigzag lines also appear in the form of vertical registers containing saw-teeth in single or double series with the points opposite each other, giving the whole design the appearance of a stack of hour-glasses.

In the upper part of the façade, as a pendant to the calabash on the right which represents the sun, is a drawing of the moon, either full or as a crescent. This is a reminder, on the left-hand side, of the celestial regions.

In the remaining space on the wall there are various ritual objects and animals in no particular order: the priest's forked staff, which is a symbol of both masculinity and femininity; the shaft itself, which is breast-high, is male, the female part is the fork in which the priest rests his forefinger, itself a symbol of the male; the priest's seat, often shown as a solid circle surrounded by a rim; the short, straight staff of the ancestor who first bestowed masks; the hooks which are actually seen elsewhere on the flat roof; throwing-sticks in the form of crooks, which symbolize the sons that every family wants; these are the doubles of the real crooks hung on the pediment; a ritual 'robber's crook', the handle of which is decorated with a line of chevrons, while its short, curved arm is open like a mouth with red lips, recalling that they held the fragment of sun that the smith stole; hoes; bunches of large millet and ears of small millet; the prohibited animal associated with the cult of the ancestor to whom the sanctuary is dedicated; a sheep or a fowl, the usual sacrificial victim offered on altars; a water-bird which recalls the priest's quest before his installation, when he had to explore the marshes and torrents to find the covenant-stone that had been hidden at the death of his predecessor; a tortoise, portraying the one that every family, large or small, possesses; when the family-head is absent, the tortoise takes his place and eats the first mouthful of food and the first sip of water every day. This drawing of the tortoise is a reminder of the family-head and also signifies that the shell represents the dwelling-place of the Nummo, that is the vault of heaven. The diamond-shaped drawings of tortoiseshell symbolize the façade of the Nummo's dwelling, the squares of the covering for the dead, and the zigzag lines of falling rain.

Masks such as the 'storeyed house', the 'equine antelope' or the 'unfolder of bush-wings' are often depicted on the left-hand panel. These are the wooden masks, male objects possessed of more power than the braided cowls, which indeed contain a certain amount of effective moisture since they are made of fibre; but the wooden masks contain even more, which they derive both from the wood in which they are carved and from the fibres in which those who wear them are clothed. Being wetter, they are closer to the Nummo.

Above the door of the temple is depicted a chequer-board of white squares alternating with squares the colour of the mud wall. There should strictly be eight rows, one for each ancestor. This chequer-board is pre-eminently the symbol of the 'things of this world' and especially of the structure and basic objects of human organization.

It symbolizes:

- the pall which covers the dead, with its eight strips of black and white squares representing the multiplication of the eight families;

- the façade of the large house with its eighty niches, home of the ancestors;

- the cultivated fields, patterned like the pall;

- the villages with streets like seams, and more generally all regions inhabited, cleared or exploited by men.

The chequer-board and the covering both portray the eight ancestors.

Inside the sanctuary, besides the red patch representing the fire of the smithy, on the right of the door as you go out, is a painted serpent representing the eighth ancestor, and on the left a crocodile symbolizing the oldest known man of the family. This last device is proper to Sanga; each region makes pictures of the being to which it is attached.

Thus the world-system, with its creatures and appurtenances, celestial and terrestrial, is painted on the temple in millet-gruel and rice.

'And what, you ask, is the use of the paintings?' said Ogotemmêli. 'It is this: they help the plants to grow, they promote germination. The day before the sacrificer wets his brushes, the ears for the sowing are spread out on the roof, the symbol of the primal field.'

In this way, at the start of the cycle of vegetable growth, the still unfertilized seeds are taken and incorporated in the universal cycle, in the general movement of clouds and men.

But the stranger was burning to ask a question.

'I have never seen a picture of a ram on the front of a temple,' he said, 'I have never seen a temple decorated according to these rules.'

'I do not know,' replied the blind old man, 'where I could find anyone able to draw the ram. If only I could see myself! . . . Temples are no longer painted according to the rules.'

In the first place, he explained, ignorance accounts for it. The priest and his sacrificer may be quite young, and may have had very little instruction in the rites of their own religion. There are many who are completely ignorant concerning the symbolism of the paintings, and particularly the picture of the celestial ram. But there are some priests, he added, who, even if they knew the rules, would not follow them. Indeed, since the pictures have power, and the more complete they are, the more powerfully they affect the grain crops, the priest has an interest in not showing too much of them, lest they should be copied by neighbouring priests on the watch for anything that could influence or charm the celestial powers. Accordingly he makes his temple façade a sort of riddle for the benefit of the uninitiated, who recognize certain details. As for his fellow priests, they only perceive the usual designs; the more important ones are not noticed.

Ogotemmêli was not very explicit on these matters, and information had to be sought elsewhere.

Since the intention and, above all, the words of the ritual play an essential part, it may be supposed that the celebrant, in painting the current pictures, puts into them in thought and word much more than his hand delineates.

But more than ignorance or mistrust, a strictly religious factor militates against, since it suppresses, expression, and is in fact the most serious obstacle to the spread of knowledge; and that is the marked reluctance, arising from respect and fear, to mention the names or picture the forms of supernatural powers.

It is a well-known fact that one cannot mention the name of one who is absent without bringing about considerable effects in the unseen world. The usual explanation of this phenomenon is that the mention of a name invokes the being whose name it is, and compels it to appear, though its presence may be unwelcome. But nothing is said about the reason why the being should hasten to answer the summons of its name. The reason is that to utter a name is to bring into existence a form and a habitation—the best form and the most suitable habitation to receive the life-force of the being invoked.

In uttering the word the speaker no doubt projects a force of his own, which is carried on the breath issuing from his mouth and is in fact one with it. But this force merely represents the force of the one invoked, it offers it a form and a voice. This form, which will be that best suited to the one who is called, traps, as it were, his life-force, compelling him to appear, to arise in answer to the call.

The same considerations apply to the paintings, especially if the material used in making them is efficacious and if the words which accompany the actions of the painter's hand are explicit and compelling.

Where names are concerned, these ideas lead to silence or the use of euphemisms; in the case of pictures they result in the avoidance of direct representation. Just as the name of the Water Spirit is never uttered, so his likeness is never drawn. To do so would be offensive to him, because to portray him would be to compel him to appear, just as if he were called by name. This would disturb him in the carrying out of his purposes and interfere in his activities as director of the universe.

There is good ground, therefore, for any priest to depict on the façade of his temple only those figures that are connected with his own Binu or are in general use and known to all.

Thus round an invisible ram, master of germination, with a fleece of leaves and copper, the artist paints a series of accessory objects, celestial or terrestrial, without order of any kind, in which only the initiated can perceive a whole world order.

EIGHTEENTH DAY

The Cult of Lébé

It was market day, and the usual commotion proclaimed the fact. At night and again at dawn, the braying of asses had aroused the west. The market-place came to life in the sunlight, as on every morning, but now attended by preliminary excitements.

At Ogotemméli's home a kind of board meeting was taking place between the master and an intelligent man squatting under the niches of the ancestors. Koguem and the European were sitting in their usual places listening to the two men.

'Ogotemméli,' Koguem explained, 'says he wants to eat an ox-head. He has called in Dyougodyêh to get him to buy the head. Dyougodyêh is explaining that he once bought a head for seventy-five francs which he cooked and ate his fill of, and then resold for ninety-one francs.'

'The profit,' said Ogotemméli, 'is not enough. You should buy my head from another man, and get it cheaper.'

Another solution, it was suggested, would be to abuse the butcher who charged too much.

'To show you he deserves it,' said Ogotemméli, 'I once bought a head from him and four feet with it. He wrapped them in a skin and, when I got home, I found only three feet. The butcher had stolen one. One should be on one's guard against that sort of man.'

'I know,' he went on, 'one of my brothers has bought a live ox, and is going to resell it today. You should ask him for the head. It will be all right with him. But one can still curse the dishonest butcher!'

Dyougodyêh agreed, except about the cursing.

'It is not worth while,' he said, 'in order to save less than fifty francs, to have the sun blazing on one's skull all day, and cook an ox-head for six hours.'

As for the dishonest butcher, he would not curse him—only abuse him.

'I also once bought an ox-head,' he said, moving away and talking as though to himself, 'for 110 francs. It was from the same butcher. Well! After my meal I resold what there was of it for eighty-five francs. Had I eaten twenty-five francs worth? Not a bit of it! Barely ten francs! I was done that time.'

He was still grumbling as he made his way across the courtyard.

'Curse him!' called Ogotemméli after him. 'Curse his father!'

It was the most irrevocable of curses. The man turned round, and said:

'Abuse will be enough.'

He spat on the wall and went out.

Ogotemméli lowered his voice to answer the Nazarene, who was questioning him about Lébé, his present-day cult, and his priest, the Hogon.

The Hogon lived next door behind the granaries, and it would have been a disgrace to be overheard above the mud wall. This was his private house: his official residence was in Upper Ogol.

The European was well aware of the main lines of the cult of this, the oldest, ancestor, eaten by the seventh Nummo, but himself the eighth Nummo, confused with the seventh but nevertheless distinct.

His covenant-stone, coming from his own skull, was the badge of his pre-eminence over the eight other principal stones, and a fortiori over all other smaller stones serving as the mark of subsequent ancestors.

Without going into the overlapping of territories, the interminable quarrels, the questions of the precedence of persons, families or tribes, and the unending reckoning of ancestries, rights, and claims, it might be said that there was in each region a Lébé with a priest (who was always the oldest man in the region) and an altar, which in the case of Sanga was set up in the principal public square of Lower Ogol, in a place which was never trodden by any uninitiated person, and which was approached by officiants only on solemn occasions.

This altar, in the form of an umbilicus, was not made of ordinary earth, or rather its earth had received, when it was founded, power from afar, both in time and in space.

The mythical Lébé had been buried in the primal field and, when men, feeling cramped in their settlements, decided to migrate, they determined to take his remains with them to the new countries they intended to explore.

When they opened the grave, the eldest of them found there the covenant-stones and also a large live serpent. This elder was called Dyon, which means 'digger'. Dyon concluded that this earth must be good, since in it a dead body had been brought back to life. He thought that by borrowing some of it he could transport to their future home this leaven of resurrection and impregnate it with the ancestral essence.

Loaded with soil, Dyon, with others following his example, moved away by mysterious routes passing underground. He was followed by the serpent, the living form of the seventh ancestor and of Lébé, who bore on his skull in a long crack an ear of millet.

The subterranean journey ended south-west of the cliffs, where Dyon emerged from the hole of a bamboo, as is shown by the motto he gave to his descendants: 'Diggers! Grown from the hole of a bamboo!'

Others came out at Amani below the scree. Others at the foot of Bamba peak. Some had followed ordinary routes in the same direction, and joined up with the first party.

At Kani-Bonzon, south of the cliffs, Dyon-the-Digger founded the first altar of Lébé. The earth he had brought with him was placed below a squared stone, which they covered with mortar. Later, each of the leaders of the migration took a little earth from the altar, and founded another altar at a distance; and these other altars served as starting-points for any number of others. In this way the virtue of the primal field was spread throughout the new clearings, cleansing the impurity of the land and helping the men to establish themselves on it. And the Lébé serpent, omnipresent, one yet many like a God, followed each founder.

This is why there may be seen, on the rock-table of Upper Ogol to the north-west, a cave called 'Cave of the Steady Women', out of which he (the serpent) comes in the evening, and to the east another called 'Cave of God's Baobab', to which he returns at dawn. Some, whose eyes are not as those of ordinary men, have sometimes been able to see him in full daylight, coiled, bright beige in colour, in the piece of land called 'Place of Rest' which is left fallow in the field of his priest.

He has an enormous task to perform; as the mainspring of germination, the protector of placentas, the purveyor of vital force, he labours day by day with bursts of energy at critical times.

'Every night,' said Ogotemmêli, 'he visits his priest, the Hogon, travelling by the western street, which separates Sodamma from Do. In the early morning he returns by the eastern street between Guëndoumman and Do. That is why the Hogon must be in his house at night, and does not go outside the village.'

'What does he do at the Hogon's?'

Ogotemmêli was silent for a long time. Then in a still lower voice he said, what all the village knew, that Lébê licked the Hogon's body.

'This,' he whispered, 'gives him the strength to live for one day.'

This strength is for the benefit of all. The Hogon is, as it were, the representative of the serpent towards man; but he is also the representative of man towards the serpent. He is entrusted with all the life necessary for men and for the land.

For Lébê's saliva has in it the power of moisture, the voiced breath which issues from every mouth. For the whole of one day the old man is endowed with speech.

The blind man's voice became no more than a breath; he paused in order to hear the noises of the streets, to detect the presence of others, to penetrate the silence of those who were watching on tiptoe, open-mouthed, in the corners of the neighbouring buildings. Now he continued:

'That is why no sweat must flow on the Hogon's body. It would rob him of his strength. Moreover, if sweat were to flow from his body, it would mean that he had deceived Lébê, and broken his tabus. The saliva is the life-force. It would vanish, if the tabu were broken, and the Hogon would die.'

Some weeks earlier, one of the European women had gone in great haste, at a moment's notice, to the installation of the Hogon of Ninu, and had been able to observe the precautions taken to keep the candidate from suffering fatigue or sweating. The ceremony took place in the caves of Kunnu-Sese, and the old man had been carried to his temple on a man's back through a mass of rocks and over slippery inclines, which a pedestrian might think twice before venturing to climb.

Ogotemmêli, questioned as to these proceedings, declared that, in addition to the danger of sweating, there was the risk of contact with the soil. If the Hogon had touched the ground, all the millet would have become red and dry. He would have 'scorched the earth'.

For the Hogon originated, in a sense, from the nature of Lébê, thus of the Nummo, and of the heavenly powers and their fire (for the Great Nummo are the smiths of heaven) and so from the sun; therefore he must not move about on foot outside the reserved territory. That territory is the village and the area outside the walls as far as the fowls wander, some score or so of cubits in extent.

'But the Hogon might equally well "scorch" the village,' said the European.

'Yes!' was the reply, 'but he wears sandals. Sandals are reserved for priests and especially for the Hogon. No one may go into the Hogon's presence with sandals on his feet. In the same way, no one may go into the smithy except barefoot, because the fire of the smithy was stolen from Heaven. It is sun, like the Hogon.'

'To put on sandals,' said the European, 'is to pose as the sun. Very well! But why should sandals prevent him from setting the earth on fire?'

'The first sandals,' said Ogotemmêli, 'were made of iron—not of copper, for copper is water and also rays of light. The sandals were iron, because iron is the colour of shade.'

Shade, he went on to explain, is cool and fresh. It is the absence of sun and helps to fight against him. Iron, the colour of shade, is a good protection for soil trodden by feet of fire. At Nanduli on the plateau, the priest, at the supreme moment of consecration, when he is wholly identified with the Nummo, puts on the two iron sandals which lie on the altar.

But there we see the first fumbling attempts at walking. What was wanted was sandals comfortable to wear and supple like the foot. The first were cut out of the used skin of the bellow of the smithy.

'It was the Great Nummo who suggested leather, because the skin had held the fire stolen from Heaven at the time of the smith's descent.'

Skin was thus proof against fire. It was itself fire, or rather it was inoculated against fire. It was the ideal screen between the foot and the soil to be protected.

Thus leather sandals enabled those who possessed celestial attributes to walk on the earth without injury to germination. Sandals were reserved to such people and no other person might usurp the right to wear them.

Another accessory peculiar to the Hogon and indicative of the origin of his power is his red cap.

'The red cap is like a sun on the Hogon's head. No one else may wear a red cap in Sanga.'

Koguem smiles. 'When I was a rifleman,' he confided to the stranger, 'I always took my military cap off when I reached the boundary.'

'Another reason,' said Ogotemmêli, 'why the Hogon does not go outside the village is because of the copper.'

When a Hogon dies, a copper ring is put round each of his ankles and his arms. These rings come from the original primal field, the grave of Lébé. They were made of metal excreted by the seventh Nummo after the swallowing.

Once again Ogotemmêli explained the nature of copper.

The rays falling from the clouds are changed into copper on touching the ground. Not on the surface of the ground, however, but deep in the earth, too deep for men to be able to lay hold of it, the transformation takes place. Lébé's copper was found because it was in the grave they had dug for him.

The rings made of the metal are the property of Lébé; they are put on the Hogon when he is buried, but afterwards they are taken from him and given, not to his successor, but to the oldest man after the latter, who will be appointed in his turn, when the office falls vacant again.

Consequently every Hogon had had the rings in his possession while his predecessor held office. He is impregnated with copper. He is like copper, and therefore may not cross any water, for that is one of the Nummo's chief prohibitions. The Nummo being, in a sense, copper in virtue of his celestial and luminous essence, takes back to himself all copper that passes over watery places which are his preserves.

The European, for himself, had no difficulty in accepting all these symbolical representations, these different methods by which man sought to manipulate the invisible and was himself manipulated. But he was thinking of those who, in other countries, might one day be curious enough to study Dogon metaphysics, and whenever he had an opportunity he checked Ogotemmêli's explanation of the universe by offering some objection.

'Copper,' he said, 'belongs to the Nummo: he is copper: he excretes copper. Very good! But then he could take back the metal at any time and in any place, and not merely when anyone carrying it passes by water.'

'Did I not tell you,' was the answer, 'that copper is also water? To pass with the metal near certain waters is to risk seeing it return to the water, and to be carried away with it oneself.'

In fact, if copper is closely connected with the Nummo and he is water, the liquid and the metal are of the same essence.

Ogotemmêli then resumed his concrete explanations of the foundations of Dogon thought.

'The sun,' said he, 'is a burnt-up land surrounded by a spiral of copper raised to a state of incandescence which gives it its diurnal motion, which in turn gives light and life to the universe. The sun is, so to say, molten copper, in proof of which the metal in the fire throws off rays like those of the sun. But these rays, as I have told you, draw up moisture and make clouds. They are the channels by which the water passes: they are water. Proof of this is the fact that they are visible only in times of warm mists and storms. That is why solar rays are called mènn di (copper water).'

'Mèndi,' said the European, 'is also the name of a mountain.' Ogotemmêli looked up. Decidedly, he must be thinking, these Europeans are sometimes not as stupid as we Africans usually suppose.

'Yes!' he said. 'Ignorant people say Mènti; but the proper pronunciation is Mèndi.'

Mêndi stood up like a dome above the northern plateau not far from Tintam, two days' march from Sanga. The European had seen it some time before in a dry mist, swollen like a volcano about to erupt.

'It is called "Copper water", because it contains copper and is an abundant source of water; and that is why the souls of the dead go there before starting on their journey to the south. They provide themselves with copper there, which they drink on their long journey. That is what they do for water.'

The European recalled what he had been told, when he saw the mountain. The souls of the dead, his informant had told him, come there in large numbers. They come on foot, on horseback, on pack-oxen, and nowadays in packed lorries, to fetch water. They all crowd to Mêndi.

'One useful thing about the Nummo,' said Ogotemmêli, 'is his having given copper to men.'

NINETEENTH DAY

The Cult of the Binu

It might be supposed that the institution of Lébé was the centre of the Binu worship, that 'pseudo-totemism', as the Europeans were for a long time in the habit of calling it.

Investigations carried out during this most recent expedition had only tended to confirm what had been published up till then by the research team. Binu worship venerates the souls of the eight ancestors and of certain men of note, who followed in the wake of the eight in later times, and secures their favour on behalf of the living.

After a long time, after the revelation of the third Word and the present-day organization of the world, Death made its appearance on the scene. Up to that time men were immortal, or at least, after a long life, underwent a transformation like that of the eight Great Ones—that is to say, they went down into the anthill and were seen no more, the only traces they left being the bowls lying by the opening. But, instead of becoming Nummo and going up to heaven, they remained on earth.

When Death appeared, only a few very old men were able to transform themselves in this way. The others submitted to the destruction of their bodies, and new rites were introduced for regulating the spiritual forces liberated by their deaths.

From this time onwards men were subject to hitherto unknown dangers, and their ancestors, who had not experienced death, came to their aid and returned to their people—whence their name of Binu.

In order to reveal himself, a Binu would appear to one of his descendants in human or animal form, and give him one of the covenant-stones (dogué) found in the tomb of Lébé. These stones had been carried away by the old people in their migrations, or had been left in the earth and, by mysterious routes, had found their way to the present country of the Dogon.

Armed with this stone and with various objects which had belonged to his ancestor, the man selected for the revelation would build a sanctuary and found a cult, of which he would be the priest.

Before his death he would hide the stone in the gorges or marshes, and his successor, inspired by the Nummo and the spirit of the Binu, would go in search of it, wandering among the rocks and searching in the waters till he found it, and proved thereby the authenticity of the call from heaven.

Even today, in the villages, one may come upon such men, with their shining eyes, who leave their work to get up in the middle of the night to pursue this unwearying search, which often goes on for years and years. The European had seen in the Dodyou Oreil quarter one of the most intelligent and well-educated youths in Sanga, who was a candidate for the succession to the office of priest of the Binu Ogoiné. This young man was seeking to revive a cult, the previous priest of which had been dead more than a century, and since that time the necessary ritual objects had never been found.

Each family belonging to one of the eight big ancestral groups has a Binu belonging to that group. This ancestor may be common to a number of scattered families, which together form a large aggregate. It may also happen that the ritual objects of one sanctuary are shared among several families.

Regular sacrifices are offered to the Binu at sowing time and at harvest, in order that the people may derive benefit from the powers of the ancestor, powers instinct with life since he never experienced death.

From the very beginning of their investigations, which went back nearly fifteen years, the research team had been led to study this institution. The appearances were convincing; at the turning-points of the myths, animals appeared, spewing out the covenant-stones given them by the ancestor and becoming for that reason forbidden or 'tabu' as the Europeans say in their anthropological jargon. Some of them seemed to figure simply as auxiliaries, as the bearers of messages or as saviours. Others, on the contrary, were identified with the ancestor himself. The myth of the Binu Tiré, ancestor of Ogotemméli's family, which originated in the Sodamma quarter of Upper Ogol, was a good example of this.

The ancestor, when he became an old man, was in the habit of looking after the children in his eldest son's house, while the adults were away at work. One day he changed himself into a serpent, which frightened the children. As, however, he resumed his ordinary appearance when the men came back from work, the whole thing was put down to childish fantasies. But it happened again, and one day the eldest son, returning unexpectedly from the fields, surprised the old man in his metamorphosis. The latter, ashamed at being discovered thus, at once changed into an antelope of the kind called equine, in order to run away faster. Pursued by his son, he made for the cave of Kommo Dama, south-west of the Ogols, and disappeared into it.

The son, not daring to follow, remained at the entrance of the cave, listening to the sound of the galloping hooves of the animal growing fainter as it disappeared into the bowels of the earth. He was about to go away, hearing nothing more, when he became aware of a murmur, which gradually grew louder. From a murmur it became a rumbling, and then a storm, till finally a huge wave broke out from the depths of the cave, died away at his feet, and immediately withdrew.

Looking at the ground when it had gone, the man found a stone which the flood had deposited there. It was the covenant-stone left by the old man before his disappearance into another world. The man picked it up, and later entrusted it to a member of the family, who was found to be possessed by the spirit of the ancestor and by the Nummo, and became the first priest of the Binu Tiré of Sodamma.

It was natural to suppose that Dogon totemism, though it might have particular features of its own, would nevertheless conform to the criteria prescribed by the anthropologists. Moreover the natives themselves lent weight to this supposition by a misuse of words: they gave the name 'Binu' indiscriminately to the ancestor and to the prohibited animal. But some doubt persisted. It was the human ancestor alone who played the chief part in the cult. The animal seemed always to be an accessory; the links between the man and the animal were not at all clear. The team of Europeans had come to the point of avoiding the word 'totem' and experimenting with the invention of new terms. How would 'binuism' do? Till the question of the relations between man and animal was settled, no decision in the matter was possible.

Ogotemmêli was to offer a solution—a provisional solution no doubt, but so original as to reopen the whole question of totemism.

He began the discussion, however, with certain aphorisms which were not of such a kind as to throw light on the problem.

'Animals,' he said, 'are superior to men, because they belong to the bush and do not have to work. Many animals feed themselves on what man grows by painful toil.'

He even went so far as to say that animals were more perfectly made than men, seeing that they lacked speech. It was an excellence in them to be without the power of speech.

Did he mean by this that speech, the instrument of progress, the foundation of the world-order, was in the last analysis a disaster? Did he mean to say that speech was, in a sense, the fruit of disorder, inasmuch as it was necessary for the restoration of the normal movement of things? Did he mean that, if the world had developed without hindrances from its original basis, there would have been no need for speech, no need for technical processes, for the two things were bound inextricably together? Did he mean that animals were immune from human misfortunes?

To all these questions Ogotemmêli never made any answer.

It appeared from his earliest statements that the part played by animals was connected with the original system of twin births, and that it was a form of reparation, of reorganization, of compensation.

'Man,' said the European to himself, in an effort to sort out his ideas, 'loses the system of twin births. The Nummo intervenes, and gives each child two souls of different sexes. Objection: the creature is both male and female, whereas it should be either one or the other. Solution: circumcision and excision. The parts in which the second soul resides, prepuce and clitoris, are eliminated. Objection: one soul remains disembodied. Solution: the prepuce becomes the lizard called "Sun", and the clitoris becomes the scorpion. Objection: these animal carriers are crude, too close to the primitive creatures of the dawn of the world. The second soul, which continues to be in contact with the person concerned, is not adequately provided for. What is the solution?"

Ogotemméli pondered. They were at the root of one of the oldest human institutions.

'When the eight ancestors,' he said at last, 'were born to the first pair, eight different animals were born in heaven.'

'Born to whom?'

'To pairs of animals created in the beginning by the God Amma. Up to this time they had had no connection with the earth. When the eight men appeared, each of them shared a soul with an animal; but the man remained on earth, while his animal associate remained in Heaven. It was not till after their metamorphosis in the anthill and their transformation into Nummo that the ancestors went up to heaven and re-joined their animal associates there, though without becoming one with them.'

As for the men who came after them, they were transformed in the same way, but did not go up to heaven, so that they were separated indefinitely from the associates who had been born at the same time as themselves in the species of animals linked with their respective families.

When Death came into the world, the new world-system had already come down in the form of the celestial granary, on which all the animals figured. Consequently the metamorphosed ancestors were in some sense represented by their animal associates, who from that moment lived in the uncultivated areas round the villages and no longer in heaven.

'The animal,' said Ogotemméli finally, 'is, as it were, man's twin.'

And an ancestor could use the animal which was, so to speak, his twin, to make himself known to the living men whom he wished to help. True, the animal was distinct from him, born elsewhere and to all appearance different in form, but it was of the same essence and was recalled to heaven in the same batch.

The ancestor, by revealing himself, gave valuable help to men, one of its most efficacious elements being the revelation of the unknown twin, to whom each man was linked without being aware of it, and who was to be venerated by becoming one of the prohibitions observed by the family. Thus, from revelation to revelation, the whole Dogon people settled into a new system, in which each man possessed two supporters for his second soul: one from his birth, consisted of the animal and the other, after circumcision, was the 'sun' lizard.

Ogotemmêli had much to say of the function of the animal regarded as man's twin, and of the distribution of spiritual powers, and of a man's duties towards his related animal, the object of prohibition, the pledge of life outside himself. But suddenly, in the course of the old man's discourse, the amazing complications of the system became apparent.

'I said,' he observed, summarizing, as his custom was, the account he had given, 'that the first children and the animals in heaven had no successors.' (This was a mistake on Ogotemmêli's part. What he had said, and what he meant, was that there were no relations between them.) 'Relations began with circumcision and excision. At every human birth, therefore, a prohibited animal is born. But the animal itself has a twin, a prohibited animal; and this animal likewise, and so on. Every human family is thus at the head of a whole class of animals.'

Ogotemmêli emphasized this important point. Every human family was part of a long series of creatures, and the whole aggregate of human families was connected with the whole animal kingdom. And behind that was a dim suggestion of vegetable series.

'When man is born,' said the old man, 'since he is the head (that is, the chief) of all the prohibited animals, all the prohibited animals' prohibited animals are born at the same time.'

In each of the eight families, therefore, man was the originator of beings whose life had repercussions extending to the last term of a series affecting the eighth part of creation.

This whole order of things rested on the assumption that the obligation imposed by the prohibitions, so far as man was concerned, extended to the whole species. In fact it applied only to one or two animals and one vegetable: otherwise men would have found themselves involved in a network of impossible contingencies.

'When I was born,' said Ogotemmêli, in illustration of his argument, 'an equine antelope was born too. The antelope's prohibited animal is the panther. A panther also was born. But the panther's forbidden animal is the antelope. The circle was thus closed and complete.'

'But,' he added, 'although a man is not concerned with all the creatures of the series, it is nevertheless true that every childbirth sets in motion the birth of all the animals and vegetables associated with the family of the child.'

That meant that when a child was born in any one of the eight families, the whole of creation went into action.

The European took his leave. The first sounds of the braying of the asses returning from the pastures could be heard in the direction of Lulli.

Behind every man he met in the narrow streets he seemed to see the shadows of an eighth part of all the living creatures of the world.

Sacrifice

ON his way through the streets of Lower Ogol, from Dodyou Oreil to Tabda, by way of Guinna and Amtaba, the European was thinking of that unplumbed mystery, the blood sacrifice.

In Binu temples, on Lébé altars, on the earth mounds set shamelessly on a thousand sites in the middle of courtyards or against the side of walls, animals were dying at the prescribed seasons throughout the year. They all shed their blood for the sake of those relationships with Heaven which man persisted in maintaining. Fowls poured it out with their heads hanging down and their wings outstretched, their feet held in the strong fist of the man who cut their throats. Quivering sheep were handed down at arm's length from the rooftops to be held above the pediments studded with iron hooks and anvils with extended arms. Their blood sputtered from the bubbling wound, and flowed over the façades in dark red trails which turned brown as glowing iron becomes dark.

When the victim was too heavy to be moved from the ground on which it lay in its death-throes, its blood was collected in calabashes as it spouted from the throat as from a fountain, and the sacrificer like a gardener sprinkled it on all the consecrated objects of iron and wood as if he were watering plants.

It might be said that every domesticated animal in Sanga perished on the altars except a few cattle kept for a year or two for the market.

The Nazarene, on his way through the labyrinth of streets, where women in the gentlest of voices were exchanging morning greetings, thought of all the ink that had flowed on the subject of this blood and all the hypotheses put forward to explain man's ruthless determination to sacrifice.

He felt strongly that the only people who could understand it, the only men who could explain themselves, were precisely those who did not know how to write.

Some years before he had grasped the theory of ritual killing: a fifteen-year-old Dogon had put a member of the team on the track, and suddenly all had become clear. In all its different forms, whether of consecration, expiation, divination, purification, upholding the invisible or securing salvation for one's self, sacrifice for the Dogon had one unchanging effect—the redistribution of life-force.

But it was not simply a matter of taking a victim's life-force to put it somewhere else, or to increase the life-force of some other being, visible or invisible. The object was rather to create a movement of forces within a circuit composed of the sacrificer, the victim, the altar and the power invoked. In the case of the ordinary service of a power like the Nummo, Son of God, or of the God Amma himself, the mechanism could be clearly seen.

At the critical moment, that is to say, when the blood flows, the man utters a prayer, by which he invokes the power, for example the Nummo, and explains what he is doing. The prayer is spoken aloud. It is therefore itself an expulsion of force, which follows the lines of the breath issuing from the speaker's mouth. This force serves, in the first place, to arouse the Nummo and, in the second place, to direct the force that flows from the wounded throat of the victim and pours out on to the altar.

On the altar the virtue of new, fresh, blood combines with what has been left there by a long series of ritual murders: for the altar is a store-house of forces, on which man draws at the appropriate time, and which he keeps constantly fed. It is also the point of contact between man and the Invisible.

So long as the altar is fed, and its power is renewed by fresh offerings, the Nummo, when he hears the Word comes to drink, to draw strength and maintain his life. The Dogon word for sacrifice does in fact come from a root which means to 'renew life'.

But in investing the altar with his presence the Nummo brings with him an influx of fresh forces. The result is an emulsion, a boiling mixture, from which two currents proceed. One of these is caught by the Nummo, and is his share in the benefit of the sacrifice. The other, which is the most important from the human standpoint, goes back along the flow of the victim's blood, enters its wounded throat, follows the channels of the blood, and lodges in the liver, which is a privileged organ, the hidden crucible of the personality.

The victim is then cut up, prepared, and eaten. But the liver, now full of virtue, goes to the sacrificer, whose own liver is filled with a reinvigorating influx. By consuming the liver of the victim he assimilates a part of the Nummo's force, thus closing the circuit opened by the Word, which itself came from his own liver.

The Nazarene remembered all these details, which he had already learnt from accounts given to him by the actors in this age-old institution. He noted that what came from the liver returned to the liver: the man expectorated only to ingurgitate again, and in the cycle of this spiritual sustenance, which wore the likeness of the system of physical nourishment, the victim and the altar of the God both had their place.

But was the cycle really completed in this way?

Ogotemméli had never said much about the sacrificial procedure. He assumed that the European had solved the problem, partly because he knew the latter was well-informed on the subject, and partly because the whole thing seemed to him self-evident. He had further revelations to offer concerning the institution, but he had waited till the European was acquainted with the various practices and ritual actions. He was sure, moreover, that his explanations would have been unintelligible without a knowledge of the Dogon conceptions of the Word and its effects.

The European, who was about to enter Tabda and take the turning which led to the blind man's home, stopped suddenly and signed to Koguem to look. In the dark angle of the street a black chicken with a tail like a trapeze upside down was in frantic pursuit of some invisible object. It jumped in every direction, almost turning a somersault in the air, then stopped abruptly only to go forward cautiously, scraping its beak on the ground. When the stranger halted, however, the chicken flung itself against a bright spot, which appeared for a few moments on the wall; it was the reflection of the yellow screen attached to the lens of the camera which the European always carried about with him.

In the courtyard Ogotemméli, in his brown rags, was advancing with careful steps. His feet knew all the pitfalls in the rocks and the dust. In his right hand he held his long staff, which reached up to his shoulder. His left hand held close to his side the black leather bag, well known in all the surrounding neighbourhood, which contained secret remedies.

After a lengthy greeting, he sat down in his usual place in the embrasure of the storeyed house. His voice that day was scarcely audible, for he was still speaking of Lébé and of his priest, the Hogon. He wanted to teach the European the meaning of the annual sacrifice, the first phase of which took place on the outdoor altar in the middle of the big square of Upper Ogot known as 'Lébé's Terrace'.

This altar was a mound of grey earth, and all the inhabitants of the village skirted it with care, because it contained a piece of the earth taken in the old days from the altar of Kani-Bonzon, the first place where the Dogon stopped in their migrations; this altar itself was made with earth from the grave brought from the primal field. This mound therefore represented in a sense the grave of Lébé.

On the appointed day, after the ceremonies that opened the sowing season, a goat had its throat cut on the altar.

'A smith is there,' said Ogotemméli, 'with his anvil. He stands before the man who is going to eat the liver.'

'Who is going to eat the liver?'

'The oldest of the "Impure".'

The 'Impure' are released from most of the prohibitions, and in particular those connected with death. Each family includes a number of such persons, who are designated by divination. They alone are able to handle with impunity the forces emanating from the dead.

'Why an "Impure"?'

'Because the sacrifice takes place on earth from a grave. Also because an "Impure" is, as Lébé was, neither dead nor living.'

An 'Impure' is therefore the person best fitted to receive temporarily the force that will pass from the victim into him when he swallows the liver.

'As soon as the throat is cut,' went on Ogotemméli, 'the smith beats the ground with his anvil, and does not cease doing so till all is consumed. His beating helps the forces to pass.'

The life-force of Lébé, contained in the earth of the grave mingled with the earth of the altar, passes to the rhythm of the beats into the liver of the goat, and thence into the liver of the 'Impure' who eats it after it has been cooked.

'The blows of the anvil start the movement.'

Ogotemmêli meant by this that the blows of the anvil performed the function of the warning prayer and gave the movement its direction. Also they recalled the blows dealt by the smith who fell from heaven at the time of the subterranean swallowing and resurrection.

'When the "Impure" eats the animal's liver,' continued Ogotemmêli, 'it is as if he were eating the skull of Lébé, the skull of his old father: for it is the force of Lébé's skull that passes into the sacrificial animal.'

This observation recalled the placing of the stones cast up in the tomb by the seventh Nummo after he had eaten Lébé. Whereas the stones that indicated the joints were destined for the Binu cult, the stone that marked the place of the head was the sign of the cult of Lébé himself, as the honoured representative of the eighth ancestor, and identified with him.

'The "Impure" eats the liver cooked,' said the old man, 'because fire rids it of everything ill-omened. The bad part of the bile contained in the gall-bladder disappears in the flames, and the good principle remains.'

Then, lowering his voice still more and having satisfied himself that neither the Hogon's wife nor his own could hear him, Ogotemmêli added: 'The "Impure", by eating the liver, gives his own life.'

It was a turning-point of the enquiry. Ogotemmêli spat and took more tobacco. For some minutes he spoke only of some obscure matter concerning a field to the north of the Sammtigou hollow on the right of the rock known as the 'Tâ Cave'. Ogotemmêli was vehement about the case, which to him was as clear as day, and he insisted that the people of the Go rock were impostors. He would not even name them: he called them 'the Go people'.

'You were saying,' the European reminded him, 'the "Impure"...'

'The "Impure", by eating the liver, becomes Lébé himself, who died, who was eaten, and who rose again for the restoration of the world. He is the same as Lébé; he has in his liver the life-force of Lébé. He is emptied of his own life in order that he may be filled with that of the ancestor; and, since it is in the liver that the Word is born, everything that is said by the "Impure" at the sacrifice, and for a considerable time after, is as though said by Lébé. When he speaks the "Impure" imparts the good Word to everyone.'

So much for this part of the sacrifice. They had now heard all about the cycle of the movement of forces, starting from the sacrificer, passing through the invisible Power, the altar, and the victim back to the sacrificer. That might seem a sufficient account of the operation; but Dogon philosophy did not stop there. The qualities set in motion continued their course. By the words of the man who was identifying himself with the dead author of the third revelation, the vital forces spread out to all humanity within range of his voice.

In this action the oldest 'Impure' was not alone. He was seconded by other men of the same kind as himself, who consumed the rest of the victim. They too received the power of words, but not to the same extent. Their voices were effective, however, and also operated for the good of the community.

Meanwhile Ogotemmêli continued his disquisition, which was concerned not so much with sacrifice in general as with the sacrifice offered to Lébé at the time of sowing. The immolation of the goat on the outdoor altar was followed next day by a second sacrifice. This took place in the Hogon's house on an altar which, apparently, was not dedicated specially to Lébé, but also, and perhaps chiefly, to the seventh Nummo, who had swallowed Lébé.

This altar had probably not been built with earth from the grave, for the Hogon, who was very distinctly 'living', himself consumed the liver of the victim after pronouncing the following prayer, in which the aspirations and expectations of the whole of the Dogon country were summed up:

Oh God! Receive the morning greeting!
Ancestors! Receive the morning greeting!
We are here on the chosen day,
We are going out to sow the seed,
We are going out to cultivate.

Oh God! Cause the millet to germinate,
 Make the eight seeds sprout,
 And the ninth calabash!
 Give a wife to him who has none!
 And to him who has a wife without children
 Give a child!
 Protect the men against thorns,
 Against snake-bites,
 Against ill winds!
 Pour out the rain,
 As we pour water from a pot!
 Millet! Come!

Ogotemmêli did not say whether the Hogon identified himself with the seventh Nummo. But the point was immaterial for the union of the seventh Nummo, who had eaten Lébé and raised him from the dead, with Lébé, who had been eaten and raised from the dead, was effected in the course of the day: the 'Impures' who, the day before, had communicated in the flesh of Lébé, and the oldest of whom had undergone a real transubstantiation, appeared at the Hogon's house at the moment of the sacrifice to demand that the union of the seventh Nummo and Lébé, representing the family of the eighth ancestor, should be maintained unbroken, that the Word and the master of Speech should continue to be closely linked together.

The rite of sacrifice thus ensured that the order established at the time of the resurrection in the primal field, should continue and that the seeds sown in the earth should bear fruit.

But Ogotemmêli did not wish it to be thought that the sacrifice to Lébé at the sowing was the only one that allowed the dissemination of good words.

'The effect of every sacrifice,' he said, 'is the same as that of the sacrifice to Lébé. First one feeds and strengthens oneself, and then, by means of the Word, gives strength and life to all men.'

Even in sacrifices offered for one's own welfare, which everyone offers on his personal altars, representing his head or his body, the meal of the sacrificer benefits all.

It is the same with every sort of sacrifice or libation which men offer at foundation altars in villages, at altars of the several quarters of villages, in family shrines, on earthen vessels commemorating twins or ancestors, at the Great Mask or on fire altars.

All sacrifices, therefore, have the same effects as the corporate ritual celebrated at the communal sowing. After he has communicated, man speaks, and his Word, impregnated with the virtue of the ancestors, goes out to others.

'The altar gives something to a man, and a part of what he has received he passes on to others,' said Ogotemmêli. 'A small part of the sacrifice is for oneself, but the rest is for others. The forces released enter into the man, pass through him and out again, and so it is for all . . . ' As each man gives to all the rest, so he also receives from all. A perpetual exchange goes on between men, an unceasing movement of invisible currents. And this must be so if the universal order is to endure. 'The Word,' said Ogotemmêli, 'is for everyone in this world; it must come and go and be interchanged, for it is good to give and to receive the forces of life.'

The Fertilizing Word

THE conversation of the previous day had made plain the power of the human word. The voice of man can arouse God and extend divine action.

This, no doubt, was only to be expected, since God himself acting through his son the Nummo, had three times re-organized the world by means of three successive Words, each more explicit and more widespread in its range than the one before it. There had been also the regeneration of the eight men and their rebirth as Water Spirits through the voice of the Nummo who, by speaking to himself, fertilized himself.

Where did it come from, this Word, which diffused itself along the spiral curves of the breath as it issued from the face and what paths did it take within the human being?

It was not in the nature of Ogotemmêli to give direct answer to such questions.

'The Nummo,' he said, 'who is water and heat, enters the body in the water one drinks, and communicates his heat to the bile and the liver. The life-force, which is the bearer of the Word, which is the Word, leaves the mouth in the form of breath, or water vapour, which is water and is Word.'

He repeated what he had said the day before, that the Word came from the deepest and most secret part of the being, namely, the liver. But he preferred to follow the original line of his thought, and not to answer questions.

He reminded them that the first Word had been pronounced in front of the genitalia of a woman; the first skirt had been plaited, that is, 'spoken', by the Nummo in front of his mother.

The Word finally came from the anthill, that is, from the mouth of the seventh Nummo, which is to say from a woman's genitalia.

The second Word, contained in the craft of weaving, emerged from a mouth, which was also the primordial sex organ, in which the first childbirths took place.

'Issuing from a woman's sexual part,' said Ogotemmêli, 'the Word enters another sexual part, namely the ear.'

In the symbolism of the body already discussed by the old man, the ear was bi-sexual: the external ear was male, and the auditory aperture female. But in fact the Word, according to its nature, can enter by two apertures in a woman—the ear or the sexual organ.

Bad words enter by the ear and pass into the throat, the liver, and finally the womb. The unpleasant smell of the female sexual parts comes from the bad words heard by the ear. The smell, apparently, completing a cycle of words.

On the other hand good words, though taken in by the ear, go directly to the sexual parts where they encircle the womb as the copper spiral encircles the sun. This Word of water provides and maintains the moisture necessary for procreation, and the Nummo, by this means, introduces a germ of water into the womb. He changes the water of the Word into a germ, and gives it the appearance of a human being but the essence of a Nummo. Or rather, the Nummo, present in the moist sexual organ, as in all water, by means of efficacious words which mingle with the woman's seed, moulds a tiny watery creature in his own image.

Thus at the very beginning of human life is to be found a divine germ which lies waiting in the womb of every fertile woman. It is shaped by the Nummo: but the living matter of which it is composed is produced by human action. All good words, whether spoken by the mouths of men or women, enter the bodies of all women, and prepare them for future mating and childbirth.

This is because the germ thus formed of water cannot grow or develop; it is in a state of expectation. It can however be destroyed by evil influences. It is motionless, and the flow of good words, even if it were unceasing, would do no more than preserve it in this condition. It awaits the dawn of its being.

Ogotemmêli did not explain why this celestial germ could not develop in accordance with its essence. If asked, he would no doubt have answered that the 'why' in the destinies of the universe was no part of his philosophy and that, if women brought perfect and celestial geniuses into the world, those destinies would not be what they are.

The germ must therefore be given a fresh start. It must also be given another substance, for its celestial nature was not fitted for life on earth. It is at this point that the man intervenes.

But it seems that this intervention, though necessary, bears the mark of certain primordial events. The amorous struggle of the human couple, in which the woman resists while her partner plays the aggressive part, reproduces the primal struggle between the jackal, God's eldest son, and his mother the earth. The male of today is the jackal digging into the anthill in search of the ant, an avatar of the earth. The woman is the incestuous mother, who finally confesses herself overcome by her son's superior strength, and mates with him.

The mating of the human couple in the darkness of the inner room with its four posts is consummated on the earth-platform, placed so that the man faces west, lying on his right side, while the woman faces east. The bed, symbolizing the primal field with the seeds in it ready for germination, is full of expectant life.

At the moment of union the Nummo guides the male seed, which encircles the womb with a spiral motion, as the Word did. This seed, coming as it does from an organ made of earth, is itself a symbol of the earth. It is also earth, because it comes from the man's joints, which were indicated in the original tomb by the covenant-stones cast up there.

'The stones,' said the old man, 'were put at the points where the joints lie, because the joints are the chief thing in the body of a man.'

The Nummo moulded this earth with the water of the germ, which is itself the produce of the words taught by Heaven.

'The water of the woman,' said Ogotemméli, 'which the Nummo formed in his own image, is mingled by him with the seed of the man, who is earth.'

As usual he went on to enlarge on a difficult point by re-touching his first statement.

'Just as God shaped man out of earth and water, so the Nummo shapes the seed of the man with the water of the woman.'

'The Nummo,' he added finally, 'with the words and the woman's seed forms a being of water after his own image. The man's seed enters into this germ as a man.'

He meant that the human nature in its totality, 'as a man,' entered the being of celestial essence that was awaiting life in the womb.

The man's seed, originating in the joints, transmitted them, providing the being, whose limbs were supple like those of the Nummo, with a man's elbows and knees. Thus the male seed, extracted from the eight joints, directs itself within the embryo to places corresponding to those it occupies in the limbs of the man, in this way giving the first indication of the human frame.

It is also, by its earthly quality, both reminder and evidence of the debt which each of us owes to the earth, because it was of earth that the first pair were made; and this debt has to be paid by the shedding of blood, in circumcision and excision and in menstruation.

But Ogotemméli postponed discussion of this debt till later and reverted to the effects of the Word in generation.

'Words spoken by day enter the bodies of women. Any man speaking to any woman is assisting procreation. By speaking to a woman one fertilizes her, or at least by introducing into her a celestial germ, one makes it possible for her to be impregnated in the normal way.'

He compared a pregnant woman to an ear of millet beginning to swell within its leafy spiral. Such an ear is said to have 'found its voice', perhaps by analogy with a fertilized woman, who also has found a voice, that is, the voice of a man.

But he insisted that the word, if it was to be good, must be spoken in the daytime. 'Words of the day are the only good words; a word spoken by night is ill-omened.' And that was why it was forbidden to talk loudly or shout or whistle in the villages by night.

'Words fly away,' he said. 'No-one knows where they go; they are lost and that means a loss of force, for all the women are asleep at night; no ear, no sexual part will catch them.'

Where could they vanish away, these words without echo and with no one to hear them? Was it right to utter, over enclosing walls, in the cracks of doors, in empty streets, words addressed to nobody?

But there was something even worse than lack of hearers. In fact in any village there are always some women who are asleep. Words spoken by night may enter their ears. They say 'Who was that?' They never know. What is said at night is the word of an unknown speaker, falling into their wombs at random. If any women were impregnated in this way, the embryo would be the fruit of chance, like that of promiscuous and irregular unions.

But words spoken by night do not fertilize women, and just as blows on the ground at night undo the work done by the smith on his anvil by day, so the word of the night, entering a woman's ear and passing through her throat and liver, coils itself round the womb in an inauspicious way, unwinding the efficacious spirals formed by the word of the day.

Bad words therefore make women temporarily unfit for procreation by destroying, or rather disturbing, the 'germ of water' which is waiting to receive the contribution of the male.

But its effects were more far-reaching. Ogotemmêli had already said that the bad word did not merely occupy the womb; it passed out thence in emanations, which also played a decisive part in the act of procreation.

'Bad words smell,' he said. 'They affect a man's potency. They pass from the nose to the throat and liver, and from the liver to the sexual organ.'

They caused a man to feel aversion. Ogotemmêli then turned to the question of feminine hygiene, which could (he said) to a considerable extent, combat the effects of bad words. He referred to the celestial granary, in the middle of which was a round jar, symbolizing the womb and the sun, which contained the covenant-stones intended to mark the joints in which the human seed originated.

On this round jar was a smaller pot serving as a lid, full of Lannea acida oil intended for toilet purposes and symbolizing the foetus. This vessel had on top of it an even smaller pot containing sweet-scented roots.

Starting from these objects, Ogotemmêli developed rules of hygiene, which included details of the various measures taken by woman in order to attract men. Scent (he said) acted like a good word in combating the bad smell resulting from a bad word. From this theme he reverted to the uses of dress and ornaments, which he had already discussed at length.

In conclusion he dwelt on the continuous part played by words in the pitfalls and struggles associated with procreation. The same word which predisposed the womb for mating, also exerted an attraction for men in the folds of the loin-cloth, the warp and woof of which enclosed in their threads the words of the eight ancestors.

The Blood of Women

THE European asked a question point blank, which seemed to have nothing to do with the subject of the conversation.

'Why,' he asked, 'do the eight families observe different prohibitions? Why all these animals?'

Ogotemmêli, who was never disconcerted, gave an answer which made his interlocutor smile with satisfaction.

'The prohibited animals,' he said, 'are different, because wombs may be of four different forms and the male sexual organ of three; the children produced by different combinations of these forms are therefore different. The animals, which are in a sense the twins of the different sorts of men, must therefore be different from one another.'

At the beginning, he reminded them, the first created couple had eight children, of whom the four eldest were males and the four others females. The latter ranked fifth to eighth in the family; the wombs were assigned to them having the qualities associated with Nos. 5 to 8.

Form No. 5 is called pobu in allusion to the fruit of the tree of that name.

Ogotemmêli and Koguem both chuckled slyly at the word, which is one of the worst insults one can hurl at a woman.

The pobu form is egg-shaped, round below and somewhat pointed above. In the arrangement of the celestial granary it corresponds to compartment 5, that is, to the seed of the bean, and is of the same oblong shape. It is ill-omened, and its offspring are malformed, because it is not deep enough and does not allow of normal development.

Its number is that of abortion and of sickly children.

Form 6 is called 'antelope's foot'. It is three-cornered, so that it has the shape of the male number 3, and should in theory give birth to male twins (2×3 , twice the number of the male). It is propitious, as are the two following forms. It corresponds to the native sorrel.

Form 7, called 'split', is longer and thinner than form 5. It is split along its length like rice seed, to which it corresponds. It gives birth to twins of different sexes ($4 + 3$).

Form 8, called 'chest', is a trapezium upside down like a man's chest. It has four sides (the female number), and produces female twins (2×4). It corresponds to the Digitaria.

No one knows how the different forms of the male organ were attributed to the first four ancestors, but the three forms are known as 'thick', lizard's head' and 'long'. The first of these, which is propitious, is especially suited to the female forms 5 and 8. The second, which is spear-shaped, 'pricks'. It is unpropitious for all forms. The third suits forms 6 and 7, but is unpropitious for the others.

These four female and three male forms are of course found in all the eight families. But at the dawn of humanity they were the origin of classifications.

Does this Dogon idea throw any light on what the linguists call nominal classes? The system is based on a classification of living creatures, objects, actions, and modes of being, into categories. In those African languages which have been preserved, a distinct class of nouns, with special characteristics, appertains to each of these categories. The Dogon language, at first sight, does not seem to display this distinction; but, on the other hand, it provides striking examples of categories of beings, objects, or abstractions, apparently disparate, but having names derived from the same root and, moreover, closely linked in the myths and in rituals as well as in the minds of those who participate in them. Thus the conversations with Ogotemmêli had brought to light the close connection, not merely verbal but also expressed in the objects and actions themselves, that linked cloth—clothing—speech—ornament—seven—sun—cow—mother—lizard (avatar of the prepuce)—four—granary—steal.

It would also be possible, though perhaps rather rash, to suggest a linguistic connection linking Digitaria exilis—menstruation, and voice—spiral—copper—rain, which are fundamental to the Dogon religious system.

But these ideas merely passed like a flash through the mind of the European, as he listened to the confidences uttered by Ogotemmêli in a low voice or a whisper according to the volume of noise from the street.

'After God made woman,' he was saying, 'he gave her bad blood, which has to flow every month.'

This tiresome affliction might be explained as a perpetual punishment for the primordial incest of the jackal's mating with his mother the earth. The jackal had laid hands on his mother's skirt, which the Nummo had plaited. Until then the fibres of this garment had been light-coloured: afterwards they were purple.

'The red colour of the fibres,' said the old man, 'is that of the menstrual blood which was thus introduced on the earth. But as it is disrespectful to speak of the earth menstruating, it was said that there had been a shower and that the fibres had got damp, and were now being put to dry in the sun.' The consequences of this exposure of blood will be referred to later.

The flow of menstrual blood is the result of the mating of son and mother, a thing forbidden.

In another connection Ogotemmêli compared this blood with that shed in circumcision which is regarded as the payment of a debt to the earth: woman, having been made of earth, owes the earth this debt. God imposed on her a debt of blood, and she has to pay it in the 'water of God's bosom'. Such was the name he gave to menstrual blood out of respect for women.

The earth remits payment of this obligation only during pregnancy and suckling, for the child itself counts as payment.

During these bad periods a woman has to be separated from the community. Contact with her would defile the men, and her presence in places where people live would weaken the altars. She therefore lives on the edge of the village in a round house, symbol of the womb, and only leaves it at night to wash herself. She has to go by a prescribed path to the waters she is allowed to use, for if she goes anywhere else the area would be polluted, the pools would be troubled, and the headwaters of streams would boil.

'Woman is the Nummo's principal prohibition. He desires clean blood, and not this foul flow. He flies at the approach of a woman.'

And this is why the footsteps of a menstruating woman will drain all life away from places where she is forbidden to tread. She herself is, to a certain extent, the seat of disturbances comparable to those she would cause if she broke the rules. The flow from which she suffers is the excess blood ejected from within her by a superabundance of bile; and the bile is produced by the bad words which have entered into her.

'Not only do they unwind the fertilizing spiral of good words,' said Ogotemmêli, 'but they also accumulate in the gall-bladder and exert pressure on the blood.'

It is as if the Nummo, present in the liver and unable to leave it without causing death, expelled from the body the unwanted blood, itself a symbol of the evil word.

'Pregnancy, on the other hand,' continued the old man, 'is the sign that good words have entered and have not been uncoiled from the womb. It is a sign that all is well.'

The Blood of Women and the Threshing of Digitaria

DOGON institutions are full of unsolved enigmas, guarded on all sides by mysteries, correspondences and symbolisms without end.

Much work had been done before the contact with Ogotemmêli had been made. Considerable sections of this civilization had been discovered and studied in detail. The operation of the masks was known; the cult of the dead, certain sacrificial procedures, the Binu and Lébé cults had been analysed. Researches carried out by teams of specialists had indicated certain avenues of approach in the vast field of facts that seemed to converge on a central point, where lay the clue to men's secret motives, the connecting links in the network, the whys and hows in the delicate intricacy of Dogon thought. But this central point appeared at times like an inaccessible rock, at times like an insubstantial mist.

Ogotemmêli had performed the miracle of unveiling this famous central point to which everything was linked; more than that, he had indicated the transverse lines connecting institutions with one another, rite by rite and law by law. In his account, Dogon civilization appeared in the likeness of a huge organism, every part of which had its own function and its own place, as well as contributing to the general development of the whole. In this organism, every institution was integrated; none was outside it; and each in turn, however divergent it might seem and however incompletely understood, was found to fit into a system whose structure revealed itself day by day with increasing clarity and precision.

For years the Nazarene had been faced with the problem of the Digitaria exilis, known in the Western lingua franca as fonio, a graminaceous plant, the cultivation of which differed from that of any other. Fifteen years before he had heard for the first time the trumpets sounding at sunset for the nocturnal threshing.

First came the lowing of a cow-horn in the Ba Diguilou field facing the walls of Dodyou. Its muffled sounds brought the young men out from the streets, each armed with a short stick. Then, in the last light of the setting sun, the troop disappeared in the direction of Gôna, only to return later in the night, heralded from a long way off by the sound of antelope horns with their two piercing notes, which seemed to rise from the depths of the past.

The Digitaria with its tiny round grain is harvested in great haste the moment it is ripe. Its stalk, which reaches up to a man's calf, bends with the slightest breath of wind as soon as it is dry, and the grain falls off. It is necessary therefore to stack it and thresh it quickly, if possible on the same day. In practice this is done in the early hours of the night and, as it has to be done in such a hurry, the young people collect by quarters, and for several weeks thresh the crop of each family-head in succession. The young girls join in this work: they sweep the grain on to the rocks as it falls, and carry the harvest in goatskins on their heads. Some of the stronger ones take turns with the young men in wielding the flail.

In certain respects this work seemed to have peculiar features of its own. During the reaping, which was done by the adult men, assisted by the women who carried away the cut stalks, songs of unusual immodesty were exchanged between the sexes. From time to time the reapers would make a concerted dash towards the edge of the field, or to meet other workers coming to join them, and this lent a special note to the work. But the most extraordinary thing was the way the grain was used; it was forbidden to a great number of men and only the 'impure' could eat it with impunity, ordinary 'living' men could be exempted only in certain circumstances. Priests, on the other hand, could be severely defiled by merely touching it, the one reason why the Hôgon might never be touched was because a person might have fonio dust concealed under his nails and so might contaminate him.

It was no easy thing to induce respectable women to pound

it, and it had to be winnowed outside the walls in places set aside for the purpose. The grain was hard and very small, yielding very little nourishment in return for a great deal of labour. It was said that women would seek divorce to avoid the labour of preparing it. Lastly, it was one of the strictest prohibitions of the Water Spirit.

So the European experienced the liveliest curiosity when Ogotemmêli quietly remarked that Digitaria and menstruation were one and the same thing.

On the previous day, when he had been talking about the blood-debt owed by women, he had said nothing to suggest such a turn in the conversation.

'Fonio and menses,' he said: 'all one!'

The two words in Dogon are from the same root.

But this time, said the European to himself, the connection between the two things will be difficult to make out. For he profoundly mistrusted linguists who simply study words without considering what they represent.

Ogotemmêli was seated, as usual, on his threshold, looking at the ground, his hands crossed behind his head. He never displayed animation in the course of the conversations except to curse the noise of the cocks or to reach an agreement with the men who cried their wares to him. Apparently he felt no emotion of any kind when speaking about these things which lay beyond the bounds of time and thought. In his hands a round pot became a sun with eight spirals of copper, and an old basket a universe. All these things were so familiar to him.

When he spoke of the Digitaria his voice was very low, as was only fitting in reference to a forbidden grain connected with the intimate matters of women's life. The connection, he explained, went a long way back, in time and space alike. It dated from the time spent by the eight ancestors in heaven after their transformation into Water Spirits. In heaven the eight new Nummo had to live apart from one another. But the first ancestor, who later became the smith, used to visit the third, the ancestor of aristocratic people. They thus transgressed the prohibition and, becoming impure in consequence, had to separate themselves from the others. To enable them to live, however, God gave them the eight seeds, including the Digitaria.

It was then that the first ancestor solemnly declared before all the others that he would never eat this small plant; instead he gave it to his friend the third ancestor. One day, however, having eaten all the other seven, he was forced to beg for the food he had despised. In spite of the expostulations of the third ancestor, who reminded him of his solemn pledge, he persisted in eating the grain about which he had spoken evil.

He asked his friend to say nothing of all this, and the two of them swore to keep faith and to support one another about the fonio, and they prayed God to kill the one who broke his oath. But the others suspected what had happened; and, considering that a Nummo, even if impure, ought not to break his word, they were ashamed of him for eating the grain, and put their prohibition on it.

'But why was it put in the granary which came down to earth?'

'It was there for the evil word. It was the evil word.'

The baneful element had to have a place in the new world-system. Ogotemmêli meant that, since the evil word had been uttered more than once, it could not cease to exist or be left out of the world-order; and nothing could better represent it than the Digitaria, concerning which the first ancestor had given the pledge by which he bound himself, and had sworn his false oath.

It was the symbol of the evil word that charms a woman and prevents her conceiving; which unwinds the coils of the good word round her womb and coils itself there in their place. It was the symbol of menstrual blood, sign of the temporary barrenness which these bad coils induce.

This is why the Digitaria was put in the eighth compartment of the granary, which has the rank of the Word and corresponds to the gall-bladder in the body.

But it should be understood that the seed also preserved its beneficent power, the good word which God put into it when he created it. In the same way the gall-bladder is good because it plays a part in the normal functioning of the body, but its contents are baneful when they are excessive.

Another point to be noted was that the rank of the compartment in which the Digitaria was put was that of the womb of the 'chest' type, which engenders perfect twins. The best and the worst were therefore in the same place, and of the same rank. It was right that they should be found together, and that they could be dissociated by the same action—the nocturnal threshing—which attracts the good and wards off evil.

The climax to which this subtlety of thought was tending and the logical development it was to follow, were yet to be seen.

The grain being there in the universe, it had to be used. Furthermore, it had to be used in the very function assigned to it in the matter of procreation. Thus the cultivation and especially the threshing of Digitaria were organized.

At the sound of the trumpets calling them together, all the young men and girls of the quarter are aroused. No one may be absent under penalty of a heavy fine payable to the head of the elders' age-set. The hour of sunset is chosen, partly because all the villagers will then have returned from work outside, and none of those liable for the threshing will be able to shirk it.

The boys start first and go to the scene of activity, where they begin to thresh the stacked crop with their sticks. Standing in a circle, their arms rise and fall in a rhythm of three beats, one third of the group threshing at each beat, so that the sound is like the hoof beats of a galloping horse. As they work they chant verses, some of which recall the obscene songs chanted during the day by men and women reaping together. From time to time a couple of the boys step out to let one of the girls who have arrived on the scene enter the circle.

The songs and the beating of the stalks have the same object. 'Threshing the grain,' said Ogotemméli, 'is savagely beating the force, that is, the words, which it contains; the good words which they have from their creation, come out and mingle with the chanting. The songs thus form a network of sound, in which the beneficent force, the good words extracted by the blows, is caught. The songs are strengthened by it, and will thereby become more apt to coil their fertilizing spirals round the womb, particularly as the meaning of the words is clear and the references to sex are frequent.'

This network of sound receives the beneficent force emanating from the grain, and the girls and boys carry it to the village, thrilling to the sound of the trumpets which, from afar, announce their coming to the men and women who have stayed at home. The good force of the grain comes out and follows the words and songs of the threshers.

The heavy blows of the flails, the songs and the trumpet-calls all work together for the same end, the production of children. Though they are sounds of the night, they have the same good effect on the womb as words spoken by day.

But the European had found what looked to him like a gap in the ordered unfolding of these visible and invisible proceedings. The qualification 'though they are sounds of the night' had not escaped him, and he took the first opportunity to ask slyly, 'Was it not forbidden at ordinary times, except for certain games or rituals, to beat the ground, shout, sing or make noises of any kind by night?'

'Usually,' said Ogotemméli, 'beating the ground is forbidden; anyone who does so is fined, and the fine is used to buy a victim which is sacrificed on the foundation altar of the village. For this altar sanctifies the ground on which it stands, and the blood of the sacrifice restores to the soil the force which it has lost because of the blows. But the blows which the young men give are not ordinary blows.'

He was silent for a moment. He thought he had heard footsteps stopping in the street. When he spoke again, it was in a very low voice.

'Threshing fonio,' he said, 'is like a man cutting the throat of a victim on an altar.'

The European listened holding his breath.

'It is a sacrificial act.'

But how did the blood come into it? By what twisting of symbolism was it possible to arrive at this comparison?

'The eighth seed,' said Ogotemméli, 'is the symbol of bile and of menstrual blood.'

He repeated the explanation he had given at the beginning of the conversation. The seed in the eighth compartment (gall-bladder) of the celestial granary contained both good and evil words. All that was good in it was extracted and mingled with the songs; what was evil stayed in it and fell to the ground with the grain under the blows of the flails like blood dripping from a victim. Just as in a sacrifice there was a separation of the spiritual principles of the victim, so the songs caught the good quality, while the scattered grains retained the evil principle, the menstrual blood representing the debt due to the earth.

'The threshing of the grain,' he said, 'is like a woman giving her blood to the earth to drink.'

So that the symbolic sacrifice of the Digitaria beaten to death had two aspects: in the first place it was paying the fine due for the blows of the flails by night; secondly, it was paying to the earth the original blood-debt of women.

This secondary effect was moreover complementary to the fertilizing action of the good words extracted from the grain. Since the songs, pregnant with these good words, were putting the women in a position to conceive, that is to say, to cease from menstruating, it was necessary to complete the symbolic action by paying the blood debt to the earth beforehand.

Thus the women, during the threshing of the grain, were bathed in an atmosphere appropriate to generation, and all the young men and girls, the hope of the community, had to take their part in this work and those songs, from which they themselves drew strength for future love-making. The fine which they would have had to pay for shirking was intended to punish, not so much the loss of their labour as their failure to profit by the communal revivification of the forces of generation.

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY

The Dual Soul and Circumcision

THE harvest had long been over. The men had beaten down one by one the head-high stalks, had reaped the ears or bunches of grain and allowed the stalks, freed from their burden, to spring up straight again. There was nothing in the fields now but tall yellowing canes. In huge trusses carried on men's heads and in stacks piled on the backs of diminutive donkeys, which they completely swallowed up, the harvested crops had found their way along the streets of the village brushing against the mud walls as they went, to be deposited in heaps in the courtyards and swell the dung-heaps.

There had been a short period, now at the end, when the long dry canes were stripped by naked children, who then ran round the villages brandishing great spears, with leaves fluttering in the wind like pennons. They formed groups of five or six and rounded up the dogs, driving them into blind alleys where they proceeded to beat them, with the result that for a good week afterwards any dog made off, scraping the walls as he went, at the first sight of the smallest child.

These games had now ceased for lack of spears. Trodden underfoot by men and sheep, the broken bits had joined the courtyard dung-heaps. The children meanwhile had taken to a new game of watching for the premature fall of the baobab fruits.

'The uncircumcised,' said Koguem, 'think of nothing but disorder and nuisance.'

The thing was quite simple for him, but for Ogotemmêli the state of childhood was more complex. One realized, as one listened to him, the untiring solicitude of adults for the young, and the feelings of both men and women in presence of what certain sociologists have been pleased to call 'the barbarian invasion', which, by means of new-born children, submerges society every year.

Children are in a sense outside the group. They have their own life, their own paths, their own possessions, their collections of beetles and of grasshoppers with their wings broken by way of precaution. They know the value of a straw, a pebble, a water-lily stalk, a reed. They are naked and unashamed. They are indifferent to danger, but terrified by trifles. They also display a mysterious inclination for death.

'Nothing in them is rigid,' said Ogotemmêli, and he explained at great length that this, like everything else, dated back to the original Creation. 'In order that everything should be well,' he said, 'twin-births should be the rule.'

The source of all disorder was the loneliness of the jackal, God's first-born. Unquestionably the jackal was bad, because his loneliness drove him to his mother. Because of this, in order to avoid loneliness, the Nummo at each child-birth prays to God for the birth of twins. But the Nummo's prayers are not always answered, and that is why he has given two souls to every child at birth.

It had always seemed surprising to the European that the word for 'soul'—to use the traditional European term—was a repetition of a single word, kinndou-kinndou, which should really be translated 'soul-soul'.

The Nummo then creates two twin souls for a single being. He is present at its birth in the inner chamber of the big house between the four supporting posts. The woman sits on a low seat or on an upturned mortar; two older women help her. The child is delivered on the ground, which he must touch with his four limbs.

The Nummo has previously drawn on the ground the outlines of two souls shown in human form. The first outline is female, and the second male. As the new-born child touches the outlines, the two souls take possession of him. His body is one: but the spiritual part of him is two.

As to the origin of these souls, and the limitless source on which the Nummo must draw for these endless gifts, Ogotemmêli had no explanation to offer.

The infant then arrives in the world endowed with two principles of different sexes, and in theory belongs as much to one as to the other; his personal sex is undifferentiated. In practice society recognizes in him by anticipation the sex which he has in appearance. Symbolically, however, his spiritual androgyny is still present.

The mother, after delivery, remains secluded for four (five-day) weeks. She then goes out in the village with the new-born child on her back, and for three weeks she carries in her hand an arrow, if it is a boy, or a knife, if it is a girl, apparently for protection against visible or invisible dangers. Note that these two periods of four and three weeks are the female and the male numbers respectively.

During the first four weeks the woman who has given birth to a girl spins cotton. This is a representation of the chief work which the future woman she has borne will be doing.

The woman who has given birth to a boy also spins, but not so much. The idea is simply to show the fellowship of the male weaver and the female spinner.

The feminine spindle at work indoors and the masculine arrow displayed in the streets by the mother of a son are both intended to demonstrate the celestial origin of humanity.

'When a girl is born,' said Ogotemmêli, 'the mother takes her spindle in her hand as a reminder that the granary which came down from heaven was attached to a spindle planted in the sky. The thread she winds is that which was unrolled in the descent.'

'As for the mother of a boy, the arrow she carries in her hand is the arrow which the smith held to defend himself on his journey through space. But the two things have the same meaning, for the smith's arrows were pointed spindles, and the one he shot into the granary became the axis, of which the granary itself was the huge-spindle-whorl.'

Thus the actions and objects which surround a birth recall the reorganization of the world; they signify the integration of the new-born child into the system revealed by the smith and by the seventh Nummo. They are a manifestation of human nature, which is made for work.

'But what about twin-births?' said the European.

This far-reaching question demanded a lengthy reply, which Ogotemmêli reserved for another occasion. Later he would deal with the fundamental cult of twins.

The European gathered, however, that when twins were born, each was given two souls, and the same customs were observed as in the case of single births; but there was one important difference: though the period of seclusion was the same, the period of the mother's going out 'armed' was extended to four weeks, making eight weeks in all before she resumed normal life.

Equipped with its two souls, the child follows its destiny, but during its early years its personality shows signs of instability. In so far as the child retains the prepuce or the clitoris—characteristics of the sex opposite to its own apparent sex—its masculinity and femininity are equally potent. It is not right, therefore, to compare an uncircumcised boy to a woman: he is, like an unexcised girl, both male and female. If this uncertainty as to his sex were to continue, he would never have any inclination for procreation.

The clitoris of the girl is in fact a symbolic twin, a male makeshift with which she cannot reproduce herself, and which, on the contrary, will prevent her from mating with a man. Just as God saw the earth's organ rise against him, so a man who tried to mate with an unexcised woman would be frustrated by opposition from an organ claiming to be his equal.

Nor can the individual act normally under the double influence of the two principles: it is essential that one of the two should decisively take first place. The child cannot behave like a responsible being, nor can he be treated as such until he has been circumcised.

He cannot, for example, be given his full title, or establish a cult, or take the remedies which the healers give against disease, or use amulets. All these things indeed presuppose the traffic of forces too violent for a being whose soul is not yet stabilized. But the duality of the individual is not the only cause of his instability; God having made him of dust, man has contracted a debt to the earth, which he must pay in blood. He has to offer himself as a sacrifice on the earth from which he was made: the shedding of blood in circumcision, said the blind man, is like the offering of a victim on the altar, and it is the earth that drinks the blood.

Till this account is settled, the soul is not stable, the individual does not truly possess it. From birth the child is, as it were, attached to the earth by a link called 'The thread of God', which grows from the prepuce or clitoris and enters the soil.

This link is established at the moment when the new-born child touches the ground; it is a link of blood. It moves with the child and enters the soil at his feet; at circumcision it is severed.

'Who then is the earth?'

Ogotemméli did not give a direct answer.

'Blood is shed,' he said, 'in order to return to the earth what has been lent. But it is not the earth only that receives its due. The Nummo comes to drink the blood and he calls Lébé, who follows him and also comes to drink. But the sacrifice is not offered to them; it is made for the earth and for everything that is of the earth, including therefore the first pair made by God.'

'But the Nummo? And Lébé?'

'The place where the old man was (that is to say, the grave of Lébé), the soil from which God formed Man, Lébé rising from the dead in the earth—all these three things are one.'

The principle which Ogotemméli was proclaiming was the unity of the universe. The tomb of resurrection was earth: man is earth: the old man raised from the dead was of earth, and it was into the earth that he was thrust alive. Lastly, the one who raised him from the dead, himself dead and buried beneath the smithy, came to life again in the earth.

'But why wound man in his sexual organ?'

'Because in the prepuce or the clitoris resides the soul which must depart; also, because it is by means of the sexual organ that the foetus originates.'

In the womb, he explained, the nucleus of life is a sex-organ, to which a head becomes attached, the body developing afterwards. The sexual organ is the high altar of man's foundation. Thus God does for every being what he did at the first creation; he erects the 'altar' of man just as the founder of a village erects a foundation altar for the village.

But it is not only the body that is of earth. Some say that God formed souls like bodies, and it is on the ground that the outline of the soul is drawn at birth. It seems also that the idea of a debt to be paid is associated with the notion of an inauspicious force taken up by the individual together with his earthly condition. This element has to be got rid of at the end of childhood, and sent back to the place whence it came.

There are, therefore, a number of different reasons for the practices of circumcision and excision: the need to rid the child of an evil force; the need for him to pay a blood-debt, and to pay it once and for all in terms of sex; to these may be added the feeling that, for the sake of fellowship, a man, like a woman, should suffer in his sex.

Preparations for the operation begin from the time of the child's birth and, as it is a question of stabilizing the soul, the family altars are used to keep it as near as possible to the child.

In the eighth week after the birth, the arrow which the mother of a boy carried is put on the altar of the nuclear family. The father cuts the throat of a victim with the words: 'Oh God! Receive this blood and bring forth from it the fortune of my son!'

From this time on the souls of the ancestors, who have come to the altar to drink, help the child to be spiritually assimilated into the family, and impart to him a portion of their strength by infusing it into the victim's liver, which the child is given to taste.

On the day before the circumcision, prayer is again offered before the altar for the stabilization of the soul; and at the moment when the prepuce is cut, the male soul transfers itself to the altar, and remains there during the whole period of seclusion. When the child again approaches the altar after the wound has healed, another victim is sacrificed for him, and he eats the liver; at this moment his soul returns to him.

The first effect, therefore, of circumcision is an outrush of spiritual force; on the one hand the severed prepuce, seat of the female soul, is transformed invisibly into the lizard called 'Sun'. The child is thus freed from the element of femininity. On the other hand his male soul, like that of a victim, leaves his body and takes up its abode in the family altar. Throughout the period of seclusion, which the circumcised boy has to undergo, he is without any element of spirituality, and that which he is to receive again waits meanwhile with the dead. The circumcised boy is himself as one who is dead.

'When the circumcised boy recovers his soul from the family altar, is he completely rid of the female soul, which has departed with the lizard?'

'No!' said Ogotemmêli. 'He still has its shadow, which is like a diminished female soul and which he shares with the lizard. The shadow is stupid, whereas the soul is intelligent.'

Once more the Dogon speculative philosophy revealed itself as a series of actions and compensating reactions side by side.

'The "Sun" lizard,' continued Ogotemmêli, 'is the symbol of the female prepuce surrounding the male penis. Its short tail resembles the penis. It is red in colour, which is why it hides from the light, so as not to be compared with it.' This lizard, in fact, lives in the earth, and is seldom to be seen.

'The lizard,' he said, 'is female; but the back of its body is like a penis. It is a prepuce, but is also like a penis with the prepuce drawn back. Surrounded by this female called "Sun" and round and red like that luminary, which is itself female, the penis ends by acquiring femininity.'

'What is the meaning of the sistrum made of pieces of calabash, which the circumcised person wears during the period of seclusion?'

The sistrum is made of a stick or wand, on which are threaded circular slices of calabash, symbol of femininity, with jagged edges. Children shake them to scare away evil spirits and women.

'The stick of the sistrum,' said Ogotemmêli, 'is the sex organ without the prepuce. The rounds of calabash, in number equal to the number of circumcised boys, represent the prepuces of the group. The boy shakes the sistrum with one hand; in the other hand he holds a walking-stick decorated with a helix of eight coils cut in the bark. The stick is the Water Spirit, who guides his footsteps: the helix is a reminder of the spiral coiled and uncoiled round the sun.'

So the child holds in his hands femininity, water, and light.

Personal Altars

THE camp was infested by animals. At night unknown marauders stirred forgotten dishes, overthrew gates, and fled at the appearance of shadows larger than their own. It might well be that these disturbances were not due to any ordinary animals; but nothing could be done about it. In addition there were internal troubles, the remedy for which was known but never applied.

'If you have been given a cock as a present,' grumbled the European, 'eat it the same day! Or cover it up with a mat with a weight on top! Otherwise it will wake you at four o'clock in the morning.'

Every night for a week past, a cock with a particularly piercing crow had triumphantly defied all obstacles and, long before dawn, would flap its wings outside the walls and fences, with which it was surrounded every evening.

'It is worse,' said the European, 'than Doneyrou's ram.'

The ram, a present from Doneyrou, the Canton Chief, was a tempestuous character. When loosed in the courtyard, he had made straight for the wall of the enclosure, regardless of the rest of the world; then he backed a few paces in a straight line and, with one bound, launched himself in a relentless charge. Taking advantage of a projection in the mud wall, he had cleared it, not as a horse jumps, but like a panther. He had then disappeared, followed by two men shouting and waving their arms and a mob of children who asked for nothing better.

There could be no question of following up this whirlwind. It was not till the evening, the time when all nature subsides into peace, that the fleece and horns appeared again at the end of a rope.

'First he ate the millet at Bâ Biguilou, which is cultivated by the Hogon's future successor. Then he tried Ogo Digou, which belongs to the Hogon himself. He ate the millet. Then he went into Dodyou Oreil, and went straight to Ongnonlou's place, and worried and killed a lamb. He has terrorized Dodyou Oreil all day. Here he is!'

It might have been supposed that the animal would be cut in pieces then and there, but nothing of the sort happened. Human inertia continued to let him out again each morning with the same clamour of shouts and yells.

There had also been minor incidents caused by frogs. There was one who hid in a shoe and another in a soap-dish, who showed themselves in response to a beckoning finger.

There were certain recesses where it was necessary to walk carefully and without a sound so that a couple of field-mice, as small as a thumb, could make their nest in the pocket of a coat. While they were away, the bits of grass and thread could be removed to a sock hanging up on the same spot; but soon afterwards they were back again in the coat-pocket.

'Field-mice,' said Ogotemméli on being informed of these incidents, 'like clothing. They also make nests in saddle-bags and hanging pots.'

He knew all about their habits and their avoidances, as he did about all birds and animals wild or tame. He brought to light an unknown world, which he was very ready to talk about, having been a hunter for many years.

The Nazarene would have liked to follow him into this world of the bush, where each animal and plant has its part to play, its fears and its passions. But time pressed; it was necessary to follow the main lines of the Ogotemmélian philosophy, and leave for subsequent enquiries the development of institutions.

In the weather-worn niches in the façade of the house there were placed, among a few wretched objects, clods of earth heaped on flat stones. In some of these a small cup-shaped hollow had been made; others had iron hooks or small pieces of forked or notched wood stuck in them. They were the furniture of the personal altars of Ogotemméli's family. Their number showed that he had had many children, and that, contrary to the usual custom, he had not destroyed their things when they were dead.

Ogotemméli had often mentioned these personal altars, and the European was well acquainted with them; each individual has two; the altar of the skull and the altar of the body. The former is made by the father a few days before the boy leaves for the circumcision enclosure. The moulded clod is placed against the boy's head and is consecrated by a libation of millet-gruel while the following prayer is said:

The child is going into the bush,
Altar, receive your water and wood!
Let not the good power depart with the blood!
Let the evil power depart!

The altar is then sprinkled with the blood of a cock or hen, whose throat is cut for the occasion. The liver and heart are taken from the birds and grilled; a portion is put aside and thrown on the clod of earth, while the rest is eaten by the boy.

In the case of a girl, the altar of the head is set up by the father in his own house, when the girl leaves it to go and live with her husband.

The altar of the body is made of a clod of earth with which are mixed parings of nails, eye-lashes, hair, and a few drops of blood taken from the initiate. The father generally consecrates it before the other altar, when the body of the boy needs strengthening as a result of his experiences, or when the girl at puberty is marriageable.

At first sight these two altars constitute a sort of external reserve of personality, on which the individual can draw, and which can be increased by sacrifices and libations. For the ordinary Dogon, sacrifice on his altar of the head is tantamount to sacrificing on his own head, the seat of thought and volition and the most important part of his body.

'When the head is well,' the saying goes, 'the rest is all right.'

Accordingly the Dogon frequently sacrifice on these altars at regular intervals corresponding in part to the religious cycle of the community, but also when the occasion requires it. Illness, defilement caused by transgressing a prohibition, loss of strength, for example by procreation, are all counteracted by the life-giving flow released at the altars by the sprinkling of blood which, incidentally, benefits the sacrificer who, in a sense, communicates with himself by eating the victim he sacrifices.

But this arrangement, which is accepted by the ordinary Dogon, was incomprehensible to the European. How could one offer a sacrifice to oneself? If one detached a part of oneself and made an altar of it, the sacrifice did not attract force of any kind. There was, of course, the force of the victim; but a meal of roast fowl would have the same effect, and would as surely increase the strength of the sacrificer.

Accordingly he decided to ask Ogotemméli the question which usually arose in this kind of enquiry:

'Who comes to drink the blood of a sacrifice offered on altars of the head or the body?'

This question, which seemed harmless enough, had been the most difficult question to frame in the whole of his ethnological career. For it is necessary to consider carefully the form of a question if it is to yield the information desired. It was in fact such a simple question that no one had ever thought of asking it.

The first time he had asked this question, it had simply put his informant to flight; he was a timid man, terrified of evoking the invisible. Later it had been more successful, and the investigator was able to fling it like a firebrand into the jumble of reticences, falsehoods, and concealments presented to him by his informants. This question produced only two responses: flight or the truth.

For Ogotemméli, the willing instructor of a European, the question was a perfectly natural one.

'When a victim's throat is cut on a personal altar,' he said, 'there are two who come to drink the blood—the first man created by God and Lébé.'

He went on to say that in a sense the first man and the dead and risen Lébé were one and the same person. But the European intended to plumb the meaning of this subtlety later. 'Why,' he asked, 'is one the head and the other the body?'

'When a victim is sacrificed on an altar of the head,' was the answer, 'it is the force of the first man's skull and of Lébé's skull which passes back up the blood and enters the liver. If the sacrifice is offered on an altar of the body, it is the force of the first man's body and of Lébé's body which fills the liver eaten by the sacrificer.'

Then the two altars were set up in the name of the first man and of Lébé, and not only in the name of the beneficiary.

'What,' said the European, 'is the formula uttered at the consecration?'

'In making the altar of the head,' said Ogotemméli, 'and in touching the child's forehead with it, the father asks for the old man's help.'

'What old man?'

'The first man created, and also Lébé.'

Ogotemméli repeated his assertion as to the identity of the two, and quoted the words of the consecration formula: 'Ho! Skull of the old man, come and help!'

For the altar of the body the rite was similar, but the appeal was no longer addressed to the skull:

'Ho! Old man's body, come and help!'

The European's question had been completely answered. But he was only one step nearer to enlightenment. Why the separation of skull and body? Why these personal altars, when the great public altars regularly received at the prescribed dates the libations and blood sacrifices of the community?

'When these altars are modelled,' said Ogotemméli, 'the story of Lébé is recalled.'

He meant the resurrection of Lébé and his being ejected by the seventh Nummo in the form of the outline of stones.

The altar of the head is made separately from the altar of the body, because in the grave of the old man one stone was found in the place of the skull, and the eight stones and the other smaller ones in the place of the skeleton.

The stone in the place of the head was separate from the others and ranked as No. 9, which is the number of chieftainship; and so the altar of the head is made separately. Copper is added to it also to recall the Nummo's excretion after swallowing the old man.

But there was another complication. Stone No. 9, which the Nummo had cast up in the place of the skull, had had a special destiny of its own. It had become the emblem of the function of the Hogon, priest of the cult of Lébé. Symbolically, therefore, the altar of the head could represent Lébé. But the stones of the joints, which had outlined the body of the risen Lébé, also had their own destiny. They had become emblems of the functions of the priests of the Binu.

'The altar of the head is Lébé,' said Ogotemméli, 'and the altar of the body represents the Binu.'

So in this cult of self-help, every man had within his reach and for his private use a religious system of Lébé and the Binu, representing in miniature the world-system thrown up in the tomb of the primal field. He had, in short, a representation of the tomb itself in the form of the two clods of earth heaped on flat stones. Without upsetting the social system, or disturbing the serenity of the great altars erected in the sanctuaries, he could take action to protect his own modest interests, manipulate beneficent forces in private, and promote the working of the cosmos, all with his feet in the dung-heap of his own courtyard.

FIG. 10. Genealogy of the Dogon people

But there was even more to it than this. In the light of certain allusions made in earlier conversations, the Nazarene could understand why the person concerned introduced nails and hairs into the composition of his altars, and why he touched one of them with his forehead. If the altar of the head represented the skull of the first man, of Lébé, and of the man of today, and if the altar of the body represented the bodies of all three, that must mean that one identical nature belonged to the first created man, the first dead man restored to life, and the man of the present day. That was why an altar dedicated to the first two contained the nails, eye-lashes and hair of the third. When the sacrificer consumed the victim immolated on a part of himself, he was communicating, in religious reality, with the first human work of God. He was communicating also with the ancestor restored to life as a celestial power, whose body had provided the design of the new order of things. In other words, he was assimilating the life-force of both, and thereby, in his private life and on his own behalf, ensuring the course of this world's destiny.

Thus, it was possible to see how, in the authoritative and detailed Dogon economy, the whole is present in every part, how the great national cults can be fragmented into particles fine as dust the individual pieties, each of which, by the play of symbols, embraced the whole immensity of the ordered world of men.

Appearance of Death

DEATH had not yet figured in the conversations with Ogotem-méli. All the mythical events relating to the revelation of the three reorganizing Words had taken place while men were still immortal. The death of Lébé, the death of the seventh Nummo had been no more than artifices of Divine Providence; they wore the appearance of death only, and the double resurrection had restored the normal course of things.

For many years past the team of Europeans had known the myths which tell of the entry of Death into the world and the operation of institutions which had had to meet that tragic development. But there was still much that was obscure in the information they had gathered.

The European knew that all events were linked together in the unfolding of universal history, and that the physical end of man existed in germ from the beginning; it was implicit in the fibres out of which the Water Spirit had made a skirt for his mother, the earth.

One notable myth concerned the adventures of the fibres throughout the world. Reddened by the menstrual blood which flowed after the incestuous union of the earth with her son the jackal, they were put to dry on the anthill. The red colour was so bright that a passer-by seeing them exclaimed:

'Is it the sun? Is it fire? What an astonishing thing!'

A voice from the anthill replied:

'It is not the sun, it is not fire, it is something new.'

Time passed, and the fibres were stolen and put to human use. A woman got hold of them, put them on, spread terror all around her, and reigned as a queen, thanks to this striking adornment which no one had ever seen before. In the end the men took them from her, dressed themselves in the royal garment and prohibited its use by women, with a few exceptions. All the young men danced wearing red fibres, and the women had to content themselves with admiring them.

But the possession of these stolen goods, acquired by force, carried with it its own penalty; those who had robbed the woman had concealed their exploit from the oldest man, thus breaking the tradition of respect and submission due to their natural Chief. The old man, having reached the term of his human life, had, like the ancients, been changed into a Nummo Spirit; but, in accordance with the rule, he had not gone up to heaven and had continued his earthly life in the form of a great serpent. One day when the young men had dressed themselves in their fibres, which they kept hidden in caves, and were on their way to the village, the serpent met them and barred the way. Angry at having been flouted, he violently reproached them, speaking in the Dogon language so that they could understand; and this was the cause of his death. For, since he no longer possessed human form, the language of which was the third revealed Word, he ought to have used the language proper to spirits, into whose world he had come, that is to say, the first Word. By speaking to the men in language that was familiar to them, he was transgressing a prohibition, and cutting himself off from the superhuman world, in which he was now an impure element, and so could no longer live there. It was equally impossible for him to return to the world of men. Accordingly he died there and then.

His death was therefore the result of infringing a prohibition, itself caused by the breaking of a rule. This was something universally recognized; all religions ascribe the loss of immortality to a sin involving a breach of order. But, for the Dogon, how exactly had the disaster come about? What happened to the forces embodied in the serpent-ancestor? What had taken their place?

'The fibres worn by the young men were dry,' said Ogotemméli.

The old man's explanations often began with an enigmatic remark, which was the starting point for a logical development from known principles.

'They were the symbol of the fibres reddened by the blood that followed the earth's incest, which had been put on the anthill to dry in the sun. But they were also the symbol of the fibres moistened at the beginning by the Nummo, which refresh the wombs of women. It was wrong therefore to expose them to heat and light, for they should always be moist to protect the genitalia and encourage procreation.'

He emphasized the need for moisture.

'Damp fibres are refreshing; they ought not to dry. Dry fibres make a woman dry—that is to say, barren.'

The European wondered where the old man's argument was leading, and how he would arrive at the problem of Death.

'Nowadays,' the old man went on, 'whenever a man puts on a fibre skirt to dance in a public place, he moistens it with a little water before tying it round him, saying as he does so: "The long words of men!" This was intended to show that an ancient saying of the ancestors was being followed and a very old custom observed.

'Putting water on the dance-skirt is good for women: it is like moistening their genitalia to help them bear children.'

Where men were concerned the practice had further significance; they were not merely demonstrating an essential condition of procreation.

'When men wear the fibre skirts, it is as if they were dressing up as women, for this dress represents the female sexual parts; furthermore, when dressed like this they represent, not women in general, but pregnant women; it is as if they were moist with the moisture of the female sexual organ.'

Ogotemméli seemed to attach some importance to convincing the European of the need for moisture.

'When put in the sun, the fibres became hot and dry. They were thought to be the sun or fire. They no longer contained water, for the sun had drunk it all up. But they still had a certain amount of force, thirsty and ready to attract and absorb moisture.'

They represented, so to say, absence of life and desire for life. But they were impure because of their colour which was due to menstrual blood, and no doubt they could not fail to absorb impurity, the force released by the infringement of prohibitions.

'When the old man-serpent abused the young men, the fibres drank in his words; they drank in the breath which came to them and because of them, for they were the occasion of the reprimand.'

What little force remained in the fibres was a small quantity of water, that is to say, of the Nummo.

'As there was a little water left, the Nummo drank the force of the old man. He drank the old man's blood. This force, this blood, came with the old man's words which passed from his mouth into the fibres.'

This was how the serpent died, dried by the fibres and drunk by the Nummo.

Just as the earth's moisture is drunk by the sun, so that of the old man was absorbed by the dance-skirts. It was as if the moisture of the words had been breathed in by the sun from the fibres.

The serpent lay across the path dead. The young men were frightened and fled to the village, from which they returned with the elders. It was decided to take the carcase to a cave, and to wrap it in the fibres which had been the cause of its death. But this was only an apparent solution, though valid for appearances; it did not regulate the invisible. The soul of the old man left the dead body, taking with it what remained of its strength. As putrefaction proceeded, the spiritual principles liberated sought an abode. They found it in the person of a pregnant woman who, for some obscure reason, was wearing a red skirt like those in which the body of the serpent was wrapped. The woman gave birth to a child, who was red like the fibres and spotted like the reptile, and did not become normal until he had been dedicated to the ancestor who had vanished as a result of human disobedience.

The dedication took place in the course of a long period of seclusion which the adolescent child underwent. For the ceremony a great log of wood was cut to the shape of a reptile and painted the colours of the dead serpent, and to this the spiritual principles, for which the child could no longer provide a home, were attracted by a suitable sacrifice. The child himself was attached to the cult which the community instituted in honour of the ancestor.

These events and actions produced great consequences. The European pondered long over them, while Ogotemméli was absorbed in the serious business of taking tobacco.

With the death of the ancestor, prelude to the death of men, came the obligation laid on the living to provide a habitation for the souls and liberated forces of all who came to die. They also had to find among themselves a child to be responsible for the cult that was established in every case. The world of the dead was now to be organized in all its complexity. It was to lay a heavy burden on the living; it gave the first impulse to art, through the carving of wooden images representing the dead person, and later of animal masks, for animals also perished, killed by the hands of men; it gave rise to personal anxieties by reason of the increasingly intricate network of rules and prohibitions in which everyone was involved. It might be said that the series of errors and offences which had resulted in death had introduced a new order of things, in which the individual, and no longer simply the group, had a part to play. While the general responsibilities common to human nature remained, those offences, in which might be recognized the first notions of sin, imposed on mankind the isolation of the individual, caused endless divisions in society, and reduced to the measure of each man's capacity the burden of expiation or of maintaining the new order.

It was no part of the European's intentions to discuss again in detail the numerous rituals, attitudes, and representations arising from man's loss of immortality. The institutions relating to the dead were well known; but in every case the question of origin arose, and only a man like Ogotemméli could throw light on that.

One of these institutions demanded attention on account of its widespread occurrence and imposing ceremonial. This was a festival celebrated every sixty years by the entire population, and which, from year to year over a long period, affected in turn every part of the Dogon country. This itinerant ritual, which was called Sigui, started from the Yugo region.

The whole area of cliffs and plateau, from north-east to south-west, participated. It was the occasion of long days of dancing and ritual performances. The collection of the food-stuffs consumed demanded months of effort. Every family in the territory whose turn it was to demonstrate, lived for a long period beforehand in a state of feverish anxiety.

Two essential features of the festival are the shaping of a long wooden serpent out of a single tree-trunk—one of those brought back by the European for the Musées de France measured ten metres—and the drinking of millet beer, the drinkers sitting on a special kind of seat called 'mask-seats', which are not used on any other occasion.

The meaning of the shaped log was clear. It was intended to provide a new resting-place for the spiritual principles of the first dead man, which were still present in the world of men. The wood of the first 'Great Mask' cut by the ancients was of course worn out, and the man appointed to care for it was dead. These two developments threatened the peace of the human race. The spirit of the ancestor needed another home, and his cult required a new initiate. A child had therefore been chosen from among the descendants of the one who had been born with the mark of the dead ancestor. The new child was initiated, together with a number of companions, in the cave where the Great Mask had been put. He was dedicated, by a blood-sacrifice, to the new log, which, to the accompaniment of suitable rites and prayers, had replaced the old one.

The same procedure had been followed every sixty years; and in old villages might be seen, ranged at the back of caves, the tall poles of the past sixty-year periods, the more recent ones still bearing traces of colour, while the older ones were falling into decay and crumbled into dust at a touch.

But, if the periodic carving of the mask and consecration of new initiates could be explained, it was not so with the beer-drinking, in which all the males of the district participated, ranked according to age and sitting on seats of an unusual shape. The actual drinking no doubt had a mystical meaning; it was a general communion, shared by the new Great Mask, dripping with libations, and the whole male population, from the wizened elder to the infant born that very day. The whole community was consecrated to the mask and thereby assumed responsibility both for the expiation of the offence against the ancestor and for the cult of the new home for his spirit.

On the other hand, there had never been any explanation of the meaning of the 'mask-seat', a sort of short crutch in the form of a Y, with the two branches wide apart, often nearly horizontal, thinned down and notched at the edges. The communion was not valid unless the communicant was sitting on this seat, which had been previously consecrated by a special libation.

'The mask-seat,' said Ogotemmêli, 'represents the Water Spirit.'

Once again it was necessary to go back into the remote mythical past.

Before his transformation into a Nummo the ancestor who was the first to undergo death, had had a long-standing dispute with a man of his own age-class about precedence. Each wished to take precedence of the other, and each claimed to be the stronger.

Both belonged to the fifth family, which is now settled at Yugo. When the time came for their transformation they had still not been reconciled and, after being transformed into serpents, they renewed the quarrel, each crying in the language of the Spirits 'It is I who am the stronger!' Eventually, after a struggle, the first serpent killed the other and ate him.

It was at that time that the incident with the young men took place, and the serpent died in a state of defilement. The enemy he had swallowed, and who was only apparently dead, now came out of the body of the victor. As, however, he had been in contact with the carcase and had risen from a dead boy, he too perished from the contagion. But his death could not be compared to that of the other. His conqueror had died impure; he himself died without being defiled, but merely from contagion, as was subsequently to be the case with the majority of men. His skeleton was picked up, rough-cast and made into an altar. A copy of it can be seen, said Ogotemmêli, beyond the Samtigou field near the new village of Go.

The European knew this high red landmark, on which years before he had seen an animal spread-eagled, sacrificed, opened and stripped by birds of prey. For months he had tried to find some way of breaking through the wall of silence erected by the Sangabinou family, the guardians of the mystery. Disconnected scraps of irrelevant information had been the sole reward of his persistence. The Sangabinou elders, bristling and showing their teeth, or turning their backs and shutting their eyes, had closed their ranks in defence of their celebrated altar with its coating of coagulated blood.

The Sangabinou in this part of the country were a minority group of the Aru tribe. They claimed to be the oldest members of it, which was in fact the truth. For centuries they had owned the village of Go, which however they had abandoned for some decades in order to build a new village on the site. They showed with pride a heap of stones, not far from their council shelter, which they said was the oldest altar in the country and had been erected by the Tellem, the former inhabitants who had been peacefully edged out by the Dogon.

'This altar,' said Ogotemmêli, 'comes to them from Yugo, where there is the original altar built in the olden time.'

It was like a tomb. Highly important as it was for the whole Dogon people, it was nevertheless entrusted to a single family. But there was another object symbolizing the ancestor, an effigy of which belonged to participants in the Sigui festival. This was an iron stake, to the top of which a small tongue, like a slice of melon with blunt points, was attached at its centre point.

'The stake,' said Ogotemmêli, 'is the lower part of the Nummo's body in his reptilian form. The flat iron cross-piece represents his arms slightly raised. The head is missing.'

'But did not the ancestor die in the form of a serpent?'

'Yes! Both the enemy ancestors died in the form of serpents. But that was their visible form. Their real form was the invisible form of Nummo Spirits.'

'If they both had the same invisible form, why shape a log of wood for the first and a mask-seat for the second?'

'The first died defiled through having infringed the linguistic taboo. So he was represented in the earthly form of a serpent. The other only died by contagion. Moreover it was he who took precedence over the other, because he was the older. Consequently he is nearer than the first to the celestial form of Nummo; and so in the iron stake he has been given the form of a Nummo without a head.'

'But what about his head?'

'It was not forged because the stake is a seat, and one does not sit on the head of an old man. All wooden seats are made after the pattern of the iron one.'

'Why this form of seat?'

'When a man drinks the Sigui beer sitting on the seat, he is the old man himself. It is as if the ancestor was there. The seat is the body, and the man sitting on it is the head of the dead Nummo. Each is a resurrection of the old man.'

Ogotemmêli seemed tired; he had caught cold the previous night having slept on the rock without a covering. From time to time his voice was indistinct. But he continued:

'The wife of the ancestor of the seat was the same woman who discovered the red fibres. That is another reason why this ancestor was more important than the other. At the end of her earthly life this woman too transformed herself into a Nummo Spirit like all the notable old men. Her symbol is the calabash which every man takes with him during the Sigui Festival, and from which he drinks his beer.'

So, at the celebration of this recurrent ritual, the drinkers, who danced the serpentine movement of the Spirits, were honouring in the new great log the ancestor who had been victorious in the quarrel. They brandished in their hands the wooden seat and the calabash—the calabash-woman, in which they were to drink the life-giving liquor, and the ancestor of the seat, whose head they represented. In their representation of the two dead ancestors they were miming their resurrection.

Returning by the path between the two Ogols, the Nazarene passed in front of the baobab, in whose branches the Great Mask had been set up during the Sigui Festival. He walked across the open spaces where the dancing and the communion drinking had brought the whole male population together. He was lost in thought as he went.

He had long since recognized the significance of this great peripatetic ritual, celebrated by each region in turn. But he had only now discovered the symbolism of the mask-seat that suddenly illuminated the whole of a religious system, poised between life and death and built upon the constant interaction between one and the other.

On the side of life there had been an alliance, an intimate union between two beings, one heavenly and one human, in which one fed on the other. Both had risen from an apparent death and, one by means of the other, distinct in essence but merged one with the other, had shown forth a new world-order. Today both inspired a cult of life and appeared in material form on the sanctuaries; the one, eaten in the form of a man and regurgitated as a figure outlined in stones, could be seen as the sinuous serpent modelled in the sun-dried mud of façades, living and drinking the blood and gruel of sacrifices. He was Lébé, the shining one, gliding through the lanes by night, intent on his task of spiritual support.

The other, as an anvil, its two arms forming a cross and its head pointing to heaven, crowned the pediments; he also lived and caught in his curved embrace the fertilizing rains. He was nearer to heaven than the one who had been eaten as a human body.

On the side of death there had been the combat between two spirits of the same family, in which one had eaten the other. One, victorious in the struggle, had died in a state of impurity and had been represented in his serpent form by a great wooden pole, shaped afresh every sixty years. The other, being of more heavenly form, had emerged alive from the maw of his conqueror, only to die at once. He was represented in the same form as the iron crook on the pediments of the sanctuaries of life, with a body and two arms but no head. This head was represented every sixty years by man himself drinking the beer of the cult of the dead.

In the world of the dead lay an answer to the world of the living.

TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY

The Cult of the Dead Fermented Liquors The Living Dead

EVERY market-day drunken men reeled along the streets and grunted meaningless phrases over the walls. Most of them were elderly men, and no one took exception to their behaviour or to their remarks. On the contrary they seemed to be regarded with a certain respect not unmixed with apprehension.

When asked, the Dogon replied that it was unseemly for young people to drink too much millet beer, but that there was no objection to grown-up people, and especially the old, coming home drunk from the market or from family drinking-parties. In any case no one ever abused a man who was under the influence of drink, even when he used rude words, which was frequently the case.

Observing signs of amusement on the faces of the bystanders, the European was moved to ask what the drunkards were saying.

'What do people say when they have drunk too much beer?' was the answer, 'why, they say: "The dead are dying of thirst".'

That seemed like a joke. On the other hand, it was not easy to see why the remark should have been regarded as a great insult if it had been made by someone who was sober.

But in fact the matter concerned nothing less than the cult of the ancestors and the attitude to it of the drinkers of alcoholic drinks.

There was, besides, much to be said about the drink itself. In rituals it was reserved for things connected with the dead, 'things', as they were called, 'of the bush'. Ancestors on the other hand, being regarded as living beings, were given blood and millet-gruel. Altars were never deliberately sprinkled with beer.

'If the altars were given beer,' said Ogotemmêli, 'the ancestors would get drunk, for they are living persons. It can only be given to altars dedicated to "Impures", who are living dead.'

This regulation implied far-reaching explanations and Ogotemmêli supplied them all. The European, accustomed as he was to the old man's logic, the rigid ordering of his argument and his scrupulous distinctions, could not help being astonished at the closely-knit system of thought displayed before him every day.

But he wanted to know the underlying meaning of the drunkards' insulting words: 'The dead are dying of thirst'.

He knew that a man's soul often leaves him long before his death, and returns only at the critical moment to stay in the dead man's house during the period of mourning, which is ended by a funeral rite that causes the soul to depart, thereby releasing the family and the community from the prohibitions imposed on them. Great quantities of food and drink are provided, and masks are made. Generally speaking, the scale of the ritual depends on the age and standing of the deceased. The relatives are expected to offer the mourners provisions in proportion to the number of mourning ceremonies of the same kind that the dead man had celebrated.

The most important part of the ceremony is a masked dance on the flat roof of the dead man's house. On the small rectangle of earth, which symbolizes the heavenly places, the whole series of masks, representing the world of animals and men, social functions, crafts, and neighbouring peoples, draws the soul of the dead man into the pattern of its action and leads it away beyond the domain of earth.

Some days later other rites sever the last bonds of the deceased who, from being one of the dead, now passes into the category of ancestors as soon as the child whom he has designated as the inheritor of his life-force has set up the altar-pot, from which he will henceforth come to drink.

All these meticulously regulated ceremonies are designed to put an end to the unstable situation of the dead man who, as defunctus in the literal sense of the word, has ceased to function, has done with life, and is now wandering uncertainly in the unknown. It is to the advantage of the community to carry out these rituals within the prescribed periods in order to ensure peace and religious order, but it does not always do so; in fact families have to incur heavy expenses in organizing the end of mourning.

'Families always wait,' said Ogotemmêli, 'till there are several dead, before they celebrate the end of mourning and set up the altar-pots.'

In this way the expense is shared, but as a result there may be an increasing number of unsatisfied dead, whose condition is unstable, and who linger in the world of the living uncertain and mistrustful.

'When left like this in suspense,' said Ogotemmêli, 'the dead lose patience and cause disorder in the villages.'

By 'disorder' he meant a state of moral insecurity in the families concerned which hindered the normal course of life.

'The Dogon,' he went on, 'is much concerned about this matter of the erection of altars.'

He is torn between his desire to satisfy the dead, and the need to extricate himself as best he can from the difficulties caused by the funeral expenses.

But the annoyance caused by this dilemma was not enough to explain either the individual or the general uneasiness. Among the Dogon, personal feelings in matters of religion are almost always the result of external factors. The first point to establish was the reason for this latent discontent on the part of the unstable dead.

'The dead,' said Ogotemmêli, 'are impure from the fact of their death.'

There was, so to speak, an explosion of the individual's spiritual forces at death. The soul was separated from the life-force, whose will and consciousness it was; the vital force itself was split up. It was in fact a composite entity, made up of portions of the forces of its genitors, a 'god-father' ancestor, and various ancestors of the group and the clan. During its life-time it had been sustained by sacrifices offered on the altars dedicated to these different personages. While forming a coherent whole, and thus permitting action on the part of the body that housed it, the life-force, in virtue of its multiple origin, continued to be bound to all those from whom it was derived.

One effect of death was to disperse the vital force and return its component part to the altars from which they had come. In a sense it was this dislocation of force, this stripping of the soul, that constituted the impurity of death. But it must be admitted that the word 'impurity' was unsuitable, inaccurate, and misleading in that connection; there was, however, no other.

Accordingly the soul, being in this condition of anxiety and confusion, sought to recover its balance and collect its scattered forces, so as to regain that 'purity' which characterizes life as opposed to death, to recover life, in fact.

'Being impure,' said Ogotemméli, 'the dead create disorder everywhere.'

But this disorder is simply a warning addressed to the living, for these disturbed souls are not seeking vengeance but appealing to men to regularize the position of the departed. Being impure and temporarily possessed by death, the departed raise the alarm by means of something which, in all rituals, is reserved for the dead—millet beer.

During the period of mourning, before its cult has been established, the homeless wandering soul seeks to slake its thirst in the fermenting beer that the relatives are preparing for secular or religious purposes. Wherever smoke and steam rise up from the great vats filled with water and millet, there the souls gather.

They alight on the edge of the brewing vat and impregnate the fermenting liquor with what little force they still possess. This force, mingling with the millet and water, gives the liquor its intoxicating property, and is assimilated with the beer by the drinker; it is strong enough to disturb him, though not to the extent of making him impure. There is, as it were, a struggle between it and the drinker's own force.

The ferment of disorder introduced into the beer by the dead, excites the drinker, but his own force resists it and finally rejects what is impure. He casts out the disturbing element by means of words, disordered but effective.

'The drinker,' said Ogotemméli, 'returns the impurity to those who put it in the beer, but also, and especially, to those who are guilty of keeping the departed waiting too long without altars.'

The words find their way over walls and through doors till they reach the people responsible for the delay. The men staggering in the streets may stutter meaninglessly, sing, or shout insults; but their words are heard by all, and some will certainly have an end of mourning ritual to perform or a funeral account to pay. Even if the words of the drunkards are uttered indistinctly, they are clearly understood by all those careless people whose granaries are not full enough to start the rites and by all those poor people whose efforts are in vain.

The dead are dying of thirst!

When the family conscience is heavily burdened in this matter of delay, every illness and every unfortunate incident is interpreted as a second warning, and an urgent one, from those who are kept waiting. People who fall ill, people whose cattle die, go to consult diviners; and the diviners tell them to end their mourning, and to set up the jars from which the dead will come to drink.

The very fact of establishing their cult means that the dead will receive regular succour from their own people, and from the moment of the first offering they will gather together their forces and draw to themselves all the parts dispersed by death. From impure dead they will become living ancestors.

'Then drunkenness has its uses?'

'The words the drunkards speak move people to set up altars, and that gives satisfaction to the dead.'

'Then it is a good thing to drink too much beer?'

'For the old, drunkenness is a duty; it seems like disorder, but it helps to restore order.'

The Living Dead

But this institution of fermented liquor and religious intoxication was not held to be sufficient to ensure that the duties owed to the dead were kept in mind by the living. Another institution, that of the 'impure', the living dead, provided for the constant observance of the rule.

After the body of the first dead man had been carried into the cave, a copy had been made of it by shaping a big serpent in wood—the 'Great Mask'—and the child designated by the departed had been consecrated as its guardian, together with a number of his companions.

Since a cult had thus been established and a new dwelling-place provided for him, the dead man, though in a state of impurity when he transgressed the prohibition, had now become a living ancestor. Even though he presided over the cult of the dead, his fate had been a normal one. But this impure condition had a decisive effect on the young initiates, who had themselves acquired the same quality. The fact that, in course of time, the condition of the Great Mask had changed, did not alter in any way the position of the children; they were to remain for the rest of their lives 'impure', or, in a sense, dead persons.

'These initiates,' said Ogotemmêli, 'are by nature the same as the ancestor of the Great Mask, but whereas he became alive as soon as an altar was set up for him, they remained "impure" because they were consecrated in the presence of the dead man while he was still "impure".'

When they died they became the 'godfathers' of other children, and so today every family has a large number of 'impure' members, who are exempt from most of the prohibitions imposed on other men, who are called 'living'. They play an essential part in all cults, but they have one permanent function, which devolves on them in virtue of their nature itself. They are also substitutes for the first dead man as he was when he had not yet been given an altar. These 'impure' persons and the 'impure' dead man who became the Great Mask are all one. They are also substitutes for the dead who have no altars. So much so that any good done to them benefits the departed, and, in particular, their participation at sacrifices feeds all those dead persons who are wandering about in search of food. When the 'impure' eat the flesh and drink the beer of sacrifices, it is as if the dead who have no altars were eating and drinking. The 'impure' are therefore like dead persons who are permanently fed in order that they may leave the villages in peace.

'But that is an illusion,' said Ogotemmêli.

He meant that it was not enough to feed and slake the thirst of the 'impure'. It was essential ultimately to provide actual altars for those who were no more and who were suffering from their unstable condition. They must be given cults and promoted to the rank of ancestors.

'What happens to the "impure" when they die?'

'They are like everyone else. When the family sets up an altar, they become ancestors.'

So these men, going about their several occupations, complaining of the price of meat in the market, toiling in the fields, just like anyone else, were really dead and, when they drank, were drinking for the dead.

They only became alive when they became ancestors and when their bodies were mouldering in the grave.

Dancing

MORE than once in the course of the conversations Ogotemméli had spoken of dancing. In various rituals, dancing, with or without masks, was often the central liturgical action. In the funerary cult particularly, both at the burial and at the ending of the period of mourning, it was the supremely significant gesture.

The origin of the ritual dance went back to the first days of the world, when the incest of the earth, changed into an animal, had given the jackal possession of the fibre skirt and made him the enemy of God.

'Clothed in the skirt,' said Ogotemméli, 'the jackal went on to the roof of his father's house, believing him to be dead.'

The father of the jackal was God; and, God being temporarily asleep, his son, who was also his rival, thought he was dead. Prefiguring one of the essential actions of the funerary rites which men were later to institute, the animal went up on to his father's terrace to mourn for him.

Dressed as he was in the fibres taken from his mother, the jackal danced and as he danced, he spoke, for the fibres were full of moisture and words. They had in them the first Word revealed by the Nummo to the earth, and it was this water and this Word which made the animal speak.

God's son spoke his dance. His steps left traces in the dust of the terrace which indicated the meaning of his Word.

'In his dance,' said Ogotemméli, 'he left three tracks lengthwise and three crosswise, representing God's Roof, the inside of his house, and the recess where the altar of the dead is placed. He planted little pieces of wood, placed stones and traced signs.'

'The son of God in celebrating the memory of his father, whom he believed to be dead, acted, spoke, and traced out the world and its future. He spoke the first Word, and he laid bare the future of the world. In his anger he revealed the secrets of God.

'For he honoured his father and flouted him. He had taken his mother's fibres, which were full of the Word that contained the designs of the celestial powers.'

The terrace where the jackal danced was the first divining table. Later men copied it in the sand round about the villages.

The reference was to the rectangles of smoothed sand, on which diviners write their questions, and the jackals lured by bait come by night and write the answers.

So the first attested dance had been a dance of divination; it had told in the dust the secrets of the Word contained in the fibres worn by the dancer. It was also a dance of death, for it was to honour and flout his father, whom he believed to be dead, that the jackal had invented it.

Ages passed. Men had appeared on the scene, and the revelation of the third Word had moved heaven and earth. Ogotemméli had already told how, to the rhythm of the anvil and bellows of the smithy, the seventh Nummo had risen from the dead, how he stood erect on his serpent's tail and how, stretching out and folding back his arms, he had passed through the underworld like a swimmer.

This resurrection dance had led the master of Speech to the tomb of the ancestor who represented the Word. The end was a swallowing followed by a rhythmic vomiting, which ejected into the tomb the outline of the new world-order.

All these marvels had taken place in the primal field, where the celestial granary had descended, and in which the smithy had been set up to the north of it. This scene, these sounds, this movement and action were to be reproduced in the life of men, and to be enriched by new meanings and new movements.

The smith, inventor of the first rhythm of resurrection, found other rhythms corresponding to new dance-figures. Anvil and bellows were combined in this work, but they were soon symbolically represented in the basic concord of instruments: when they had been revealed by the seventh Nummo, drums replaced the bellows, iron hand-bells the anvil, and drumsticks the hammer. At first only smiths beat the drums; but gradually others took their place.

'Beating the drum,' said Ogotemmêli, 'is the same as blowing the bellows, which is a symbol of the sun.'

The sun-drum, like the sun itself, throws out heat and loud-sounding steamy vapour on the dancers. The dancers are warmed in their armpits, which breathe like the nose. The heat enters the bile and spreads from there over the whole body. It is to encourage its action that the spectators cry: 'Hotter! Hotter! Hotter!' The heat is also the speech of the ancestors revealed by the drum. The sweat which flows from the armpits and the body is the ancestors' words overflowing.

Thus inflamed, the masked dancers with their girdles of red fibres become fragments of the sun. Certain movements imitate those of the sun. The sommo dance is the nearest copy, and the gôna dance is the next closest. When the tall mask called the 'Storeyed House', which symbolizes the family house, the covering of the dead and the warp of the loom, turns on a horizontal line, it is the round sun itself which is seen.

The wearer of this mask also performs another mime in which he kneels, facing towards the east, lowers his pole in front of him, then raises it and lowers it behind him towards the west, as if the head were broken. The lowering and raising of the pole represent the sun's daily course from east to west: the man is the copper spiral which causes its motion. But this was an elaboration of the original figures, which were simpler.

'It was the seventh Nummo,' said Ogotemmêli, 'who taught men to dance.'

He had begun by repeating his first rhythmic movement in the underworld. He danced with the top half of his body, standing upright on his serpent's tail. At first men danced on one spot, rotating on themselves or imitating swimming motions, but these movements were exhausting. Gradually they began to move their legs, imitating the slow walk of the chameleon, who has all the Nummo's colours, that is to say, the colours of the rainbow. Then the movements became more rapid. The gôna figure recalls the Nummo's vomiting in the tomb; dancing is a relief, like vomiting. Later men took to leaping, raising one leg and then the other. The leg stretched out, while the body was lifted in the air, represented the tail of the serpent on which the Nummo stood erect.

To get to the dance-floor, the dancers run in Indian file forming a serpentine line with broken segments.

'The zigzag line,' Ogotemmêli explained, 'represents the line of the Nummo, that is to say, the line of a river flowing full.'

Dances first took place, he said, on the primal field in front of the smithy, which provided the music for them. The primal field was the first main square. Nowadays the dance-floor is the main square of the village, situated on the north with the smithy at the edge of it.

So the team of dancers, the orchestra, and the setting all reproduce the scene and the actors of the original dance. To recall the mingled ringing sound of the iron and the muffled breathing of the bellows, small bells are attached to the drums; and when the drumstick, a symbol of the hammer, smites and skins, the roll and reverberation of the drums recalls the noise and clamour of the mythical smithy. The beating of drums is the bellows and anvil quickening and striking the 'fragments of sun' that dance.

And the team of dancers, the society of masks, are a picture of the whole world, for all men, all activities, all crafts, all ages, all foreigners, all animals, can be represented in masks or woven into hoods. The masked dancers are the world; and, when they dance in a public place, they are dancing the progress of the world and the world-order.

Thus the whole complex of dancers, orchestra, and the place where they dance constitutes a picture of the smithy beating out the rhythm of the movement of the universe.

'But the spectacle on the main square,' said Ogotemmêli, 'is transitory.'

He was anxious nevertheless to find points in its favour.

'It shows,' he said, 'the world-order in colour and in movement.'

Had the European seen that, he asked, in the ceremonies for the end of mourning?

'Yes!' replied the European. 'I saw the ceremonies for Monsé, the hunter who died on October 20th fifteen years ago; and I have seen many such ceremonies since then.'

He remembered unforgettable scenes in the squares and on the terraces of funerary huts. He recalled the procession of 150 masked dancers of the two Ogols which had materialized out of the quivering mirage of the sandstone flats and been swallowed up in the dust of the tracks across the fields, most of them girdled with scarlet fibres which parted to reveal shining black or straw-coloured fibres underneath. The men had false black breasts on their chests or strings of cowries conspicuously white. Their faces were hidden under plaited hoods, some of which had a short fawn-coloured plume or a red tuft in the Roman fashion at the top. They represented the young people, smiths, Fulani, Samo, leather-workers, drummers, Moors, ritual thieves, hunters. Others wore masks of carved wood painted in the three basic colours, red, white and black, representing the equine antelope, the deer tribe, foraging birds, 'bush wing-waggers' with high Lorraine crosses, and lastly the long poles known as the 'Storeyed House'.

All held green branches in their hands as tokens of their own freshness. For months these men had laboured in thickets and the cracks of the rocks. They had started out armed only with their knives and hatchets. They had cut, crushed, steeped and woven fibres, bark and stems. They had pounded pigments and applied them with brushes of asses' hair. They had jested about the red colour of their skirts, with which their hands were stained, likening it to the menstrual blood of women. Their peasants' clothing, in which they had started, had been torn by thorns and frayed by use; and now they were returning, a brilliant spectacle in the dun-coloured bush, helmed and visored with the head-dresses and faces of the world of the dead, and girt with the scarlet skirt, symbol of the sun.

On the main square of Lower Ogol they converged in small files, all similarly adorned, with fly-whisks or coloured basket-work in their hands, dancing their special dance-figures or joining in the general dance to the rhythm of the drums and the iron bells, in clouds of dust, encouraged by songs in the common tongue and orations in the sacred language, such as:

Shed tears for my dead father!
The water is falling, falling from my eyes!

On the terrace of the dead man's house, to which they mounted by notches cut in tree-trunks to serve as a ladder, they stamped the ground in the narrow space, their red and black figures interweaving, while in the street the widow with bare breasts and uplifted arms, chanted with streaming eyes:

The column of ants has got up on the roof!
The column of ants has destroyed the house!
Has got up on the roof!
It is the ants which have destroyed the father's house!

The chant recalled, in veiled allusion, the dance of the jackal son of God, dressed in the fibres he had taken from his mother, the Earth, transformed into an ant, when he traced on the mythical terrace the first divination table.

The scene on the main square depicted, according to Ogotemmêli, the order of the universe in colour and in movement. On the terrace the masked dancers, like the jackal, had traced the future of the world.

But these movements and colours were ephemeral; some more lasting representation was needed to depict the universe in operation.

'On the front of the Binu sanctuaries,' said Ogotemmêli, 'you find white paintings of the sun and the moon, the stars, men and animals and material objects. These pictures last. They serve to keep the world in being continually. For these pictures also portray the structure of the life of man. White and motionless, they correspond to the movement and colour which enliven the main square and the terrace of the dead man's house.'

The Cult of Fire

THE cult of the dead was not the only occasion on which the Dogon celebrated mythical events symbolically. There was a mysterious cult, in which masks played a part, which the European had never been able to explain.

Here and there in the fields of the plateau or in the scree, may be seen, planted on suitable sites at ground level or on rocks overlooking areas of cultivation, blackened logs of wood roughly hewn into the likeness of animals' heads with wide open jaws. Some look like monstrous cocks buried up to their necks, their beaks open above the corn; others are like long, distorted dogs, baring their teeth in a menacing fashion.

According to popular belief anyone who steals from a field or a tree protected by one of these black logs will sooner or later be struck by lightning. These objects originated more particularly in a sanctuary in a cave in Dyamini, served by a priest of whom nothing was known.

Ogotemmêli had mentioned these logs when he was describing the descent of the celestial granary through space; as punishment for the theft by the smith of a fragment of the sun, the Great Nummo Pair had hurled thunderbolts at the granary.

'During the descent,' said Ogotemmêli, 'the Nummo hurled two thunderbolts from heaven, the female Nummo first and then the male, and this accelerated the fall of the granary so that the sudden shock of its impact with the earth broke the smith's arms and legs.'

The bolts fell one after the other beside the bellows in which was the fragment of the sun. The smith extinguished the fire with water from his leather bottle, and found two blackened logs shaped like open jaws. The male log was called Anakyé, and the female log Badu.

But there was another reason for the thunderbolts. As the descent to earth had been organized by the eight Nummo ancestors, the two Great Nummo sons of God wanted to be present at the cults which were going to be established.

'Anakyé and Badu are symbols of the two Spirits. The smith entrusted the cult to the family of the fourth ancestor. Other families joined in afterwards.'

'But why the logs shaped like jaws?'

'The Badu's mouth recalls that of the robber's crook in which the smith had picked up the fragment of the sun.'

Ogotemmêli paused in his account.

'You should ask Aninyou,' he said, 'grandfather of the priest of Anakyé. He knows all about these things.'

The European had already questioned Aninyou, a reticent old man of Upper Ogol, and it was after that enquiry that he had decided to get Ogotemmêli to talk about it. He made no reply to the suggestion, and the old man continued as if talking to himself:

'The smith went stealing with his robber's crook. It was in the mouth of this stick that fire began. That was the smith's gift to the world. That,' he added, 'is why the institution of ritual theft was started.'

Ritual thieves were to be found all over the scree and on the plateau. In Sanga every family head was a ritual thief, and a ritual crook was to be seen hung up in a smoky corner of the big house. It was a piece of wood curved into a crook and ending in a wide open mouth; in the curved part was a pair of pointed ears. Along the length of the stick like a mane ran a line of chevrons. It suggested a graceful stylized horse's head.

This object was a reproduction of the stick with which the smith effected his theft; and a family head who was too old to visit the villages on the occasion of ritual expeditions, delegated his powers to a younger man. The latter, with his colleagues, was instructed to conduct raids on small livestock, which were then eaten in common according to prescribed conditions.

The striking thing about this institution was that it operated only on the death of a member of this sort of council. The party of delegates at once went into action and set out for the neighbouring villages in search of unguarded or imperfectly guarded beasts. When a goat was captured, it was brought to the funerary hut, and its throat was cut there on the roof, in which a hole was made opening on to the room in which the dead body lay. A millet-stalk placed on the breast of the corpse led up to the opening and directed the blood which flowed from the victim's cut throat. By this channel part of the life-force of the deceased family-head went back again into the robber's crook, which had been placed against the hole. The stick was then brought to the big family house near the altars of the ancestors, and became the property of the dead man's successor.

This seemed in the nature of a ritual of restoration; in fact, as Ogotemmêli said:

'When anyone becomes a family-head, he receives, among other things, a portion of the life-force derived from the robber's crook near the altars. This crook recalls the one with which the celestial fire was stolen; but that which is of greatest worth is, ultimately, the smith himself, whom the crook represents.'

In all family altars the smith, seventh Nummo and eldest of the eight sons of the first human pair, is present. He gives his force to the new family-head who, at his death, gives it back through the intermediary of the crook. The family-head, during his tenure of office, is therefore, among other things, a representative of the Nummo smith, the thief of fire.

In every village the band of ritual thieves should strictly consist of five, the number of fingers on the thief's hand; but in practice this number is always exceeded, and there are as many thieves as there are families.

The reason for this institution, according to Ogotemmêli, was to commemorate the smith's action in stealing fire at the risk of his life in order to give it to men. Instead of fire we now steal sheep and poultry.

'The robber's crook,' he said, 'is like a hyena, which eats the meat all raw and red. This meat recalls the stolen embers of the sun.' Crooks with red jaws are sometimes painted on the façades of sanctuaries to represent the burning and the taking of bleeding meat. The line of chevrons along the handle of the crook is the path by which the smith fled from heaven.

From this institution there developed a method of suppressing thieving based on the two avenging claps of thunder, by which the first thief was assailed. The thunderbolts materialized in the form of two logs of wood shaped like the robber's crook; they were indeed of the very same shape as the guilty object. They were put in the care of two priests, who made a number of replicas, which they distributed to their relatives, to keep pilferers from the fields and trees. For there was no longer any need to steal embers from hearths, as the celestial smith had done.

The logs were like dead fires, but were still capable of drawing down thunder on guilty persons. The same function was performed by red masks made of bark of the Lannea acida, which also represented the dead fires of the thunderbolts which the smith had parried.

In his oblong hood into which his head fitted as a stalk of maize fits into its case of leaves, the masked man passing through the orchards spread terror among the women and children.

There were two sanctuaries in Sanga for these extinct fires, one for the Badu fire to the west of Dyamini, and one for the male fire Anakyê on the eastern edge of the Guendoumman quarter of Upper Ogol.

The Badu sanctuary was built at the entrance to a large cave, much of which was occupied by Binu buildings. It was surrounded by a small enclosure of dry stones, in which was a pile of blackened logs. The building itself was a cube of dried mud too small to hold a man, and on its walls were displayed lines of red and white chevrons.

Anakyê's temple, on the other hand, was in the open air flush with the shining rock sloping to the dip between the two Ogols. It consisted of a cylinder three cubits in diameter and as many in height covered by a flat roof. The door, hermetically sealed, was never opened in the presence of the European: nor was that of the Badu sanctuary.

He had, however, learnt from a reliable source that the altar inside each of these buildings had two small cups on it sunk in the earthen mortar, and it was on these that the priest poured offerings to the thundering pair of celestial Nummo.

It was there too that all the protecting logs were brought each year after the harvest to receive new force from a rite, the essential part of which was a representation of the theft of fire.

In Dyamini, as in the Ogols, two masks represented the male and female fires; a man played the part of the smith and brandished a torch, pursued by the two fires. In Dyamini the action took place among the rocks between the cave and a small hollow of earth covered with dry grass, which the man set on fire as he fled, to recall how the fire of the celestial granary, after its descent, spread over the earth.

In the Ogols, a race was arranged between the Anakyé sanctuary and a point on the border of Lower Ogol. The route thus ran through the field between the two villages in the hollow where the baobabs were.

The man with the torch started from the sanctuary, and ran down the slope through the stubble-fields, shaking his brand and scattering a shower of sparks and embers. For the smith in heaven dropped some of his fire as he ran, picked it up with his crook, and continued to run, losing it and picking it up again.

On reaching the border of Lower Ogol the runner turned and ran back to the sanctuary, from which he at once started out again. This performance was repeated three times, and all the time the two masks pursued the fugitive brandishing a knife. They symbolized the two thunderbolts launched by the Nummo against the guilty smith, and they never caught up with the torch-bearer till, at the end of the third course, he regained the sanctuary. He had by then made the complete circuit three times brandishing his torch all the while.

'These three courses,' said Ogotemméli, 'recall the flight of the smith and his search for a way into the celestial granary, where he could hide the embers.' For in this ritual the circular Anakyé sanctuary represented the celestial granary.

The pursuit ended when a smith scanned the rock and beat upon it with the iron of his anvil. And the live fire, pursued by the two dead fires, gave life again to the hearths of this world as well as to the blackened logs which protect the crops and the fruit of the trees.

THIRTIETH DAY

Twins and Trade

'I GOT nothing,' said Apourali with a broad smile. 'I haven't been out of the village; I hadn't the time. And you?'

'I got thirty francs,' said Ambara. 'From my mother's family in Mendéli—thirty francs!'

'I went to Dyamini,' said Koguem, 'to my mother's family, she is a Dandoulou. As soon as I got there, I said: "The cow has had two calves!" I got 400 cowries and 110 francs.'

For the last three months a considerable number of Dogon had been in a state of excitement on account of the twin calves of Mendéli. The event had taken place in September, and the news had spread rapidly from village to village all over the plateau and the scree. The prodigy was of deep concern to everybody, old and young, all who could talk or simply say: 'The cow has had two calves!'

For this birth had started an extraordinary movement of the population. Everyone able to walk and speak went to visit his mother's family to bring the news and receive a present in cash. In the past only women were asked for a gift, and they gave it in cowries. Today all the members of a family combine for the purpose, and usually give money. Old men, who could not get about, contented themselves with visiting their married women relatives in the village or waylaying them on their way to market.

But, by being related to a uterine lineage, one is equally a uterine relative of someone else, so that, ultimately, the money received after long toiling along the roads, is given back to others who come to bring the same news.

'One gives what one has received,' it is said, 'and, as one has had expenses on the way, the net result is a loss. As for those who do not stir themselves, they lose because they have to give without receiving. However it all makes money circulate.'

Accordingly because of the twin calves crowds thronged the roads, getting and spending, not so much in honour of the calves as to celebrate the fact of a twin-birth, the cult of which extends all over Africa.

Most of the conversations with Ogotemmêli had indeed turned largely on twins and on the need for duality and the doubling of individual lives. The eight original ancestors were really eight pairs.

'The four men and four women,' said the old man, 'in their lower, that is, their sexual parts, were eight pairs. The four males were man and woman, but with the man dominant; in the four females the woman was dominant. They mated with themselves: each female part of each pair became pregnant and produced children.'

But after this generation, human beings were usually born single. Dogon religion and Dogon philosophy both expressed a haunting sense of the original loss of twin-ness. The heavenly Powers themselves were dual, and in their earthly manifestations they constantly intervened in pairs. Lébé and the seventh Nummo were a living couple; the ancestors of the Great Mask and of the mask-seat were a dead couple. It might even be supposed—though no Dogon had ever uttered such a blasphemy—that the first misfortune in the universal course of things was the oneness of God.

Actually the birth of twins is a notable event. It recalls the fabulous past, when all beings came into existence in twos, symbols of the balance between the human and the divine. It repeats the child-birth of the first woman and the transformation of her clitoris into a scorpion. The scorpion with his eight feet is a symbol of two new-born infants with their sum of eight arms and legs. He is also their protector: no one dares touch them for fear of his sting.

A twin-birth initiates a series of practices and rites of an exceptional character. It is not till eight weeks after the event—eight is the number of twins—that the mother emerges from her seclusion. At the first-fruits festival which follows, the children are shaved by adult twins, and the relatives put special jars on the family altar; for from their earliest days, these children will be the objects of a cult forming part of the cult of the family's ancestors.

This cult seemed to show that some special quality was attributed to the ancestry of twins. It was a popular belief that their mother had been 'touched' during pregnancy by a Spirit—it would never be called a Nummo, for that was too dangerous a name; too much for a human mouth to utter. The children of such a mother would therefore be essentially different from other children.

But all this was common knowledge, and the European had no desire to discuss all the different forms of ritual celebrated in such cases. Earlier enquiries had established all the details that could be desired, and he was anxious to find out what Ogotemmêli had to say about something which seemed to him to be highly significant—namely the special earthenware reserved for twins. These objects have a peculiar shape: each consists of two shallow round cups, five to six centimetres in diameter, joined together at the edge like a wide open oyster-shell. There was something of this sort in the celestial granary, at the top of the pyramid of superimposed jars placed at the point of intersection of the lower interior partitions. It covered the small container which held toilet perfumes and which formed the lid of the pot of oil, symbol of the foetus, which itself was set on top of the large jar symbolizing the womb. In this position it was placed in a context of generation: it was an invocation to creation by pairs, of which it was also a symbol.

'The two cups joined side by side,' said Ogotemmêli, 'are, like twins, of the same shape and size.'

On the day when the children are shaved, the father procures four double cups, which he places on the family altar, and two small trapezium-shaped pieces of leather, on each of which eight cowries are sewn. These objects are consecrated by a blood sacrifice of eight fowls, and are then made into pendants, which the children wear round their necks as a sign of their quality. The earthenware cups receive regular offerings from the relatives, and later from the twins themselves.

'The double cup,' said Ogotemmêli, 'is the symbol of twins—the same shape, same size, same words; and, just as the cups are equal to one another, so the twins are interchangeable, and therefore,' he added, 'trade began with twins.'

He dwelt on the notion of equality, from which (he said) the idea of exchange was derived. Twins have the right, the identical word; they have the same value, they are the same thing. Likewise the man who sells and the man who buys are the same thing: they are twins. And from the action of exchange between persons he passed to a consideration of the things exchanged.

'Trade,' he said, 'selling and buying different kinds of things, is exchanging twins.'

He meant that the things exchanged must be of the same value and exactly equivalent to one another, whether the exchange took the form of barter or a cash transaction.

'The twins who invented trade,' he went on, 'belonged to the sixth family; they were the first to be born after the descent of the granary containing the world-order. It was their father who found in the grave of Lébé the cowries that were to be used in trading.'

The shells had been placed where the dead man's fingers had been.

'The seventh Nummo,' said the old man, 'put the cowries in the place of the hands because men count with their fingers. He put eight for each hand, because when men first began trading they counted in eights.'

Ogotemméli had his own ideas about calculation. The Dogon in fact did use the decimal system, because from the beginning they had counted on their fingers, but the basis of their reckoning had been the number eight and this number recurred in what they called in French la centaine, which for them meant eighty. Eighty was the limit of reckoning, after which a new series began. Nowadays there could be ten such series, so that the European 1,000 corresponded to the Dogon 800.

But Ogotemméli believed that in the beginning men counted by eights—the number of cowries on each hand, that they had used their ten fingers to arrive at eighty, but that the number eight appeared again in order to produce 640 ($8 \times 10 \times 8$). 'Six hundred and forty,' he said, 'is the end of the reckoning.'

According to him, 640 covenant-stones had been thrown up by the seventh Nummo to make the outline in the grave of Lébé. So the cowries that the father of the first twins found in the ground when harvesting millet after the second sowing, were a foreshadowing of commerce. But in the very earliest days cowries were not the medium of exchange; on the contrary men began by bartering strips of cloth for animals or objects. Cloth was their money. The unit was a span-long strip twice eighty threads wide. A sheep was worth eight cubits of three handsbreadths each; a small measure of millet was worth one cubit. Later the value of things was fixed in cowries by the seventh Nummo, the master of Speech: a fowl was worth three times eighty cowries, a goat or a sheep three times 800 cowries, an ass forty times 800, a horse eighty times 800, an ox a hundred and twenty times 800.

At first, however, there was a shortage of cowries; the thirty-two shells found in the place of Lébé's hands and feet had been given to the twins born soon after the discovery. Of these, eight had been used by each twin as decoration for the leather pendants which showed their quality. That left eight for each of them.

According to a different account these cowries had first been exchanged with other men for poultry at the rate of four cowries for a bird. Then the fowls multiplied and the cowries, which were living things, also multiplied in the hands of their owners.

For the first exchange the twins took up their position on an anthill. One sold and the other bought. They took the ant as witness of the transaction. It is said also that the first exchange was between cowries and strips of cloth.

It was, therefore, in the presence of the earth's genitalia and of the ant, avatar of the earth, that the first commercial transaction took place. But the objects traded were alive: the cowries were live shells, and the cloth was full of words.

'The seventh Nummo,' said Ogotemméli, 'had stipulated that the objects to be exchanged should be placed facing one another and the words effecting the exchange spoken before them. It was as if the objects spoke through the mouths of their owners and heard each other on the subject of their own exchange.'

The old man's voice was loud. He sat up straight in the embrasure, not sunk in on himself, as he usually was when the conversation turned on religious subjects.

'That was to make sure,' he said, 'that the objects agreed to it.'

Evidently an important point!

The chief factor, he explained, in an exchange or sale is the spoken word, the words exchanged between the two parties, the discussion of the price. It is as if the cloth and the cowries were speaking. The goods come to an agreement with one another through the mouths of men.

For there is a harmony between the life-force of the object and that of its owner. The life-force of cowries comes to them from Lébé, of whom they are an emanation, and the life-force of Lébé is bestowed on men; so also the weaver who sells a strip of cloth introduces his own life-force when he enfolds in it the Word of the ancestors. This is the case with any object made by man: a little of his life-force passes into the work of his hands and the mere fact of possession introduces into the material object forces that, in a sense, represent the owner.

If anyone has borrowed something which he cannot return, its force, which is the force of its owner, makes difficulties for the borrower.

In the case of purchase or exchange, the owner's force, having received compensation, can do nothing against the possessor. It would even seem that the two forces concerned change places, each taking the place of the other, which averts all danger from the new owner.

Ogotemméli brought the conversation to a close with an enigmatic sentence:

'To have cowries,' he said, 'is to have words.'

THIRTY-FIRST DAY

IN the empty market-place where the Nazarene had gone in order to check some of his material, there was a tall stone fixed in a crack and bedded in with chips of sandstone. Before continuing his enquiry into trade, he had been getting information about this altar, known as the Market Lébé, whose custodian was one Allègué of Barna. Conversations with this personage had not proceeded altogether smoothly, and one of his memoranda bore the note 'Allègué is an arrant liar like all the Barna people'.

Allègué wore the usual breeches fastened below the knee, a voluminous coat with sleeves, open at the sides, and a cap with two points hanging down over his cheeks. In the evening light the brown material was indistinguishable from the mud wall of the house where the conversation was taking place. Nothing could be seen of his face but a row of teeth, or of his body except the light-coloured palms of his hands when he opened them to emphasize his assertions.

Allègué had at first maintained that the stone of the altar had risen of itself on the site 'without anyone knowing who had sent it there'. He thought this information would satisfy the European's curiosity. He added, however, that the same miracle had occurred at Bongo in Lower Sanga, but had not been a success.

'Bongo also had a market with an altar,' he said, 'but business there was bad, and in the end the two stones were joined together in the market near Barna.'

Allègué would have liked to dilate at length on the obscure procedures, privileges, and organization attendant on the union of these two stones of mysterious origin. It was understood, of course, that the smaller of the two belonged to Bongo, that Barna's rights were much more extensive, and that the elders of Lower Sanga were not such fools as to suppose that they had the slightest chance of prevailing in the matter.

These orations, which sometimes led up to matters of importance, were interrupted by a single question on the part of the European:

'When a victim's throat is cut on the Market Lébé, who comes to drink the blood?'

This was enough to plunge Allègué into profound reflection, and there the matter ended.

But the European had learnt enough to provide a clue to the observations of Ogotemméli, which went on from the last phrase of the previous day: 'To have cowries is to have words.'

At the beginning cowries were exchanged for strips of woven fabric, that is to say, for the Word of the ancestors, and especially that of the seventh ancestor, the master of Speech. These cowries came from Lébé, himself offspring of the eighth ancestor, whose number was that of the Word.

The cowries then had made their appearance under the sign of the Word; they themselves were words in so far as they indicated figures, and were thus a form of language. They were means of expression, and perhaps in the first dawn of human relations, they served, on the same footing as spoken words, for exchanging ideas. There may perhaps have reached the Dogon, through those who introduced them, an echo of the use of cowries in distant lands.

Speaking of this obscure period, Ogotemméli said: 'Originally cowries were used for exchanging words as well as for the exchange of goods. A man who had no cowries was unable to speak or could not speak as much as the others.'

It was not possible to enter more deeply into this ancient wisdom, which had grown threadbare and meaningless with the words in which it had been handed down, but was still real and living behind the blind eyes of Ogotemméli.

Cowries, being the Word, had to circulate like speech among men, and Ogotemméli repeated in this connection what he had already said about sacrifice:

'The Word is for all. Therefore it is necessary to exchange—to give and to receive.'

He took up once more the image of the strip of cotton taking shape on the loom, the warp representing the desert lands and the woof being the Word, the light, and the moisture that entered into them.

'The Nummo said that, when someone offers cowries for goods, the vendor dies if he refuses them. That was to compel him to exchange. Just as the strip of stuff gets longer and longer in the process of weaving, and cultivation spreads under the tool of the cultivator, so cowries ought to circulate.'

The force of this law is inherent in the cowries themselves, and it acts equally on the goods and on man. The whiteness of the cowries catches a man's eye and tempts him. Their force enters into him and stimulates his desire to trade.

The purpose of the pendants with the eight cowrie shells stitched on them, which twins wore on their chests, was, no doubt, to give visible expression to the constant appeal of commerce; and, conversely, this association of twins with trade and money makes them eminently successful traders.

They have in fact the reputation of being more successful than any others in whatever business they undertake, and people are often reluctant to trade with them owing to the belief that they have all the advantages on their side from the start.

'If you go to Mopti to sell your onions in company with a twin, you may be sure the purchasers will prefer his onions even if they are not so good as yours. His heap of money grows faster than yours does, and if your business is bad that is because your cowries have gone to him.'

Nobody doubted that the property of twins multiplied much faster than that of other people, and the reason was simple.

'They offer on their altar with its eight cups a sacrifice which ordinary people cannot offer. They say to the eight ancestors: "Here is your victim! Thank-you for yesterday! Do the same with the rest tomorrow!"'

As soon as twins are three or four years old, their parents buy them cattle with the cowries which have been given to their mother by their maternal aunts, and with these cattle oil of Lannea acida is obtained. With this oil drawn from the Nummo's tree they are anointed all over so as to display the permanent moisture required to ensure increase—so much so that the cattle which are associated with the oil, multiply themselves.

'No one takes any special care of these beasts; they fatten themselves and reproduce their kind, while other beasts are exposed to danger.'

This tendency to succeed influences the neighbours. Before going to market the mother of twins presents herself at their altar and petitions the eight ancestors for protection and good fortune. 'Ancestor twins,' she says, 'come and guide me! Go before me!'

Being aware of this practice, very few women will run the risk of following such a mother along the roads leading to the market. Most women avoid her and take bypaths, being convinced that she will take advantage of all the good openings.

This privilege attaching to twin-births is also expressed by the free supplement which every vendor is expected to give to a purchaser who is a twin. This supplement is of little value nowadays; but originally it was much more: the vendor had to give double the amount of goods for the same price.

Similarly, when a twin is given a present, it has to be given in two equal parts, otherwise he would not accept it.

As a result of these customs and practices, a twin, so far as commercial matters are concerned, is regarded as exercising a dangerous power of attracting wealth. Nevertheless, no one would refuse to do business with him and, on the contrary, everyone is willing to give him presents.

'People give to twins,' said Ogotemmêli, 'in order to acquire something of their luck, and because they think that they will receive more than they gave.'

Thus, at the ceremony of the setting up of their altars, twins receive presents of cowries from all their relatives on the mother's and the father's side, who thereby secure for themselves some contact with good fortune. In the courtyard of the father's house the large family blanket, with its black and white squares, in which the dead are wrapped, is spread out on mats. The mother and the daughter who is helping her take their places on it, each holding one of the twins. To the tune known as the 'Chieftainship' played by a drummer all the relatives walk past and deposit their offerings in two heaps, the one on the right being for the mother and the one on the left for her husband.

Everyone gives something to both sides, but a larger portion to the blood relation.

The two heaps must be of equal size, because they symbolize a buyer on the right and a vendor on the left. The pall for the dead, on which they are placed, is also the symbol of trade, for the twins who started the first exchanges sat on it, and it is made of black and white squares in equal numbers. A merchant who wears such a blanket will be prosperous in his business affairs.

But, though it is connected with trade, the blanket is not money. It is the most general form of wealth, and is not meant to circulate. The worst disgrace a family could suffer would be the sale of this treasured possession; and a man who did not own such an article would borrow one secretly for his departed ones, so as not to let it be thought that the family-group lacked one.

Unlike cowries, whose law is mobility, the covering is stable and immobile. It is, as it were, the end and object of family economy, the ultimate stage in the acquisition of wealth; and at funerals a family will proudly spread its coverlets over the façade of the house, thus displaying its inalienable possession.

The mother is therefore seated on the family's capital when she displays her two children and presides over the symbolic commercial transaction in which two heaps of money balance one another exactly.

She is seated on the symbol of cultivated land, with its multiple squares when, after her own exceptional act of fecundity, she presides at the proliferation of cowries. And the solemn ceremony proceeds in the same way even if one of the twins is not there. A twin is never said to be dead, but to have taken leave, to have flown.

In such a case the mother only is present with the surviving twin. If both die, the festival is celebrated for the child born next after them, who is held to be linked with the twins who came before him.

'He is as it were the remnant of the twins,' said Ogotemmêli. 'He is called the "ashes of a man".'

For it is important to record the evidence of twin-ness restored, and to spread through the whole group the benefit, even if only ephemeral, of the primordial state.

After having been the centre of the multiplication of cowries, the children, thoroughly permeated by the atmosphere of trade and abundance, are carried to the market about midday, the hour when the market-place is full and the noise at its height.

'The confused noise of people's voices is the voice of the Water Spirits in human form come to do their shopping.'

This is the hour when beautiful girls, whom nobody knows, pass through the busy groups of buyers and sellers and disappear without trace. This is the hour when the Nummo cast their skins and, without anyone realizing what is happening, appear in the baskets of the merchants in the form of home-grown tomatoes.

At this auspicious moment the twins are exhibited to the crowd and to the invisible ones. In front of the market altar the family group halts for the consecration of the children to Lébé and the eight ancestors.

'To the Market Lébé we entrust these twins. May he protect and guide them on their way!'

The relatives then carry them three times round the market-place, thus enclosing groups of people from all over the country within the beneficent area where the circulation of money and goods is proceeding most vigorously.

The central point of this area is the stone altar set up to that Lébé, whose skeleton outline cast up by the Nummo is formed of the eight ancestors, the eight paired ancestors, the patrons of twins. It is they who drink the blood of sacrifices, and with them come the dead twins of all time, including the first twins, the inventors of trade. With them come also the supreme Nummo Pair, who never took fleshly form.

It is under the permanent sign of twin-ness that men have established their centres of trade and commerce.

THIRTY-SECOND DAY

The Signs of the Zodiac

IN the course of those days occupied by conversations with Ogotemméli and by a hundred other labours, and also during the nights when he considered and arranged his material, the European had been thinking, dimly at first but later more and more clearly, of certain cosmological details which, considered as a whole, caused him some surprise.

The role assigned to twins had not astonished him; he had already encountered several examples of the cult of twin-births in African countries. The ram with the calabash-sun on its head, alternating with a bull similarly equipped, had first excited his curiosity. Rams with spheres on their heads carved on the rocks of North Africa had already caused much ink to flow; some said they came from Egypt, others said it was the other way round. Many had identified the circle between the horns with the sun. All these speculations, which never got beyond the stage of hypotheses, were now suddenly illuminated by new light coming from regions whose contribution to the problem could not have been foreseen.

Up to now the Nazarene had been facing questions of long standing. The story of the scorpion, the result of excision, perplexed him: it was quite out of the ordinary. Twins! Ram! Bull! Scorpion! He thought of the Zodiac. But he kept this idea to himself. He hoped that the system might emerge naturally, of itself, from the conversations on the threshold where the Master sat.

Every day he wondered what revelations would come from the old man bowed down in the embrasure outlined against the dark background. Each day brought fresh food for thought, deeper satisfactions than he had ever known in all his career as an investigator. In the whole complex pattern the idea of the Zodiac was only one item among a thousand, but there was something exciting about it. Had the Africans their own coherent explanation of the symbol of the Zodiac, whereas the Mediterranean peoples had only the most childish notions about it? One could not seriously suppose that the peoples of antiquity actually saw in the sky a scorpion, twins and fishes, and that the position of the stars required twelve magical signs, in which a virgin was placed next to a pair of scales and a crab to a lion.

Twins! Ram! Bull! Scorpion! One day it occurred to the European to wonder whether the twelve signs were not to be found in the celestial granary which the smith had brought down along the rainbow. The granary was connected with the stellar system. It was itself composed of sky, moon and sun, and each of its stairways was associated with a cardinal point and a group of stars.

The twins appeared there, because the smith ancestor was dual, and because, moreover, he represented the male, and the granary the female element, with arms and legs raised supporting the sky.

The ram and the bull occupied the steps on the south side; the scorpion was underneath the floor, which represented the sun. As for the animal called nay, which means 'Sun', it was not a crab but a special sort of lizard. He had a place next to the scorpion.

The lion had a good place on the western stairway at the ninth step, which is the number of chieftainship. Ogotemmêli always insisted that the lion was gemelliparous, that is to say, it had not lost the primordial advantage: nor had the scorpion.

The virgin was there only in the form of the female-calabash on the head of the ram or the bull. It was also noteworthy that the unicorn, often included in this sign, had a curious counterpart in the ram, whose second sex organ grew between his horns and fertilized the virgin-calabash.

For a long time the scales seemed to the European to be lacking. According to all local reports, this article was a recent addition to Dogon economy; there was no trace of it in the granary. But the study of twins had provided a ray of light: the double cup with equal values, representing two interchangeable values, was a symbol of the scales. Its place was in the centre of the granary on the pile of jars.

FIG. 11. Signs of the Zodiac

The archer was clearly evident; the smith, who stole the sun, shot his arrows not only in self-defence, but also to provide for his descent. He shot one arrow into the vault of the sky and another at the roof of the granary.

Capricorn or the goat might possibly be represented by the goat of the southern stairway; but this was not very satisfactory, particularly as the goat of the Zodiac often has a fish's tail.

Aquarius, the water-carrier, was in the thread unrolled from the vast spindle formed by the granary. It unrolled itself in a spiral, which was compared by Ogotemmêli to a zigzag line.

As for the fishes, they were there, hanging from the navel of their twins, men and women on the northern stairway.

It seemed therefore to the European that, without presenting a considered system of the Zodiac, the cosmology and metaphysic of the Dogon provided at least a possible place for most of its signs. This place was certainly to be seen in the world-system brought down from heaven under the aegis of the smith, but it was more clearly visible in Dogon institutions.

On this last day with his instructor, when he was to give a general recapitulation, the European hoped to get a bearing on this question.

He had come to the conclusion that the symbolism of the Zodiac was an expression of two fundamental principles—the principle of water, the essence of all being, and the principle of twin-ness.

These two principles were linked to one another from the earliest times; the Nummo Pair, Water Spirits and the first successful children of God's work, were formed from water. God's seed, made of water, after a first failure resulting in a unique and consequently incomplete being, had produced this heavenly pair destined to be the directors of the world.

'Except the Nummo Pair,' said Ogotemmêli, 'no one can reorganize the world.'

The part played by twins had been a highly significant feature of the conversations, and had made possible the analysis of a number of institutions. But, to revert to the Zodiac, the European had tried to explain the square or rectangular figure by which the sign Gemini (the twins) is commonly represented. This quadrilateral figure, he thought, probably expressed the quadruple personality of the Pair, each of whose elements has from birth two souls. The number 4 is moreover the number of femininity, that is, of fertility. Ogotemmêli had often said that the ideal pair was composed of two females and consequently had the sign 8, the same as the creative Word.

But, if the twins were water, was water dual?

It was noteworthy that the emblem of Aquarius (the water-carrier of the Zodiac) was generally double, whereas the Dogon frequently represent water by a single zigzag line. On the façades of sanctuaries, on weavers' blocks, on wooden vessels, on masks, on robbers' crooks, on the doors of granaries, it was nearly always single. It is also single in the dance called

'chevron path', as also in the woof of fabrics, where it symbolizes the line of motion of water and the Word.

But its deeper meaning was shown on certain sanctuaries and on masks: it separated and at the same time united two areas often depicted in different colours; in it two rows of teeth fitted together. But it was above all in the primordial action of the weaver that its secret was revealed. It was the union of right and left perpetually balanced, perpetually moving forward on the warp.

The symbolism could be carried further; the zigzag line of the woof, symbolizing the movement of moisture in uncultivated regions, led up to the strip of equal black and white squares; eight strips went to form the covering for the dead; and it was on such a covering that the twins had inaugurated trade, in which merchandise is exchanged in equal quantities, as the black and white squares are equal in number and in size.

Twin-ness and water are therefore linked both in their nature and in their symbols, Gemini and Aquarius.

Enlightened by these last recapitulations, the European turned his attention to the various images and institutions which provided a key to the Mediterranean system of the Zodiac; and even though, oddly enough, the system as such was unknown to the Dogon, he found, in most of the signs, expressions of the two great principles on which Dogon thought was largely based.

The ram, avatar of the male great Nummo, has as head-dress a calabash-sun, avatar of the female great Nummo. The plume on his head is the (male) moon and, in virtue of his fleece of copper, he is also an emanation of the sun. He is therefore, in fact, a pair, and it might even be said that symbolically he displays his duality at least twice: he has two male sex-organs, and he is female twice over in respect of the solar sphere which forms his head-dress and the fleece which enfolds him.

He is also supremely the emitter of water and seed, inasmuch as he not only fertilizes the female principle between his horns, but also urinates rain on the world. His fleece is of copper, and therefore water; and beneath his tail, which ends in a serpent's head, projects an ear of millet; thus he is the moisture of vegetation.

Though he is no longer shown in full on the façades of sanctuaries, he is at least present on the pediments in the form of the double crook of his horns, on which the rain-clouds are caught.

The bull, his double, may be explained in the same way. As for the goat, she is an avatar of the Water Spirit in his ill-omened activities. The fish-tail of Capricorn is perhaps to be explained by the fact that the animal is always shown in water.

The counterpart of the crab is the lizard of the kind called 'Sun', avatar of the prepuce, seat of the female soul, which is the twin of the man whose birth, apparently, was single, whereas the lizard itself is dual. Its short tail is like its head and symbolizes the male penis, while its whole body is an avatar of the female prepuce. It may be pointed out in this connection that the Zodiac sign of Cancer (the crab) is a pair of figures shown head to tail, which would suit a lizard of the kind described. The lizard is moreover the associate of the scorpion, the male twin of the woman. The scorpion, who is believed to be dual, is the protector of twins, and his eight claws symbolize their eight arms and legs. He is connected with water in two ways: his sting absorbed the waters of the first woman's child-birth, and he is, like the lizard, an avatar of a moist sex-organ.

The lion, like the scorpion, is believed to be gemelliparous. His place is on the ninth step of the western stairway of the world-system, because he symbolizes chieftainship, the number of which is 9. Chieftainship is entrusted to Lébé, the dispenser of rain and director of vegetation.

The virgin is incorporated in the ram in the form of the calabash-sun. The emblem of the zodiacal Virgo (virgin) is a sort of letter 'm' with a stroke through the last leg of the letter, which may be compared with the emblem of the scorpion, whose last leg often ends in a point. The first of these emblems would represent the excised virgin, and the second the result of the excision, the animal armed with its sting representing the excised organ.

The double cup, which suggests the two pans of the scales, is the symbol of interchangeable twins; its purpose is to catch the blood and water of libations and sacrifices.

Sagittarius (the archer) is recalled by the smith armed with his bow and standing erect on the celestial granary, which is also his female twin with her four members lifted like a sort of framework supporting the sky. He is connected with water, because he is a Nummo, and because he extinguished the fires launched against him with water from his leather bottle.

The corresponding sign of the Zodiac, the arrow with a ball in the middle of the shaft, is no doubt the spindle piercing the spindle-whorl. The arrows shot by the smith into the sky and into the granary were spindles; to the one shot into the vault of heaven was attached the thread of the descent, which unrolled from the spindle planted in the roof of the granary. The granary itself was an enormous spindle-whorl, which had served as a target for the arrow.

The Pisces (fishes) of the Zodiac, twins connected by a streamer or a duct coming out of their mouths, also symbolize water. They appear on the north stairway of the celestial granary, attached to the Bozo. Fish and men are twins, and the Bozo is himself of water, being the first fisherman of the Niger and the master of the river. The Bozo maintain what is called a 'joking relationship' with the Dogon who traditionally refer to them as 'fish that walk on land'.

It would seem, therefore, that the Zodiac of the Mediterranean peoples could be explained from the point of view of Dogon cosmology and metaphysic. But the European had no illusions about how such an argument was likely to be received by recognized specialists in academic circles. True, there were encouraging exceptions, brilliant minds which, though concerned mainly with classical studies, would regard remote civilizations with sympathy and surprise; enlightened amateurs, drawn to the African because of his art, and bold thinkers interested in speculations of an unusual character, seized eagerly on these problems. But they were lost in the crowd.

Has it not been established once for all that the African has nothing to give, no contribution to make, that he cannot even reflect ancient forms of the world's thought? Has he not always been relegated to the level of a slave? 'Consider the carvings of the great civilizations of antiquity! Where do the Negroes figure in these? Why, in their proper place, among the lesser races! What influence do you attribute to them?'

To which the answer is:

'It is not a question for the moment of influence exercised, but of influence received and preserved.'

But the discussion is futile. One is lucky to meet nothing worse than sovereign contempt embracing alike the investigator and the object of his study. Unconscious hatred is a common phenomenon.

Thinking of this deliberate failure to understand, this refusal to recognize, the European, in the presence of the courteous blind man, whom he was to leave on the following day, experienced a feeling of shame. He would have liked to show his respect for this man who, deprived of sight, spoke words which, as he himself said, were light. He would have liked to apologize for all the contempt and all the ignorance of Europe and America.

But the serenity of Ogotemmêli in his courtyard, among the lengthening shadows of the granaries, was far removed from the world of Europe and from men's remorse.

He was already grieving for his friend's departure, for his journey into the air in what he called an 'alpilani'. He would have liked to know its dangers, so that in thought he might share them with the Nazarene who had passed the hours with him on the straw in his house. He urged him to be careful, as he would have done to one of his own people going out to work in the fields.

'When we go out to the fields,' he said, 'we meet with thorns and serpents and damaging winds.'

A young chicken clucked beside him; he pushed it away with a movement of his hand. Then he drew himself up to his full height in his rags, and gave the evening greeting.

Farewell to Ogotemmêli

THE sun rose on the last working day; at this hour tomorrow the camp would be deserted. The European did not pay his usual morning visit to Ogotemmêli; he was occupied with the final preparations for departure and his last contacts with the local people.

The results achieved by the research team had exceeded all their hopes. The linguistic documentation, patiently accumulated in the course of conversations, journeys on horseback, and lengthy interrogations, revealed a rich language, with innumerable subtleties of expression and a clearly defined structure. The minutest activities of the Water Spirits were described in clear and picturesque terms. Distinctive forms of speech could be recognized in different districts, and in each district villages could be classified according to flexibility of phrasing and subtlety of vocabulary. Within the villages each quarter made fun of the accent and dialectal peculiarities of its neighbour, and a family, or even one man in a family, would be regarded as the arbiter of correct speech.

The young European woman in charge of linguistic research, by-passing informants who were considered authoritative, had discovered that Ogotemmêli was recognized as having the purest speech of the people of Upper Sanga, compared with whom the men of Lower Sanga were regarded as boorish peasants.

Investigation into territorial and family organization, agricultural rituals and the cult of the ancestors, had shed new light on a number of problems.

Incidentally the study of the Bambara had brought to light unexpected cosmologies and metaphysics. There too Water and the Word were the foundation of spiritual and religious life. There too coherent myths provided a key to institutions and customs; and there were many indications that, beneath the various ritual forms and patterns of behaviour characteristic of the African peoples of these regions, lay hidden the main features of one religion and one conception of the organization of the world and the nature of man. In every respect the expedition marked a turning-point in African studies. The results it had achieved were the reward of fifteen years of research, doggedly pursued, each stage developing harmoniously from the last, till the keystone of the whole system now appeared after a delay of six years caused by the war.

The European went over this balance-sheet again as, in the late afternoon, he made his way by the usual route to Ogotemméli's house.

On the previous day he had given him a cock, bought for a good price, for a concluding sacrifice, to which all the foreigners were invited. With a sad heart he presented himself for the last time before the little door, which banged like a gong. Crossing the threshold he found himself in the courtyard, which seemed to be in a state of alarm. Ogotemméli was sitting on the hollow stone, where the fowls used to come to drink. He was rating someone offstage, but not violently. His wife was standing on a mortar and looking over the wall between the two granaries into the Hogen's courtyard. His brother was also looking out on the north side, watching the animals on their way to and from the main square.

'The cock has flown!' said a voice.

This serious development dominated the farewells. The European was not sorry; it gave a certain light relief to the painful occasion. When one leaves a Dogon, how can one tell when one will see him again? Men's lives in this country hang on such a slender thread.

Ogotemméli was on his stone, hands on his knees and face looking down. In a low voice he told his brother to take another fowl. The Europeans were standing in a line along the wall beyond which was the street. No tactless person was looking through the embrasure or any other gap in the mud wall. It was known that there was a sacrifice at Ogotemméli's, and the passers-by averted their gaze out of deference for their neighbour's religion.

On the woodwork of an old door lying flat on the ground were placed bands of dark leather and two oblong black objects. They were no doubt part of the hunter's altar which Ogotemméli had inherited from his father, and which derived, by successive additions of earth, from the primordial altar, which had been the grave of the ancestor who invented hunting.

Ogotemméli had told the stranger all about this altar, but it was difficult to ask for further information about these objects, which he now saw for the first time. Already the old man was handing his brother the knife with which to cut the throat of the emaciated grey fowl that was taking the place of the fine cock.

That would not worry the invisible. Blood is always blood, and a life is a life, whether it is the blood and the life of a scraggy fowl or a man or a fat bull. It was vexatious only for the humans concerned, because the flight of the victim made it impossible to honour the stranger as he deserved.

Ogotemméli offered prayer. He called the heavens to witness; he made resounding channels ready for the flow of grace. He paid his debt to the Powers of Water, of whom he had perhaps spoken too freely to the stranger from the northern lands. He asked for a happy issue to the long homeward journey that the stranger was about to undertake. He turned his face to the north, to the land where the Europeans were said to live. It was a propitious hour, the hour when the shadows move upwards in the courtyards and outline the smallest recesses of the roofs, and when the sun, its force abated, drinks the blood on the altars less quickly than the thirsty souls.

Now the sacrificer, having sprinkled the objects with blood, had thrown the victim on the ground. It agonized in the surrounding silence. It was the end. All were thinking of the death of the grey fowl sacrificed in lieu of a better victim, but valid as are all deaths.

Ogotemméli's brother quietly opened the door of the big house. Over the familiar threshold, where the old man used to sit every morning, he stretched out his hand into the darkness to the cage from which the sacrificial cock had escaped. He remained there for a moment or two as though to perpetuate in the eyes of the Europeans, in that solemn hour, the first causes, the supreme reasons, for the inferior quality of the sacrifice. He pointed to the worm-eaten basket, the prototype of which had served in mythical antiquity as a model for the world-system.

September 1947

This book, finished in June 1947, presents the essential elements of Dogon doctrine. The author had intended it also to be a testimony to his first contact with Ogotemméli; and it was to have been followed by a series of other works, the material for which would have been provided by further conversations. But it could not be.

At the beginning of this month the author received from Sanga a letter dated August 10th, of which the following are the essential passages:

'This will astonish, and will greatly grieve, you. . . . It is that he whom you found to be the most devoted, the frankest and the most sincere of men, as well as one of the most learned in Dogon customs, your old Ogotemméli, has fallen into the eternal sleep.

'He died on Tuesday 29 July 1947 at about 2 p.m. It was market day in Sanga. Before his death our millet was beginning to suffer from a slight drought; but on that very day, before his funeral, there was a moderate shower, which saved the crops. You can imagine why. It was because he had a 'rain-stone,' which you must know well.

'Do not any longer expect to see him again! May his name be immortalized in your works!'

This death is a serious loss to humane studies. Not that the blind old man was the only one to know the doctrine of his people! Other Dogon notables possess its main principles, and other initiates continue to study them; but he was one of those who best understood the interest and the value of European research.

He has perhaps left behind him living words, which will enable others to renew the thread of revelations. His ascendancy was such that it may be others will wish to follow his example.

But, however that may be, there will never be anyone with the noble gait, the deep voice, the sad and luminous features of Ogotemméli, the great hunter, of Lower Ogol.

Originally published in 1948 as Dieu d'Eau, this near-classic offers a unique and first-hand account of the myth, religion, and philosophy of the Dogon, a Sudanese people. Often regarded as savages, the Dogon are here revealed to "live by a cosmogony, a metaphysic, and a religion which put[s] them on a par with the peoples of antiquity, and which Christian theology might indeed study with profit." In recording his thirty-three days' conversation with Ogotemmêli, an elder of exceptional intelligence and wisdom, the author has succeeded in conveying the man's highly individual style. The result is a remarkable portrayal of Dogon cosmology, told as it were from the inside.

From Reviews of Conversations with Ogotemmêli

"Their study will prove of interest and enlightenment to those still inclined to underestimate African subtlety and sophistication."

Times Literary Supplement (London)

"Dogon religion (Sudan) is seen through the eyes of Ogotemmêli, an elder of exceptional intellectual attainments, and it is good to have this material now in English."

Anthropological Forum

"There is little doubt that the writings of Griaule and his fellow workers have brought to light ideas and symbols of considerable complexity."

Jack Goody in American Anthropologist

"Conversations with Ogotemmêli can be thoroughly recommended as one of the most important studies of West African traditional religion."

Geoffrey Parrinder in West Africa

INTRODUCTION TO THE 256 ODÙ IFÁ

This E-book offers an introduction to the 256 Odu Ifa. It is written to offer the most basic knowledge on Odu Ifa. It is never the intention of this book or its writer to offer any deep knowledge on Ifa religion and divination. The intention of this E-book is to offer a cursory insight into the world of Odu Ifa. It will serve as a very small window into the world of Odu Ifa.

This E-book has no commercial intention whatsoever. It is freely distributed to those who may find it useful as they begin the study of Ifa religion. It may also serve as reference for ardent of Ifa religion. But the E-book is mainly written as one of the educative tools for the members of "Isedale Yoruba". Isedale Yoruba is a group which can be found on whatsapp and Facebook.

Isedale Yoruba is a group of ardent elites who strive continually to teach and promote Yoruba Tradition (Isese). The group is led by a passionate, brave, intelligent, humble, and compassionate young man called King. We extend our hands of fellowship to both ardent in Yoruba Tradition and genuine seeker after the truth in the ways of the ancestral forefathers of the Yoruba people.

There are 256 known Odu Ifa¹ out of which the first 16 are known as the primordial Odu (Oju odu²). The remaining 240 Odus are the results of various combination of the first 16 Odu³.

The Odu Ifa is similar to the computer binary coding system of 0 and 1. Ifa is coded within the 256 Odu(s) or corpus. Each of the 256 Odu ifa has many verses which are presented in the form of parables⁴. An Ifa ardent is expected to know minimum of four verses from each of the 256 odus.

The Odùs of Ifá are patterns of binary code with closed and opened nodules representing all of the energies contained in the Calabash of Existence (Igba Iwa)⁶. This Igba iwa is also known as the cosmos or the Universe.

All the possible circumstances and situations of humans on planet earth are represented by the energies within the Calabash of Existence (Igba Iwa). Human situations come in two main forms: misfortune and blessing. These situations can be found in various formats within the “Igba Iwa”. The Odùs are the oracles of the Yorùbá divination systems of Ifá, Obi, and Merindinlogun⁷.

The work of a Babalawo or Iyanifa is to employ the knowledge of the energies within the “Igba Iwa” to proffer solution(s) to an individual’s problem. The energies in the Calabash of Existence reveal the destiny of human being and how they can improve their lives experience through tweaking or fine-tuning of their Ori(s) (destiny).

The 256 Odus are the blueprints of all the probable human circumstances in the universe. Each of the 256 Odus as a chapter has minimum of 800 esoteric verses⁸ with accompanied ebos(rituals), oguns (medicine), and sacrifices.

The 256 Odus are herein presented in the subsequent pages of this E-book (Introduction to the 256 Odu Ifa).

The background of the book cover is a dark, textured field of deep red and brown, resembling a starry night sky or a nebula. Scattered across this background are several celestial bodies: four large, bright orange-red spheres in the corners, and several smaller, pale yellow and white spheres that look like moons or planets. In the center of the cover, there is a rectangular frame with a double-line border. Inside this frame, the title is written in white serif font, and below it, the subtitle is written in a smaller, italicized white serif font.

INTRODUCTION TO THE FIRST EDITION

Malèmbe!

This work was written for my seminar discussions at Yale University in 1980. I also wanted it to be a book for everybody which is why I decided to call it The African Book Without Title.

If either a lawyer, an anthropologist, a philosopher, an educator, a politician, a linguist, a diplomat, a therapist or an ordinary man can find in this work anything that may be useful to their field, then let them call the book the way they want it to be called in order to fit it into their field.

Africans, including those of African descent, must love the study of their languages if they wish to talk honestly about themselves and about what they are, for all systems' codes of their society are coded (tied) in these languages [makolo mamô ma bimpâ bia kimvuka kiâu makângwa mu ndînga zôzo]. These languages should be studied and used as languages of instruction in order to prove their scientific capacity [lêndo kiâu kianzâyila].

To study language is the most important process of learning the art of coding and decoding social systems of human society in the world [kinkete kia kânga ye kutula makolo ma fu bia kimvuka kia mûntu mu nza]. Learning is an accumulative process of coding and decoding cultures, therefore, it is necessary to study the language that expresses those cultures—[longuka i nzila yangyumbikila ku nsia n'kîngu wa nkângulu ye nkutudulu a makolo manzâyila ma mûntu]. One also has to learn, the art of tying/coding [kin-kete kia kânga] in order to understand the opposite side of that art, how to untie/decode [bwè mu kutula]; only one who understands the codes of their social and conceptual systems can decode them for the outside world. This Kongo proverb/principle does state: A community's knots/codes are decoded by its members; variant Systems' codes are only decoded by their members [Makolo makânga kânda kutula mwisikânda, variant Makolo makânga kimpâ, kutula kimpâ/mwisikimpâ].

Africanists and all African wisdom lovers, likewise, must be interested in the study of African languages in order to avoid yesterday's biased blunders. How can someone be a true Africanist if he/she is not able to speak a single African language? How could he/she represent a system he/she dares not truly taste and feel? To awakening Africans, such scholars are very dangerous for Africa because they negatively lead the most dangerous exploitation of man by man, the intellectual exploitation. They impose themselves upon others by interpreting negatively other people's ideas, i.e., what they call "their raw materials/their original work." Moreover those ideas are badly understood since they were harvested in a hurry, and all kinds of cultural misrepresentation and fantasies occur in the process of "filling in the blanks."

Food tastes good only if one can taste and feel the mind and heart of the person who cooked it. This applies to cultures as well. A systematic understanding therefore is possible only if one can taste and feel the radiation beauty [n'nièzi a minienie] of the language that generates that culture.

A work, a teaching, a gift, a laugh or an explanation from a violent and bloody mind has a great impact on its consumer. We are what we consume, learn, hear, see and feel. We feel waves/vibrations and radiations [minika ye minienie] because we ourselves produce waves/vibrations and radiations. We are sensitive to heat, cold, and electricity, [tiya, kiôzi ye ngolo za n'cezi/sula] only because we ourselves as organisms produce heat, cold, and electricity.

The American statesman who said that USA citizens must study foreign languages for national security was not mistaken. One has to agree that our present conceptual way of coding and decoding (tying and untying) social and systematic codes of alien cultures is the cause of insecurity and tensions in the world today. A person, by the negative labels one sticks on other people, blinds and sinks oneself.

The African Book Without Title shows how strong and deep-rooted the concept of coding and decoding [kânga ye kutula makolo] was and still is throughout life in the African concepts. For those interested in the study of African thoughts and systems, we also recommend the reading of Ku Nènga and Makuku Matatu.

A FEW WORDS TO THE SECOND EDITION

Twenty-one years ago this study was printed to serve as a stepping ground to my class discussions at Yale University. Since its publication, many outside of the classroom wanted to have a copy of African Book Without Title, but it was not available. Friends asked to review the materials and expand the book for a new edition. This was not possible because each time I tried to do so I continued to push the work off to the next day. Meanwhile demands and requests for the book accumulated. Finally, I decided to review the materials of the study for a second edition, which we are happy to present to you now under a new title African Cosmology of the Bantu-Kongo: Principles of Life and Living.

Is there any difference in form and content between this edition and the first? My answer to that question will be yes, indeed. Its content was revised and expanded where it was possible. This expansion includes a brief description of the Bantu-Kongo concept of mapping the universe [kayengele/luyalungunu] and a new chapter on the "Vee", one of the most secret aspects of the Bantu teaching among the Kongo people.

By reviewing and expanding the old edition, we only had one desire in mind, to see many people walk into this new edition, not only with their fingers and eyes, but with both their minds and hearts and take it as one of the basic tools to understanding the "scientific" structures of the development of old, African traditional scholarship and its ancient schools.

African Cosmology of the Bantu-Kongo is not a collection of some data for some academic exercise which, usually, consists of transferring bones from one graveyard to another. It is a mound of raw materials that require sharp tools and trained minds to work with for individual, societal, and/or academic interests. One has to see it and accept it as a small, but not unimportant piece being added upon our universal, accumulative experience of knowing. Its completion was not simple. Behind its present form stands many close and distant collaborators of whom I will not hesitate to mention, some with all my gratitude: Danny Dawson who pushed so hard to see this book revised and expanded for a second edition. His advice and support were immeasurable. Franklin Stevenson, who skillfully illustrated this edition. Robert Marriott, Lisa Jones and Sarah Khan were essential to the editing process. And last but not least, Catheryn Vatuone, who volunteered not only to read, but edit and type the revised work, Anthony Ferreira and my publishers Roger and Rudolph Francis, Athelia Henrietta Press, Publishing in the Name of Orunmila.

Finally, my profound gratitude to all my masters, dead and alive, who knew how to open my eyes to this rich, traditional African "scholarship" that still flourishes in the wilderness of the minds of the African living libraries.

KÔNGO COSMOLOGY IN GRAPHICS

The following graphics about Kôngo concepts of their world are excerpts based on my book N'kôngo ye nza yakun'zungidila/Le Mukôngo et le Monde qui L'Entourait (ONRD, Kin 1969) and on my unpublished manuscripts Ku Nênga: Verité Sur les Grandes Initiations en Afrique Centrale (1973, pp. 300), and Makuku Matatu: Les Fondements Culturels Kôngo (1978, pp. 450): A summary understanding of these concepts, graphically, is of great help in order to comprehend the main ideas to be discussed in this work: African Cosmology of the Kongo Bantu. In this book I discuss certain concepts such as that of law and crime which link living communities to their ancestors, the spiritualized beings. For an African Muntu, the dead are not dead: they are beings living just beyond the wall waiting for their probable return to the community [ku nseke], to the physical world.

A straight line/skyline [n'lônga - lukôngolo] or a line with an empty circle [mbûngi], in its middle is, among the Bantu-Kôngo, the symbol of emptiness, a world without visible life. That is the emptiness [mbûngi, mwâsi, mpâmpa]. The world in its beginning was empty; it was an mbûngi, an empty thing, a cavity, without visible life. There are, in the empty mbôngi, active forces that can blow up [Mu mbûngi yampâmba mwena ngolo zilènda kubuka kadi zena môyo]. Where there is emptiness and nothingness, act other unknown forces, invisible of course [Kwena mwâsi ye mpâmba kweti sala ngolo zankaka zazîmbwa].

Man's life is surrounded by diverse forces and waves which govern it like in an mbungi [Luzîngu lwa mûntu i zîngu kia mbûngi kiazûngwa kwa ngolo ye minika mia mpila mu mpila miyâlanga kio].

Figure 2.

A fire-force complete by itself, kalûnga, emerged within the mbûngi, the emptiness/nothingness and became the source of life [môyo wawo mu nza] on earth. That is, the kalûnga, complete force by itself, fired up the mbûngi and overran (dominated) it [kalûnga walûnga/kwîka mbûngi ye lungila yo].

The heated force of kalûnga blew up and down as a huge storm of projectiles, kimbwandènde, producing a huge mass in fusion- [luku lwalâmba Nzâmbi] (Fu-Kiau, 1969). Kalûnga then became the symbol for force, vitality and more, a process and principle of change, all changes on the earth [Kalûnga walûnga mbûngi ye lungila yo wayika se n'kingu wa nsobolo]. And by cooling the mass in fusion [zenge-zenge/ladi diambangazi] solidified itself [kînda] and gave birth to the earth. In the process of cooling, [mvodolo/nghodolo] the matter in fusion [luku lwalâmba Nzâmbi] produced water, [luku lwasânda] whose rivers, mountains, etc., are the results (Fu-Kiau, 1969).

The world, [nza], became a physical reality floating in kalûnga (in the endless water within the cosmic space); half emerging for terrestrial life and half submerging for submarine life and the spiritual world. The kalûnga, also meaning ocean, is a door and a wall between those two worlds. Kalûnga became also the idea of immensity, [sêsele/wayawa] that one cannot measure; an exit and entrance, source and origin of life, potentialities [n'kîngu-nzâmbi] the principle god-of-change, the force that continually generates. Because kalûnga was the complete life, everything in touch with the earth shared that life, and became life after itself. That life appeared on the earth under all kinds of sizes and forms: plants, insects, animals, rocks, human beings, etc. (see in Kindoki, 1970).

The number of infinite mass in fusion particles that remained hanging in the upper space [mu luyalungunu] constituted what are known in human languages as sun, moon, stars [ntângu, ngônda, mbwetete] which are in realities other worlds. Man is called to live in certain of those worlds, too (Fu-Kiau, in Môyo, 1969). Kalûnga, the principle-god-of change, is a force in motion, and because of that our earth and everything in it is in perpetual motion. Man himself is an "object" [ma] in motion for he is an around-path-goer [n'zûngi a nzila], in his upper and lower world (Fu-Kiau, 1969). I would like to digress here to give you a brief Bântu-Kôngo concept of mapping the universe according to their teaching. An important step to help you understand more clearly some of the concepts described in this book.

Mapping the Universe

For the Bântu people, the Kôngo in particular, the universe as we see and know it is the result of the "primitive" event that occurred in and around it [dûnga kiantete] well known as luku lwalâmba Nzâmbi, God cooked dough, i.e., the magmatic matters, the big bang (Fu-Kiau, 1969). It is the result of an expanding fire process that leaves behind, through a cooling process [nghodolo], satellites and planets. It is the process of the cosmic, expanding fires [dingo-dingo dia mpiâya yayalanga].

According to the Kôngo teaching, our planet earth was the starting point of this fire [mpiâya yâyi, center/didi] in our solar system [kûndu kiêto, nza, i kênko dia ntônono a mpiâya yâyi mu fu kia ntângu]. On the ground of this old Bântu teaching, the universe can be mapped [tendumunwa/yalwa] in three main layers or zones [nyalu/zûnga], depending if it is in green, gray or red state.

a) Green or breathing planet

[nza yankûnzû/yavûmuna].

Green or breathing planets are living planets because they have completed the four great formation stages of the Kôngo cosmogram known as dikenga dia Kôngo (Fu-Kiau, 1969, 1980, 1991). The key word to these planets is greenness [bunkûnzû], the vitality giving nature.

Green planets, like our own planet earth, can be thought of as the oldest planets to solar systems. The earth, for example, can be seen for the Bântu people as the oldest planet of the solar system. Green planets occupy the center [didi] of systems in our expanding universe.

The expanding creative fire-energy that departed from the first event [dûnga kiantete] or the big bang [kimb-wandènde], was not an experimental explosion from a laboratory say the Bântu-Kôngo. It was a natural (call it divine) imperative order to bring a transformation process into being throughout the universe and into all its planets until their full maturity, i.e. be able to breathe and give/carry life [vûmuna ye vâna/tambikisa môyo]. To our present "knowledge", our planet, the earth, is the only planet known that has so far fulfilled this order: It is green (breathes) and does not only give life, but is able to sustain it up to now as well.

b) Gray planets [nza yavèmba].

Gray planets are planets "without" life yet. They are without life yet because these planets are still in their cooling [ghola] process stage, eventually heading towards their second, third, and fourth stage of dikenga dia Kôngo, Kôngo cosmogram's greatest stages as described by my works (1969, 1986, 1991). The moon [ngônda] and the planet mars [n'kasi a ngônda], which means "wife of the moon", are of this stage.

Planets in this group occupy the second layer of the map, immediately after the green planets' layer. The key word in this zone [lubata] is grayness/dust [vèmba/fundu-fundu], but also dryness [yuma]. These planets are naked, dry and covered with dust. Gray planets are without life as we know it, i.e., they are without plants, animals, and of course, without human beings. The Bântu-Kongo teaching suggests that if left alone, these planets will eventually complete the four stages of planet transformation process which is based on the Kongo cosmogram, i.e., see the rise of plants, animals and beings like humans share life on them.

c) Red/hot planets [nza ya mbengelele].

Red or hot planets are actually burning planets. They are still matters in fusion without a clearly defined shape or form [zenge-zenge diatiya kôndwa mbèlo yasukuswa]. They are at their primitive or "first" stage of planetary formation process, their big bang stage [kimbwandènde]. These planets form the actual last frontier of a system, such as our own. Beyond these frontiers are infinite dark fields to be invaded by the future firing process [dingo-dingo] of expanding systems.

The key words in this zone [lubata] are extreme heat [mbengelele], and greatest temperature [mbangazi]. Here everything is matter in fusion and gas [zenge-zenge ye kaudi]. The red planets without form cannot avoid the dingo-dingo process of the four greatest stages of planetary transformation process of the dikenga, the cosmogram mentioned earlier. They will solidify through the cooling process, then eventually complete all other stages until the cosmogram [dikenga] of each planet is made whole to bear life. Until then, planets in this zone [lubata], because of the intensity of movements, will always continue to collide and shoot in the space [bulana ye tûmba mikala]. The following illustration shows the Bântu-Kôngo mapping concept of the universe [ngyalumun'a nkwal'a luyalungunu] Each circle represents the boundary between planets' zone layers.

Figure 6.

After this short and brief description of the Bântu-Kôngo traditional scholarship on mapping the universe, let's return to the sun's apparent movements around our own planet and its impact or significance in the Kôngo system of thought.

Man is a second sun rising and setting around the earth.

Figure 7.

He has to rise as the sun does in order to Kala, to be, to become, to light fire. The Kala and kalazima concept itself is associated with blackness and is used as a symbol of emergence of life, the physical world [ku nseke]. The ngûnza, spiritual man, is associated with the forces behind this concept and this process. Kala is the strongest will of mûntu's existence as we meet it in his daily expressions:

- Kala/ba mûntu—be a human being, a helpful being
- Kala/ba n'kisi a kânda—be the community's medicine
- Kala/ba nkasi a kânda—be a leader of the community
- Kala/ba ngânga—be a specialist, a true knower, a master, a doer
- Kala/ba n'kingu a kânda—be the principle of the community
- Kala/ba kimpa mu bimpa—be a system within systems
- Kala/ba dièla mu bimpa bia mûntu—be wise and sensible to human systems
- Kala/ba kala, i sa vo n'zimi ye n'kwîki—be alive, be a (coal-fighter), i.e. extinguisher and lighter
- Kala/ba mfumu ye ngânga—be a leader and specialist

- Kala/ba lembanzau kia kânda—be the strongest of the community
- Kala/ba n'kôngo ye n'konguludi a kânda—be a Mukôngo and judge of his community

Figure 8.

Kula, to grow in the way of making one's own history [kikulu] to develop, to mature until reaching the position of leadership and be able to exercise it. Being in the king or leader's place is to be in the position of authority and power. The kala, by the process of growth and maturation, becomes tukula, the red or redness, which is the symbol of mature leadership within the community; it is also the step of the man of deeds [n'kwa-mâvanga]. The collective maturation, its leadership, through the process of collective growth, allows for social and community development. The step Kala-Tukula segment, representing the present time, is the positive one in the upper world, ku nseke, the physically living world.

The tukula position occupies the center of the cone of power and leadership [sudi kia lèndo], which I may also call the "V of life." To grow, to mature [kula] is to be ready to enter into this powerful zone of the V of life. It is very important to understand also that to enter the V of life zone is to stand vertically [telama lwimba-ngânga] inside the V of life [V kia zîngu]. To stand vertically, like a master [ngânga] between the earth and the sky [va kati kwa n'toto ye zulu] and between the upper world and the lower world [va kati dia ku nseke ye ku mpêmbé].

The Egyptian ankh symbol itself is nothing else but a symbol of a master [ngânga] standing vertically inside the

"V" of his community life, as a priest and a leader. The fate of societies, institutions, and social systems all depend on how people of a given society enter this zone.

Figure 10.

Mûntu ukulanga uwânganga kikulu ye kota mu n'lônga wa Bakulu bateka kula. Mûntu wakuya kavânganga kikulu ko; ukotanga mu n'lônga wa bakuya, n'kuyu, i bakulu bambi.—A man that grows up is in the process of making history, and he enters the rank of the ancestors, those well minded people who grew up before him. On the contrary, a man that does not grow up, the one who deviates and is not well minded, is not in the process of making history; he enters the rank of the [n'kuyu] bad ancestors, while living, the deviators, the regressive and "stunted" ancestors.

These ancestors are those individuals who were not able to "telama lwîmba-nganga", to live inside their most aspired V of life zone, the V3. They passed this zone of power, creativity, inventions, and mastery in all aspects of life in a state of blindness. They were asleep, stunted ancestors [Bakulu bakuya].

Lândila tâmbi kia tukula, i bôbo bimvuka ye zinsi, mûntu fwiti kulumuka ku mpêmbe. Nkulumukunu ku mpêmbe i kota mu n'soko wa nsobolo kana vo yakula evo yakuya—After his tukula step, man must descend into the deepest world. This is the same for communities, societies, and nations. The descent at ku mpêmbe is to enter, positively or negatively, the process of change. Luvêmbe, white chalk, is the symbol used at this step. Luvêmbe also means negative elements (toxins) accumulated by a person during his life which leads to the physical death of all living beings. This process is associated with the ngânga, specialist or healer. The life/death struggle is experienced here. The step tukula-luvêmbe in the upper world [ku nseke] is a negative one; it represents the future. This step is also the step symbolizing the process by which former leaders [sîmbi bia nsi] pass over their leadership to the younger generation, very often by initiation [ghândisa biyînga mu kubayekudila kingânga ye kimbuta]. It is the principle of receiving and releasing or the process of life and living [I n'kîngu wa tâmbula ye tam-bikisa evo dingo-dingo dia luzîngu] (Fu-Kiau, 1966).

This world, the physical world, has three basic forces whose leadership is the balance between them. This upper-world is widely known in Kôngo traditional symbolizing system as makuku matatu, three firestones, from the Kôngo well known proverbial theory—Makuku matatu matedim-ina kînzû kia Ne-Kôngo. The three firestones which uphold the social Kôngo structural motor, kînzû. The social structural organization of Kôngo society is shaped and patterned by three basic forces:

1. All growing social forces among zingûnza, heroic youth, future community members, in their kala step.
2. All positive capacities of present leaders and their leadership, n'twâdisi/sîmbi ye kintwâdisi kiâu.
3. The experience of specialists and their specialities, nkuma za bangânga ye kingânga kiâu.

Notice here, that in traditional Kôngo society, to become very important a specialist, was something required of all its members, and was an expression of professional requirement in social life. In Kôngo society, "Everyone is a free individual and a doer/specialist," Muna Kôngo mfumu na mfumu, ngânga na ngânga. A Mukôngo was accepted as such, as an Ngânga in his community if he only could be a doer of something for the well-being of the community; kala ye salu, to have a "métier". This Nza ya ku nseke upper world is based in the real life:

Sun movement: the rising and setting of the sun.

Cycle of human life: birth, growth and death.

Fireplace [zikwa], with its three firestones.

Divinatory calabash in upper world with its three differently colored ingredients, dîngu.

put in lecture

According to the author Batshikama, also a Mukôngo, makuku matatu, the three Kôngo mother provinces which only date from the 13th century to the present time is not to be linked to the Bântu-Kôngo world view. Batshikama's concept of makuku matatu is incorrect. Makuku Matatu, which means the three firestones, is linked with the Kôngo worldview, through its presence in Kôngo cosmogram. The three firestones, or the physical world, [kala, tukula and luvemba] are opposite of the spiritual world, Ku Mpemba. This theory dates back to the beginning of the Kôngo language and culture. The concept of makuku matatu (machua among the Baluba) as a symbol of the upper world, is widespread among the Bântu populations, and yet, there too, it does not have any connection with the erroneous idea of the Batshikama notion stated in his "Voici les Jagaz" (p. 179). The Kôngo ignore Batshikama's theory of makuku matatu because it presents the notion of recent, pre-colonial three mother provinces without connecting their basic and symbolic meaning with the social structural forces of the three firestones.

After crossing the kalûnga line, the doorway towards ku mpêmba, the lowest world, the dead, i.e., the transformed body, grows up too in order to reach the position of musoni, (of sona, i.e., to mark on, to symbol, to engrave) and become a true knower of what is marked on one's own mind and body.

The position of musoni is associated with the notion of ndoki, the knower of man's principles and systems of n'kîngu ye bîmpa higher levels, the kindoki or science of higher knowledge. The manipulation of these n'kîngu and bîmpa principles and systems permitted, say the Kôngo, to assist the ndoki to become a winged person, a flier. An ndoki was publicly affirmed to have "flown from here to Kinkènge and from there to Boma" during a public confession (Diantèzilza, 1970).

to sona

Musoni represents the color yellow, which is believed to be associated with knowledge. In an initiatic ceremony leading to the deepest things, an initiator ngânga will begin his rite by saying Ntete mpèmbe mbo' musoni kalânda. In the ceremony of the descent of passage, first comes luvèmbe, then musoni, the yellow, which reminds the ngânga that things should be done in their natural order. One does not go beyond this deepest world, ku mpèmbe without passing through luvèmbe, the death barrier, the doorway towards it.

The step luvèmbe-musoni at ku mpèmbe is a positive one; it is the period of birth-growth of that world, a penetration through the accumulated cultural roll of the past time in order to regenerate one's own life's potentialities for a possible return of that ngolo, energy, ku nseke, in the physical world.

After accumulation of all spiritual, moral, intellectual or genetic potentialities at ku mpèmbe, when passing through the step of musoni, the Kôngo cosmology tells us, the dual soul-mind mpève-ngîndu is ready to reincarnate (rebirth or re-re . . . birth) in order to rise again in the upper world [kala diâka ku nseke]. This is demonstrated in a continuum of rebirth after rebirth, meaning incarnation after incarnation. The body of ku mpèmbe has then to change (die) in order to be acceptable by an upper world's physical body. The step musoni-kala in the spiritual world is a negative one because it represents the departing step of all descending forces/energies of the lower world.

Figure 15.

A human being's life is a continuous process of transformation, a going around and around, Muntu ye zîngu kiândi i madièdie ye n'zûngi a nzila. The human being is kala-zima-kala, a living-dying-living-being. A being of continuous motion through four stages of balance between a vertical force and a horizontal force. The horizontal force is fundamental, because it is the key to open or to close, to enter or exit the diurnal world, nza a mwîni, ya ku nseke or the nocturnal world, nza ya mpîmpa, ya ku mpêmbe and vice versa. The vertical force, the dangerous and dominant one, is secondary in the balance required for community life [kinenga kia kimvuka], its religious relations.

Use in leadership model/mant → It is the horizontality plane [lufulu lwabwa/lufulu lwa kilukôngolo] that binds all community relationships between its members: its true religion [lukangudulu]. When these relationships are weakened or broken, the community leadership calls for a reconciliation meeting [mu kangulula] to tie again, to re-ligar; the broken relationships are reestablished and the community is balanced [kinenga]. Once these broken relationships are reestablished and the community bio-spiritual "rope" is strengthened, the whole community will stand again lwîmba-ngânga on the vertical plane [kintombayulu] between the earth and the skies, and between the upper and lower world, to communicate to both kalûnga, the completely complete higher living energy [Nzâmbi], and the ancestors [Bakulu].

→ The Kôngo believe that individual people and nations have rolls of life [tuzîngu] in the form of tapes that hold (imprint) records of all their deeds. Because of these rolls hidden in their beings, their past can be revealed, i.e., read like a book [zingumunwa]. On the day of "judgment", the sacred teaching of the Kôngo philosophy- says that each will see his roll of life [luzîngu] unfold and speak loudly before the universe and its "great judge."

Man's life attention, ku nseke, is centered on the n'kisi (N) which is the central and most important element in that world. It is the force-element that has the power to "kînsa", root-word of n'kisi, meaning to take care, to cure, to heal, to guide by all means even by ceremony. The n'kisi takes care of human beings in all his aspects of life in the world because he has a material body that needs care by n'kisi (medicine). Because he lives in a world surrounded by matadi (M), minerals, bimbenina (B), plants, and bulu (b), animals, his n'kisi (N) must be made of compounds from M-B-b.

In the spiritual world the kundu, kindoki, is the central and most important element in this unfathomable world. This element is made up by the experience based on bibulu (b) including human being, the sîmbi (s) i.e., ancestral experience, and on mpêve (m), i.e., soul-mind experience. In this case kundu or kindoki is the lived and accumulated knowledge. This lived accumulated experience-knowledge may be positive or negative for the social life in the community depending on the kind of leadership it has. Because of its double faces, one positive and another negative, it became kundu-man is a liar [kundu n'kwa-mikalú]. One cannot tell about himself what he is, says a Kongo proverb.—Kundu is alike to properties; no one agrees to be rich [Kundu kimvwâma, ka kitambudulwanga ko]. The fact of not agreeing to one's own wealth does not mean that wealth is totally bad. Kindoki, nzailu likewise, is one among the equivalent terms of science in kikongo language, and as to every knowledge it has its positive side as well as its negative one. Kindoki, Nzailu and Bumpitu are synonymous terms, but the last is more proper in lieu of chemistry than in lieu of science.

its cosmological practices. The marriage pattern itself, one of the most important social institutions, symbolizes a basic cosmological pattern where vertical and horizontal forces are keys to that most important institution. Notice the position of each element allied to marriage lôngo. Lôngo itself occupies the position of center (didi), the source of radiation of life. The marriage, in other words, for the Bântu-Kôngo, is a physically living symbol of alliance(s) between, at least, two communities. Therefore, divorce is not an issue of individuals, but of communities involved in the marriage. There is no such thing as "love" in the beginning of a marriage. Love is a process of mutual growth of partners-symbols of communities' alliances. For the Bakôngo, no matter what happens among partners in the lôngo, that lôngo will be held alive as long as alliances between the communities involved remains on good terms. These communities will do their best in order to maintain alive the lôngo.

The marriage, first of all, is a social "deal" for the great interest of the community and its members. It is through family buta, that social forces are transmitted such as norms, values, ideals, etc. Without accord of those forces, it is almost impossible among the Kongo that individuals legally, according to the traditions, form a family buta, no matter how much they love each other. A "buta" formed outside of that accord is always seen socially as "illegal", a social deviation to the part of partners, for lôngo is more than the union of two individuals. Since the children to be born/ engendered by the partners in their lôngo should serve the community, it is important that, that same community or communities have a word to say at the moment the will of lôngo formation appears, i.e., it should be prepared to accept them in recognizing first of all the union of the parents, and this, publicly within the communities, otherwise they will give birth to children, which will, because of social and psychological crisis they may have, become bad leaders or dictators as revenge against the society.

Moreover, all social forces watch at lôngo, the indissoluble institution (in Kongo tradition, there is no legal aspect of lôngo-divorce). Lôngo creates alliances and neutralizes conflicts among parties. The child does not belong to parents, it is a collective, and societal relationship, says a proverb [Wabuta mbâwu ândi kayetila]. By recognizing the lôngo as legal, the society accepts automatically the responsibility to raise all offspring's of such a "lôngo" whereby the African saying, "It takes the whole community/village to raise a child."

* N'kângi-dikânda, the clan's pattern, is a structured totality of structured totalities within a great ensemble of ensembles.

Mûntu, person: set of concrete social relationships, he is a system of systems, the pattern of patterns in being.

Buta, family: father and mother with or without children of their own. In Black African society a man/woman without child has always, in accordance to kinship relationship, those to whom he/she is father/mother with all respect due to a father/mother throughout all social layers from the buta to the nza itself.

* Môyo literally, womb: set of family members of one's grandmother's descent.

Mwèlo-nzo: set of miôyo (plural of môyo)

Kânda: community, set of mièlo-nzo (plural of mwèlo-nzo); an ethnic group or a bio-branch with its own "praise name", ndumbudulu.

Nsi (n'toto): land, region, country

Nza: world, universe.

This last concept, the clan's pattern, and all others shortly described above are among those expressing the Kongo concept of the world, the Kongo cosmology. Without this brief summary, I thought it would be difficult for certain readers to comprehend the African concept of law and crime which will now be discussed below. Many conceptual parts of that African traditional legal aspect will be easily understood thanks to some of the previous explanations. I, now, invite you to read that African aspect of law and crime even though it is not done by a specialist in legal matters.

AFRICAN CONCEPT OF LAW AND CRIME

This study on the African concept of law and crime is based on the Bantu people who live in the center of west Africa, specifically the Bantu-Kôngo. In this analysis I would like to emphasize the traditional concepts of law and crime still practiced by the Bantu-Kôngo people and their neighbors rather than what has been recorded by some European travelers. These Europeans wrote about the culture of the people of this area, including the Bantu-Kôngo, without knowing, even superficially, any African language, man's most important instrument of cultural communication and of social learning patterns and behavior.

One of the most crucial African problems, which leads to anarchy within many African governments today, and therefore cannot be neglected, is the African people's total ignorance of their own traditional concept of law and crime. This ignorance confronts modern African leaders with a dilemma, a certain impossibility of choice. Because they do not have a full understanding of either western or African patterns of law, they cannot totally opt for either system.

With the adoption of the imported legal systems by new African nations, everything since then has turned upside down. Considering what one sees and lives in today's Africa, colonial atrocities are not any more viewed as such. For many outsiders who have witnessed African humanism and its strong wonderful neighborhood among people, verbally and documentary these outsiders tell us that Africa, in many of its parts, is in the wrong hands of "foolish" leaders. African leaders, with few exceptions, are considered foolish men [bimpûmbulu, lauki ye m'bundumuni mia nsi], because they act outside of African traditional legal aspects of leadership. African people themselves agree that the great majority of their political leaders are good for nothing. These leaders could have been excellent governors during the colonial epoch to serve their masters sufficiently. But, by and large, we should recognize one competence: They are very successful about the matter of the competition around colleagues' ladies, a competition that gave birth to what is known in certain African countries as "second-bureaism,"¹ the key to most antagonism in today's Africa; antagonisms which are not very often political or ideological.

¹ Second-bureaism: secret polygamy of elites and bourgeois in certain African countries. A second-bureau is, in those countries, not a second office, but a lady very often officially hired by a governmental or an administrative authority not essentially to play a governmental role in public life, but in the eyes of the hiring side, to serve as a means by which the authority intends to accomplish certain of its secret plans and intentions against certain individuals it considers as its foes.

Unfortunately, African people do not want to try to see through African legal and conceptual framework what is happening now to African leaders. There should be, they say, something wrong going on here. Well, a Kôngo philosophical principle and its variants will enlighten us on the issue. In considering the physical and mental health of a leader, the true leader for a people, the Kôngo people say: Community-chief/leader does not get mental disease [Mfumu-dikânda kalaukanga ko], except otherwise, according to the three variants of the precited principle on the health of a leader:

Variant No 1: "Mfumu-dikânda kalauka milongi katundidi"—a societal leader becomes foolish if he bypasses his people's advice.

Variant No 2: "Mfumu-dikânda kalauka bilesi katundidi"—a community leader becomes foolish if he usurps his people's prerogatives.

Variant No 3: "Mfumu-dikânda kalauka yèmba katûmbudi"—a community leader becomes mentally sick if he intends to destroy the public's fundamental institutions, such as yèmba.

The Kôngo principle of political philosophy cited here tells us that a leader does not suffer any ailment due to his functions be it physical or mental during his mandate if he shares his power, his authority with the people through their elected delegates. On the contrary, according to these three variants of the principle, if he considers himself the law, the people, the synonym of institution, and the state then he may become the object of all kinds of troubles: Overworking or brain-fag, incapacity, nervousness, uncontrolled desire to stay in power, even if unable. Instead of being a leader who listens to the people, he becomes a leader that speaks, matokula, i.e., a leader that imposes on the people his own will contrary to the African traditional concept of a leader's conduct in public affairs. The leader has ears, he does not have a mouth ["Mfumu matu; kavwa n'nwa ko"]. Many African leaders, as well as intellectuals, continue to underestimate their own people by the single fact that those populations do not speak western languages, the "languages of science" as they say. For them, says the imperialistic anthropology of some fifteen years ago, those populations still have "archaic mentalities". That is a grave accusation.² For many leaders, African languages are the poorest ones in the world. They cannot, by any proof, accept that certain among our languages are by far richer than the languages of today's leading technology. With the English word COME "framed" by diverse prepositions, the Kongolese (Kikongo) demonstrates the richness of African languages, languages considered by many as unable to transmit knowledge:

I sometimes ask myself for whom African, even the world's intellectuals and scholars do make fun of? I grew up in a village of at least 1,000 inhabitants (before it knew the rural exodus). There was not a single policeman, the jail was unknown, no secret agent, i.e., a people's watchdog. It did not have a bureau of investigation, no sentry to watch on people's goods. In daytime that village was practically and in its entirety empty without a single person to take care of unlocked doors. Strangers were always welcome. Everybody felt responsible to everybody else in the community and its neighborhood. When a community member suffered, it was the community as a whole that suffered. Until age 25, it was very nice to live in that community, literally a community without problems. Such communities still exist in many parts of the world which are known as "developing regions" where the imperialistic arms race did not yet trouble the peace. But take any modern African city (center of imported civilization) where we find thousands of policemen, security services, schools with their many hundreds of "civilizing" teachers, all kinds of counsellors, all kinds of knowledge unknown in rural milieus, and do not talk about warranted jobs! Could you imagine or tell how many corruptions, fights, insults, falsifications, discriminations, kidnappings, and crimes are made every single day by our leaders and intellectuals in such cities? Any of those cities are as alike as any city in the world. And my question remains, where is that Kimûntu (the state of being human), that we should be?

Africa is suffering now because it has chosen and adopted a law that has less to do with humanity, a law that emphasizes more the life of the disliked, undemocratic, and unpopular leaders and for the no-soul-minded-objects. The weight is so great upon African leaders' shoulders that it is impossible for them to think coherently, and consciously about their national responsibilities. Africa, under such a leadership with such a law, will be good for nothing. Our world needs a new order. Such an order is only possible with a new law in newly born countries. A law that should neutralize present world antagonisms. Africa may greatly contribute in building such an order if it chooses a law that sees man's value and needs first rather than his destruction. African people should unite and strongly stand on their own feet at this time where even the most democratic countries become undemocratic; a time where peace-keeping countries become dictator supporter countries; a time where human rights observers become human slaughter encouragers. African salvation will not come either from the East or from the West; it is entirely an African affair. Our world is frightened about anything because we are entirely dumped in an ocean of human blood and no one can breathe. I hope this study, in its perspective of traditional African law and crime, will be of interest to lawmakers and improve their understanding of these African concepts, especially those related to land and to social structure.

The study is not itself a comparative study of western and African concepts of law and crime, but a description of traditional African legal concepts among the Kôngo, one of the most important zones of the African culture. The elements of law described here could, in the future, serve as sources of information for a comparative study of law and crime. These concepts are important because they reflect the larger society and cultural history. Because of its alliance with western imperialist-capitalist masters, the present African leadership is developing legal systems on western grounds which lack a clear understanding of African cultural traditions in terms of law; traditions which should give rise to authentic and original African constitutions [tusikudukusu, pl. of Lusikudukusu].

It is almost impossible these days to avoid western even eastern influence on African legislature. But the tendency towards westernization or easternization of African legislature raises serious questions: Will western or eastern institutions imported into Africa fit into the cultural "tribal/ethnic" bases? Will not these bases be in perpetual conflict? Will not the replacement of traditional African laws based on taboo by western or other based laws cause some kind of social imbalance on African fundamental concepts and values? Is not the traditional taboo, collectivist or communalist African system the best system for African development? These are some important questions

I would like to discuss, not as a specialist in the matter, but as an African who has been nourished by the daily life experience of this systematic African way of living for more than forty years in my African Kongo community. Not in cities, but in the countryside where the real African life is met, and where most critical African problems are lived, and above all, where languages and cosmologies that generate all African thought and philosophy are still alive.

Most of today's African leaders, in their daily demagogic political speeches recognize that their countries do suffer from one mortal disease whose cure must be immediate. A disease that has become a keyword in all political, economic and philosophical debates in all societal levels worldwide: the question of exploitation. But what is very strange and imperceptible to any human mind is that these same leaders ignore the fact that they are, at the moment, the key-leaders of those African countries where exploitation persists at a faster rate than what was known during the colonial epoch. This exploitation has reached the highest point of national ruin. No one cares about real social and community needs; no one cares about what will be the national next day; no one cares about our positive old ways of thinking and of taking care of our fellow human beings; no one cares about our norms and values; no one cares . . . and so on and so forth, except planning who may be able to shoot at Kele-Kele-dia-Nsi, my opponent; digging for causes and reasons to eliminate anyone attacking insane political behaviors. What means are necessary to stop a particular region or ethnic group progressing in this country. That is the way of thinking and of acting, not of all African ordinary people, but of most of today's leaders of Africa; leaders that do nothing more than killing, hanging, corrupting and increasing the illness among us: the exploitation. It is certain that everybody agrees that as long as this disease remains in its present form, all of Africa will continue following the path of underdevelopment, i.e., of economic slavery. Its populations, the African people, be they Black or White, will remain ill-fed, ill-housed, ill-educated, ill-clothed, and perpetually victims of outside systems, ideologies, values and laws.

No, Africa needs a change because its' populations need it and not because someone else wants it for them. It belongs, first, to every African leader to have the deepest understanding of all of our regional cultures that symbolize ourselves if we hope for a true, real, and profound change in Africa, the first continent of mankind.

An African leader who considers as tribalism our national diversities commits a national crime because, by doing so, he himself denies the existence of the nation itself. Are not ethnic diversities that made USA, Russia and China, great nations! Ethnicity is not a disease, it is, in its diversity, a national pride. Nations are forests—"Nsi mfinda" says a Kôngo proverb. A forest of one type of trees is not a forest, it is a "n'dima" (orchard) no matter how large it is, for a forest is always an ensemble in diversity. Our national cultural, linguistic, artistic, and economic diversities are also our national pride on which our national African Constitutions should be based. These ideas are discussed, especially those based on Kôngo culture, a Bântu ethnic group in the center of west Africa. Let's now briefly talk about this cultural zone and its historical background.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF THE KÔNGO CULTURAL ZONE

Certain parts of Ex-Belgian Africa, as well as certain others of the Angolan Popular Republic and that of the Congo Popular Republic were constitutional parts of the Ancient Kingdom of the Kôngo that was destroyed by the Portugese and its allies in 1482. The Berlin Geographical Conference in 1884–85 divided this Kingdom into three imperialistic zones: One part, part of the present Angola, went to the Lusitanian imperio-dictatorial system; the second, part of the present Congo, to the imperialistic system of France, and the third, part of the present, undemocratic Democratic Republic of Congo, was made the private property of Leopold II, the King of Belgium.

Unable to develop his private property, this rich territory within what the colonists called the “dark continent” (a point of view that opposes that of the ancient Greeks who knew that Africa was the source of their scientific progress). Leopold II gave up the Congo at the consent of the Belgian people in 1908. The Congo of Leopold II then became the Belgian Congo. Since then the Congo entered a period during which its important traditional institutions were systematically destroyed. Boko, the most popular and most important school was destroyed; social and political institutions were prohibited. Kânda, the structural base of the African community life as well as its organizational patterns were disorganized. "Those who were people became apes," says a popular folk song which shows how colonial tortures transformed African people. We were people, but by exploitation we are made apes, working in corvee [Twabèdi kwèto bântu twayikidi bankewa; salanga! o kiniemo!].

The word Salongo, in lingala, is a deformation of kikôngo, "salanga", which had in that case negative connotations during the colonial epoch. It signified dictatorship, wicked authority, forced work, exploitation, and many other similar meanings. Today, it is a political motto, pure and empty pretension of certain African governments used to lead their countries if not to the first, to the second or to the third position of economic development, but never to the fourth one.

African authorities, because of their lack of collaboration with their well informed countrymen and scholars, tend to reverse the national historical truth. This is the case of Salongo in Mobutu's "Zaire", and many other cases. Salongo was a popular folk song among civilians as well as among militarymen. This folk song was the strongest popular song criticizing and insulting the Belgian colonial authority in Congo. This song is a veritable monument of attack against colonialism, the leopoldian one in particular, in central Africa during the time of what is known as "Effort de Guerre" (war effort). I produce here the lingala version of the song after corporal Bandi-Makaya, a veteran of WWI(1914–1918), one of our best informants about our national oral history collected by our efforts at Luyalungunu Iwa Kûmba-nsi Institute.

Opposition against colonialism and exploitation led the country to fight for and win its freedom in 1960. The people's main goal at that time was to build the country upon traditional positive cultural values of all our regions' particularities. Values deeply rooted in our social organizations, in our traditional unwritten legislatures, the fu-kia-nsi, the national socio-structural systems.

Social Organization

The Kongo society, as well as most African societies were and still are, communalistic, i.e., each community self-determines the social, political, economic organization and leadership. "The Kongo had a king up until the time of colonization, but his position was decidedly titular" and the same author continues "The mode of production established a minimum dependence between different community segments and there was no private ownership of the means of production." (Kajsa, 1972:3)

Each local community or Vata, which is relatively independent, has two or more Belo. Each belo has two or more Mièlo-nzo (sing Mwèlo-nzo/mwèlonzo). The Mwèlonzo is divided into Miôyo (singular Môyo). The Môyo is also termed as Buta. The Buta is the smallest but most important institution in Kôngo social and organizational structure. It is here that basic family education is carried out: language, parenthood relationships, a general knowledge concerning local plants as an introduction to popular medicine, community or ethnic history (law, migrations, ancestors), etc. Each of these divisions is a social and political entity which meets to discuss or to regulate community problems under the leadership of the wisest and strongest of the group.

The most important and powerful institution within the community, vata, is the Belo. The Belo is symbolized by its public house where social, political, economic and organizational issues are discussed before being discussed by the community assembly. This public house is called Boko [mbôngi, yèmba, lusânga, kiôto], a word that literally means "house without rooms", i.e., a house in which privacy has no room. I give here certain proverbs related to that basically very important Kôngo social institution, the BOKO:

- 1) "Boko wabokudisa nkuni mu vata." It is the boko that orders the collection of firewood in the village (to make a fire circle for a public hearing).
- 2) "Vata dikôndo mbôngi diafwa." A village without a boko is dead. A society without institutions where public freedom is warranted is straight to its fall.

- 3) "Boko wabokula mambu." It is the boko that breaks (cuts) the affairs in the community. All decisions in the community are public agreements made in public at ku boko, the public house.
- 4) "Boko wabôka mu vata . . ." It is the boko that calls for meetings in the village. Boko, the entire community, decries a state of emergency in the community.
- 5) "Mbila boko ni bèto kulu," the call of boko belongs to all of us. Public institutions are public; individuals cannot make them private affairs. The public call makes us all stand.
- 6) "Mbôngi wabônga mambu," variant "Mbôngi wabôkila mambu." It is the mbôngi that takes care, investigates, all affairs in the political, economic, social, and diplomatic matters, in order to discuss them publicly in the view and the hearing of all community members. Community alone can do what is best for its members.
- 7) "Lusânga wasangumuna mambu." It is the boko that raises problems and issues of all orders, be they of yesterday, today, or the future. The community alone is aware of the problems of its members. The Boko/mbôngi can undertake any project for the welfare of its members.
- 8) "Lusânga didi dia kimvuka." The lusanga/boko is the center, think tank of community activities (mvemono). Outside of this "didi dia kimvuka," man's activities are sterile.

- 9) "Yèmba wayembamana mambu ma kânda." It is the boko that covers community affairs. The community covers more than what one can say.
- 10) "N'samu katoma ku kiôto; kabîya ku kiôto." All solutions are possible at ku boko. Conflicts are not discussed outside of the community institutions.
- 11) "Kiôto kiôko kia kânda kalâmbanga." It is the boko that cooks community inhalation. The community healing meal is made at the boko. The boko is the healer of community diseases, problems of all orders.

The short list of these Kôngo proverbs shows how the Boko is an important social institution among the Bântu-Kôngo, where only public and community affairs are discussed. To speak about private affairs in this public institution, yèmba, is a public crime. One does not plot inside Kôngo public institutions. It is interesting to notice here that the external part of a house, veranda, among the Kôngo is called yèmba, i.e., the public part of the house. This part is for public use, to sit, work, gather, take shelter or even sleep under it. The owner of the house has no right against those acts. Another very interesting Kôngo proverb/principle says "What you think belongs to you, but what you say belongs to the public," [Ma ku nsia n'tima, mâku; matèle, ma ku mbazi.]. Inside you are you; outside you are not. You are only a tiny part of a huge and coherent body, the community within the universal totality.

The community council of elders [mfûndu a mbuta za vata] meets in the boko. Their duties are to review and discuss all questions related to the community life and submit their proposals to the community assembly of honored elders [fôngo dia mfumu ye ngânga za vata]. Members of the community council are sent to the community assembly. The boko is also the center, didi, of cultural information. It is here that research or study on social problems is done. It is here also that new members in the community, visitors, make their first step toward integration in the community. All personal and political alliances are made in the boko in public view and by public accord. All decisions made ku boko have "force de loi" (force of the law).

When the community assembly [fôngo dia vata] meets, delegations from other communities are free to participate in the assembly in the interest of their own communities. Here each belo, as a delegation, carefully handles all pertinent questions concerning the community life.

In any assembly, the community delegations can discuss all issues pertaining to community except the three issues of community/clan, land, taboo (Kânda, N'toto, Kîna). The community land is untouchable, it is considered taboo [kîna or n'lôngo] because it belongs first to the eternal community roots, the ancestors, (the real living gods) as well as to the people in the living community. Traditionally every assembly must start with alternatively repeated mottoes called "bikûmu" (Fu-Kiau 1973):

Kûmbisi: Kîna kia n'toto!
Kûmbi: Kîna kia nsi
Kûmbisi: Kîna kia nsi!
Kûmbi: Kîna kia n'kângu!
Kûmbisi: Kîna kia n'kângu!
Kûmbi: Ndefi tûka mu bakulu!
Kûmbisi: E n'singa-dikânda!
Kûmbi: Nînga ka tabuka ko!

Leader: The land taboo!
Audience: Country's taboo!
Leader: Country's taboo!
Audience: People's taboo!
Leader: People's taboo!
Audience: Infallible oath!
Leader: What about the community's bio-string!
Audience: It must be strengthened, not be cut down (weakened)!

These very powerful dialectical aphorisms and chants are used by the Bântu-Kôngo when publically dealing with serious situations menacing a structurally fundamental, social organization or institution, such as boko or a public good such as land. Such "Kûmu", dialectic aphorisms, are considered to be public legal oaths, and at the same time, become social taboos, i.e., as Balikci states, "The first automatic defense mechanism against uncontrollable and unpredictable dangers" (Balikci, 1970:223). Defense mechanism values of N'singa-dikânda's accumulate by the community in the course of time. The n'singa-dikânda is the moral, social, spiritual, cultural, and physical link between community members, but also between them and their ancestors, the eternal root not only of life, but also of the law. The n'singadikânda is the biological string that links all community members, dead or alive, to both ends of the rope.

Through its community council and community assembly, the Kôngo society makes its laws and trains its youth for national and community defense. Because the army had to serve the community's interest, it was the responsibility of all people to educate their young men and women. "In the Kôngo there was no real standing army. Soldiers were recruited by general mobilization" (Kajsa, 1978:79). The army in the old Kôngo was by and for all people. The main mission of such a populist army was to kick all enemies out of the ancestral taboo lands. The defense of the land was and still is the cornerstone of oral and unwritten legislation. One who knows the Kôngo land holding system, knows its social organization, and therefore its concept of law and crime in the past as well as the present.

The Ancestral Land

One of the essential characteristics of the Kôngo system of property is its inalienability. There is no valuable condition that could change this inalienability of the ancestral land. "Land was not a commodity to be bought and sold. Land was inalienable in the traditional system. Each domain was owned by a certain matrilineage which could indeed grant the use of a part of its area to a relative or even foreign matrilineage, but this did not mean that it gave up its land rights." (Kajsa, 1978, p 71). In their fu-kia-nsi, the unwritten law, the traditional land system, the Kôngo say to sell community land is to carry a mortal yoke[Wateka n'toto wa kânda neti ngôroro/vangu]. Malengreau also wrote about this same concept of the inalienability of the land among other Bântu people of the Congo basin. He says that the African communalistic concept of society was based on a very strong law, that of "the indivisibility and the inalienability of the land" (cited by Muller, 1956:13). Whoever does not have access to land is dead; no matter how rich he/she is.

Contrary to what is happening in the Modern African puppet states, with a few exceptions among the more progressive countries, "The chief of the community is not the landlord, but only a manager of the interests of the community of which he is the head, (Muller, 1956). That is why it was almost impossible to corrupt a true African societal leader as the Kôngo will say the community leader is uncorruptible for he knows kinswèkila, corruption, is a pitfall to the community and to the country, Mfumu-dikânda katâmbulanga kinswèkila ko, n'tâmbu kwa kânda ye nsi]. Today, kinswèkila (embezzlement) has become current money among leaders in Africa. When Africans talk about what oral traditions say about land ownership, most scholars, bought by capitalist-imperialist companies and corporations, often reply that they do not trust unrecorded traditions; they totally ignore what their friends, other fellow scholars, have recorded about the African concept of land ownership. There are many documents by western writers and reporters on African oral traditions related to the issue of land ownership. Most of them point out the upholding of this concept throughout most African societies and communities as one Africanist scholar writes, "The clan possesses lands in title of occupation and of use, i.e., to live on it and for it. The right of occupation and the right of use belong, not to the chief of the clan but to the entire collectivity" (DeCleene, 1946:25).

Capitalist-imperialist forces did not understand the African concept of the land holding. European colonial exploitation introduced the theory of "vacant land" in Africa ignoring totally, as Malengreau (cited in Muller, 1956:10) states that "The territory is the property of the community . . . vacant territory does not exist." The uncultivated lands left in the natural process of refertilization according to the African traditional rotary system were seen by Europeans as wasted and vacant lands. The African rotary system was instituted in order to avoid the impoverishment of the soil in a continent, such as Africa, with a very harsh and drastic climate. Without knowing the reason for what they saw and believed as a precarious abandonment of the land, they seized it because they had firearms and made it "vacant." Due to the possession of arms and aggressive technology, the colonization ordered the expropriation and relocation of native communities. They declared all of what was believed to be vacant land the state's land, i.e., the property of European settlers, the colonialists. It was by this process that the illegal and minority governments of Southern Africa seized the lands they occupy today, where they built the most inhumane governmental system that man has experienced since the beginning of time: the western, Christian, apartheid system (in Zimbabwe and in Azania).

The Congo Free State, freed from western penetration through an ordinance on July 1, 1885, gave the mining company of UMHK (Mining Union of Higher Katanga) an area larger than half the size of Belgium. Many other domains and concessions were also freely distributed to other allies of imperialism (Kajsa, 1972:73). Lemarchande states the same view "Thousands of acres were given to missionaries, private companies and settlers." (Lemarchande, 1964:11). Only good and fertile land was expropriated. Land was also automatically expropriated at any time once a mineral was found on it. This expropriation of good, fertile, and rich soil, between 1910 to 1930, became the principal cause of malnutrition, disease, the increase of the death rate, and a rural exodus. The transfer of African community land to capitalistic and private ownership was the key to the destruction of the traditional African institutions of law and justice. This same factor became, since 1950 to the present, the main cause of struggle on the African continent, the struggle to free taboo ancestral land from the hands of corporations and their allies.

The existing legislature in Africa cannot free the African people because that legislature is sterile and alienated from its true cultural and environmental milieu. It is not rooted within the people's culture. As Yabila says "The law becomes sterile when one separates it from its milieu" (Yabila, 1974:78). Its primary goal is to defend existing and future adventurers' properties and interests in African land, the people's land which is a taboo ancestral land. There needs to be a radical change in this legislature today because "The law is not only a science, a set of techniques of analysis, but a vehicle of culture" (Yabila, 1974:79). That law, in order to be take root in African society and serve as a cultural vehicle, must rise from within the people's culture. The law must speak the same language spoken by the people and be written in that language. All modern African constitutions and laws are written in foreign languages—the fact that they are written in languages unknown by the majority of the African populations, is already depriving the African masses of one of their most important rights, that of knowing their law. To understand the law fairly, exactly and completely is a human right. African laws are not, in that case, written for the African people, they are written for those who are interested in exploiting Africa and its people in order to facilitate their tasks, that of underdeveloping Africa.

In certain countries only 1% of the entire population could read and understand the official language in which laws are written (Fu-Kiau, 1969a:12). In many African countries, documents, newspapers, and books related to governmental activities often are not allowed to be sold in the country. They are kept in secrecy from the citizens, but exploitative companies and corporations have all rights of access to them. This fact shows and proves that most African governments work as agencies of foreign governments.

Changes in matter of law are almost impossible in Africa because of the state of African parliaments existing there today "The parliament as it is . . . retards the application of vital decisions and does not play its role of guardian of the public interest" (Young, 1965:355).

African parliaments cannot function with efficacy for the people's well being because of the external influences which always try to "buy" all sons of the continent who are supposed to be responsible for it. This situation has gotten worse for the case of Zaire since the withdrawal of the UN army forces in 1963. The removal of the international forces from the Congo (Zaire) gave way to a new situation: Neo-colonization and its intensification. The country found itself in a situation where it could find no solution to its problems. As Young says "There are no doubt solutions, but no one among them leads automatically to success because in all circumstances the external influence became again more and more important since the retreat of the UN forces (Young, 1965:356). As such, internal struggles will continue in Africa until change in the interest of the masses occurs.

The African masses fight today because their present leaders continue to follow the path of a very negative capitalism, which is not their way of life. This capitalism results in crimes against innocent and peaceful people by preventing them access to their ancestral tabooed land and the joy of liberty; the liberty of political participation. The African masses see the behavior of their leaders as a public crime. They will be judged as well as their supporters.

Crime

One talks about "committing a crime" in western judiciary language. But in most African cultures, and that of the Kôngo in particular, one says "Nata n'kanu," bearing a crime. One must discuss the contrast between these two concepts in order to more easily understand the African concept of crime. This distinction is basically linguistico-cultural. Understanding "les-jeux-des-mots", wordgames, is very important in any study of two or more distinct cultures. A wordgame is a key word to intellectual or scientific understanding. In English one "feels a pain"; in Kongolese (Kikôngo), one "sees a pain," [mona mpasi]. When an Englishman "smokes a cigarette," a Mukôngo will "drink a cigarette" [nwa saka/nsûnga]. In English one "smells a certain perfume," the Mukôngo will "hear it" [wa nsûnga]. When western school defines man as "an intelligent animal, an imperial animal" or as a "toolmaker," as do the non-initiated African scholars, the westernized, i.e., the "kiyînga" in the African way of thinking; the "Ngânga," the intitated African man in the African way of thinking, who is a specialist of perceiving the world's things, will, himself prefer to say that the human being is a system of systems [Mûntu i kimpa kia bimpa]. He is also variably called "n'kîngu a n'kîngu"—a principle of principles, i.e., the pattern of patterns. Because "mûntu," the human being, is the key system of systems, he is able as such to produce materially and technologically other mechanical systems¹. For the Bântu, in accordance to the concept expressed in the Kôngo language, man is not an animal, nor is he comparable to one, "mûntu," the human being has the dual [mwêla-ngîndu] soul-mind that distinguishes him from the rest of the things of nature² [ma-bia-nsemono].

When the physical body dies, says a Mûntu, the dual [mwèla-ngindu] of that being remains within the community or out of it. The dual of the being [Mwèla-ngîndu], continues to act and to talk to and among the community's members as well as to the world's community, through dreams and visions, waves, radiations, and through monumental acts: the biological, material, intellectual and spiritual treasures accumulated in scrolls [ku mpèmba], the past, i.e., the perpetual bank of the generating/driving forces of life. (See figure 17). There is no end in the dingo-dingo process, the perpetual going-and-coming-back of life as well as in the Mûntu's [mwèla-ngîndu]. Life is a continuum through many stages (as discussed in Makuku Matatu). For the Bântu, there is no death and no resurrection; for them life is a continual proces of change. An animal's life [zîngu kia bulu/môyo a bulu] does not have the dual [mwèla-ngîndu] soul-mind. It does not follow the process because the animal is not a system of systems [kimpa kia bimpa]: it's not a vertical being, it is a prostrated being. Animals are horizontal beings, they move and act instinctually. The mûntu, human being, is a V-H-being [kadi kiatelama lwîmbangânga va lukôngolo]. He stands vertically on his feet first, he thinks and reasons before moving horizontally to meet the challenges of life and of the world.

These differences in feeling, thinking and perceiving are similar to the concepts of social and structural organization. Outside of the expressions "drink tobacco" [nwa saka], pull tobacco [benda fûmu], suck tobacco [wèla nsûnga], and [tompisa fumu] smoke or fire tobacco, it is almost impossible to find in English the correct conceptual meaning a Mukôngo gives to the term smoke in his or her tongue. This tells us how impossible it is to impose a new system that cannot possibly fit on a people who already have their own system of thought. In the west one believes that he/she is born with his knowing power (IQ). The African individual who is initiated to principles of life and living will say no. Knowledge (IQ) is not in us. Knowledge is outside of us. The only thing we have in us is the power to shelve the information or data in us and reproduce it at will. One cannot dance with ease in a borrowed wrap (N'lele ansômpa ka utominanga makinu ko). It is wrong for one system to try to manipulate or impose one's way of thinking upon other systems. Such an attempt only worsens the world's relationships, a confirmation of the total lack of know how in the area of, knotting (coding) and unknotting (decoding) in one's own life [kânga ye kutula mu luzîngu]. But let us go back to the concept of crime.

². The translation of Mûntu as a person or human being is more accurate than the word "man," which has its equivalents as "bakala, mobali, jend" in certain Bântu languages.

In the western concept, the individual seems to be responsible for his crime. He is either conscious or unconscious of it; it is only committed by him. The western expression "to commit a crime" does not seem to have any historic or cultural implication. But in the case of the Kôngo, the expression, to bear a crime [nata n'kanu], there are cultural, linguistic, social, environmental, and genetic/biologic roots. The individual, before committing any crime, carries a certain set of learned criminal concepts, images, expressions, symbols, discussions, words, habits, and facts upon diverse social scenes. In other words, for the Bântu, a crime is the result of an internal psychological state carried by an individual since his childhood, mainly accumulated during the period of growth when the child acquires social patterns. That state is given to him by his social, cultural, physical, and systematic environment within which he is bathed by negative as well as positive waves/radiations [minika/minienie].

Crimes are not individual acts. They are, in many cases, earlier social creations which do not appear until later, at the moment they are committed by an individual who only is the symptomatic furuncle of the criminal radiations accumulated within the society.

Crimes are found within social and cultural patterns; in the food and in the way a society eats that food; in its taboos; in its language, and the vocabulary used to communicate concepts, ideas, and values; in the way alien cultures are interpreted, and in the way social, cultural and ideological discrepancies are understood.

Before he goes to initiation [ku kânga, ku kôngo or ku lôn-de] (Africa) or to school (other societies), the child learns such concepts as steal, kill, lie, sin, rich, poor, minority, foreign, mine, yours, illogical people, reserved for green people only, etc. It is through this kind of socialization that the concept of crime is transmitted to members of a particular cultural system. Societies as well as systems prepare their own foes and their own underminers. Crimes are foes and underminers of societies and systems. They are the conduct of societies and systems. The repetition of a criminal act shows how bad a system is. Crime, for the Bântu-Kôngo, is a learned behavior, and it is possible to eradicate it from human society.

To teach young men any word that has a negative connotation for the community is regarded as injecting criminal roots within the community. The African people and the Kôngo in particular, believe that the reason for committing a crime is relative to the crime and social or cultural system in which he lives. In other words, a social system either favors or does not favor crime. In pouring war-like toys in our communities, children are engaged in the easiest process of learning how to commit crimes. In other words, the war-like toys' industry has industrialized crimes within human society.

When a crime is committed, judgment should not only be passed on to the criminal, but also on to the entire community in which the crime found its roots. A community in which a man or a woman poisons his or her spouse would have trouble finding new alliances with other communities, and one will say to such a community: Be aware that that community gives poison by all means [kânda diôdio ndîkila bavânanga]. As a consequence, nobody will shake hands anymore with someone from that community; nobody will politically deal with such a community; nobody will seek water in such a community; nobody will dream to marry in such a community no matter how beautiful the youngsters are in that community; and nobody will seek a good friend in that community. Such a social behavior among the Kôngo tells how the crime is not seen as an individual act, but as a social one. If the poison used was developed within the community for other reasons other than killing, the community, its holders of the community [sîmbi bia kimvuka], will develop a strong social and legal ethic about the use of that poison.

In a society in which people believe in the concept of bearing crimes before possibly committing them, punishment is first considered communal before being an individual matter, and as a consequence the elders discipline on the young is very important.

The Kôngo society is a good example of a society whose entire social structure is basically a taboo system. The most important taboos are those related to the land, goods from that land, and all matter related to the community name. As such, most of what are considered crimes are related to the issue of land, the source of all goods for the survival of life.

a) Crimes concerning the land

We have already said above that the right of land ownership belongs only to the community. No one in the community could claim private ownership to any position of the land. To own or sell land is considered one of the most serious crimes that an individual may commit, crimes for which he may not be forgiven by community members. Land, because it is an inviolable taboo, should remain in the service of all community members.

During his lifetime a community member has the right to harvest his fields and fruit trees, but after his death, the land and all property on that land, i.e., fruit trees, houses, industries, farms, etc. go back to community ownership. This kind of property inherited by the community, according to the basic concept and taboo of the inalienability of the land, is called fwa-dia-kânda. The fwa-dia-kânda is an accumulated heritage that enforces community control of land and all properties related to it. These properties constitute the basic sources of kânda's common-wealth [mvwîlu a kânda] also called kimvwâma kia kânda or mayudukwa ma kânda used to solve kânda's diverse problems [lânda n'samu mia nsi ye mia kânda] or to assist community members in time of need.

b) Individual wealth is an abominable crime

Individual wealth of all kinds above the accepted standard of necessary goods, is considered a crime. One says that this kind of wealth could not be accumulated without exploiting [wuka/yiba] other members of the community. In that case, the wealth itself is called kimvwâma kia muyeke, wealth that betrays, yekula, the community and its members. The owner of such excessive properties was often killed or hoodooed [lokwa]. African communities believe strongly that the individual accumulation of property has always had negative effects on the traditional social structure and on policy-making institutions.

The traditional social system of the Kôngo does not permit rich people to lead national or community institutions because a proverb says a rich man never talks or fights for other people's interest unless it is to further his own interests. [Mvwâma nsusu; kanwâna, mâki mândi katânini]- That is why traditionally, wealth does not play a role in either the social ranking system or alliance making among the Bântu (Muller, 1956:8). This situation is changing today because the same rich individuals have the power to buy guns which give them not only more power, but the license to kill whoever they declare as dangerous. Firing squads are increasing throughout the African continent, not of criminals, but of innocent individuals who are challenging corrupt practices of politicians.

c) To misrepresent his kimvuka is a political crime

A Kôngo proverb says politics is a community matter; the individual does not make community policies, for individual policy was unknown since the time of the ancestors [Kinzônzi kia kânda; kia kingenga bakulu (ka) basîsa kio ko]. The individual does not make community policies says another Kôngo proverb one mouth is an empty calabash [N'nwa mosi tutu]. Kôngo traditional thought explains clearly that all people develop and direct community policies. Individuals do not make policy even though they are allowed to represent the community by delegation. An individual who is going to represent the community policy is publicly tested before being sent on any diplomatic mission. If he fails by misrepresenting the community he is buried alive in a public place, generally in the market place, zându (Munzele, 1965).

To misrepresent the people or the community insists Mbuta Munzele in his marvelous book on Kongo traditions, is to compromise the future of the community. In order to show the seriousness of such a political crime, in accordance to the law, the criminal was buried alive publicly in the market place. Before his burial, the criminal made a public statement of his crime, gave advice to future representatives of the community policy and diplomacy, and thereafter he was thrown alive in a burial hole. Mbuta Munzele clearly tells us that his diplomatic mission [kin-tumwa kia maghûbi /kinimalônde] was one of the most dangerous functions. Failure in such a mission led straight to a cruel and inevitable death.

Political and diplomatic missions were akin to deification for those who knew how to handle the people's responsibility. Coming back from an important and successful mission for my community, a sîmbi kia nsi, literally, holder of the country's equilibrium, a wise man took my hands, spit on them, and said: "If you season the policy of people and the community correctly, you are deified" [Watwîsa mûngwa ye nûngu mu kinzôzi kia n'kângu ye kânda, zâmbusu]. This Kongo proverb shows us that only obedience to the people's will makes people heroes and gods and not otherwise for the red carpet is not requested, it is earned [nkwâl'a luzitu ka yilômbwanga ko].

Because of the embodiment of this concept of others before oneself, the Bantu's daily expression tends to eliminate the subjective and egoistic use of "I" when dealing with important social issues. They prefer to build their thought on "ancestral" basis, i.e., historic and taboo basis, the accumulated knowledge and experience: the ancestors in their experience have said or the past says [Bakulu bata ngana] or [Bambutu bata ngana]; according to ancestors' law [Ngana yata bambutu]; the spiritual holders of the country have said [Simbi bia nsi vo]; accordingly to the unwritten law, the traditional constitutions [Lândila fu-kia-nis]; Country's practices, norms, values, patterns, and systems do not say it [Kisinsi ka kitèle bo ko], etc. All these expressions are judiciary, legal and sententious expressions mainly used in public statements, or to fit one's own thought within the framework of social patterns and values, but also to avoid culpability before the law and public condemnation of selfishness. There is no creation outside of people. Pretended individual creation, according to Kôngo thought, is a lie and a social crime: creations are collective works, because they are people's accumulated thoughts [Mpângulu mayîndu mantotikisa]. In other words, they germinate from collective ideas. Notice here that the period in which proverbs were created [tându kiatewa ngana], is a broad historical period that transpires before colonization; a period in which the African Muntu was able to think and create freely. There is a huge split between that period and the present time in Africa. The present Africa "swims" within a period without "ngana," (principles, theories, concepts or systems), this is a period of the oppressed man, i.e., the man without a brain, a brainwashed man. This is the suffering Africa, because it goes against, autocritique and collective dialectics [ntungasani ye kinzônzi], its own concepts.

For the Bântu, and the Kôngo in particular, it is a crime to own property that is worth more than the standard wealth of ordinary members of the community. Such property could not be obtained by honest means without taking the path of exploiting the community and its members [wuka kimvuka ye biêla biândi]. Here is a widespread aphorism that community members sing (cite) before a meeting that deals with serious social, political, economic or criminal issues within the community (excerpt from Makuku Matutu).

This very poetic and political aphorism of folk teaching demonstrates how the dialectical philosophy of "primitive" African collectivism is rooted among African societies in general, and among the Bântu in particular. African collectivism practised among the Bântu-Kôngo rejects poverty as well as private ownership of property such as land, industries, means of production, etc. Such properties should only be owned and controlled by the community. The attention in this community is more centered on man as part of a body, the community, [kânda/mumvuka]. As such, that part must obey the community law, and not the contrary of that n'kîngu, principle. The Kôngo concept of wealth and kânda does not mean that the Kôngo reject the practical money value; they, of course, do need money within the community to serve its members, not to oppress them, for they say—When you engender offspring, you must also engender the material goods to secure their life [Wabuta, buta na mbôngo].

Debate Process

According to Kôngo: social, political, economic, and judiciary matters must be discussed publicly. This concept is confirmed by the frequent use of two proverbs: There is no privacy in affairs [Kingenga kia mambu kwanâna], and for want of going alone, the river is curved [Nto wayenda bukaka wakôndama]. All problems related to man within this context are social, economic, and political. And all social, economic, and political problems are problems of the peoples' interest; they should be discussed publicly to instruct both idiot and intelligent individuals [Mazoba ye bandwenga balwengila mo].

The existence of public courts [Mbasi-a-n'kanu or fundusulu] among the Bantu exemplifies how community life was more important than that of a particular individual despite the material wealth he has, "Wealth does not play a role in the social ranking system, or in alliance making." (Muller, 1956:8). Human and communal values are more important than all the property a rich man may possess.

When conflict occurs within the community, the eldest of elder leaders calls for a public hearing/meeting with a general delay of one to two weeks if the issue does not need an immediate solution (the Kongo traditional week had four days). He may urge that the meeting take place sooner, if it is a serious situation. This meeting always takes place beneath the shadow of a tree under which the court of judgment [Kiânzala kia mfundusulu] is arranged. Under this tree experts investigate the issue at hand, its ramifications, and its effects on the community life. The debate is carried on dialectically through diverse songs, slogans, proverbs, aphorisms, calls and responses followed by comments. The accused is seated within the circle and any community member is allowed to ask this person questions. The main goal of this procedural investigation is to understand social problems and conflicts through the accused and therefore try to find a remedy to cure him as well as the entire community [nzila mu lâmba kiôko/kiôto kia kânda].

When the discussion of the case is over, two commissions [mfûndu] are set up. The first, a commission of decision [mfûndu za luzèngo], and the second, a commission of social reintegration [mfûndu za lutambudulu or mfûndu za bindôkila]. The first commission is established specially to take judicial measure fitting the case, e.g., death in case of extreme violation of communal law and taboo. This commission is only composed of men and women considered as outstanding dialecticians/judges [Zônzi biakafu-kafu], and whose names are chosen because of their interest in the total defense of the community and the inalienability of the ancestral land.

The second commission [mfûndu za lutambudulu] or the reintegration ritual commission is more ethical than the judiciary one. Its mission is to find out means and a process by which social balance will be reestablished and its law reinforced. But also, in the case of small infractions, to establish a ritual process by which the guilty or the deviant will be reintegrated in the community life by the ritual of forgiveness [Yambudila] (Fu-Kiau, 1969:68-70) or, in the case of a criminal, how he will be healed or punished.

Each commission gives, orally and in detail, a complete report to the public. It is up to the public to accept or to reject the commission's proposed decision. In case of public rejection, the case is left, very often, in the hands of the elders and the decision made by these men and women is rarely rejected. It is said to be very frightening anytime the womens' side favors a strong decision.

Elders, in the Kôngo judiciary structure, form the highest body of justice, the court, [mbasi-a-n'kanu]; in other words, judiciary institutions in the Kôngo system are communal and independant. The king's duties were more diplomatic, martial, and monetary rather than internal administration, "Each community was a real state within the kingdom" (Fu-Kiau 1973).

The Kôngo concept of law and crime as described here is not well known by the outside world, even by those who were their oppressors, the former colonial masters. This ignorance is due to two main factors: (1) The ethnocentrism of the western world as built upon the colonial phenomenon which is seen as "The domination of a native majority by a minority of foreigners in the name of racial and cultural superiority" (Balandier, cited in William, 1972:8). This notion of racial and cultural superiority prevented the colonialists from objectively seeing the cultural values of the colonized. (2) Colonial masters had a different goal in Africa contrary to the one often stated as the "Mission of civilization." Their goal was and still is the exploitation of natural wealth or resources in order to further their own economy back home. "There is no development here, but only commercial exploitation of natural wealth" (William, 1972:10), and he continues "To sum up, all aspects of the . . . venture were subordinated to purely economic consideration. The educational system produced the skilled and semi-skilled workers needed for the exploitation of the Congo, while missionary organizations installed in these same workers a morality based on order and authority. Because of these goals conlonialism-imperialism did all in its power to destroy African cultures and traditions (what it continues through present African leaders) in order to deepen its racist and exploitative philosophy that left the heritage problems faced in Africa today. Fortunately they were not able to destroy the African "vibrating rolls/knots" of the period of thinkers [tându kiatewa ngana] which are accumulated "ku mpèmbe, the perpetual bank of driving forces of life.

Yet Africa is in conflict today because of these artificial structures established by artificial African law, a law that is against the will of the African people. Africa struggles because it seeks to cut itself away from all the exploitative chains it is tied to. All investments, properties, concessions, etc. granted today in Africa under the present artificial law, are not secure for African systematic way of organization [Kimpa kia kisinsi] will not tolerate such departures from our kisinsi, the African way of life organization, and because these proprietorships support present inhumane regimes throughout Africa. Sooner or later Africa will uncover, through cultural driving forces, its taboo principles, the law of the inalienability of the ancestral land, etc. Whatever capitalism or communism may do in Africa by corrupting its leaders, Africa will never adopt any of these systems because none of them, in all their betterment, could fit well in Africa. The African future will be built on its own norms and values that are deep-rooted in its own systems, which are unfortunately unknown by the great majority of its leaders, our African Kisinsi. Since this system is not discussed scholarly elsewhere, it seems important to me, before ending this chapter, to describe shortly what makes the main difference between this system and other systems, i.e., capitalism and socialism/communism [Kinyudiki/Kimayudukwa ye Kimumvuka/Kikintwâdi].

Capitalism, on a national level, is a system whereby the work of the majority of people produce the wealth for a few individuals who are owners of means of production. On an international level, capitalism is a system by which the world's developing countries provide the work and raw materials, to make the wealthy minority gain. In other words, the slavery of man by man is the basic source of capitalism and its expansion in the world. This capitalistic view is different from the communistic one. Communism, on the contrary, is a system that tries to control in the name of the state the wealth and the land of a given country pretending equality among its citizens. These two systems, capitalism and communism/socialism are, by all means, in the African view equally imperialistic systems. These two systems are the cause of the world's insecurity because of their superficial antagonism. Because of the lack of their mutual understanding they are destructors of international institutions, and above all, they are killers of the world's order and its leaders. They are indeed "oiseaux de même plumage" (birds of the same feather) whatever their tensions are. Neither system lives without their hand on the gun because they only own by the art of killing.

Contrary to capitalism and communism/socialism, the African "Kisinsi" is different. What the Bantu-Kongo, Luba, Mongo, Nyarwanda, Zulu, etc., constitute in their daily life is a system [kimpa/fu] whereby the land, source of happiness and blessing to all terrestrial life, belongs not to individuals, landlords, or to a state, as it respectively exists in the case of capitalistic and communalistic systems, but to the essential fundamental community, kânda, and all its members, be they poor, rich, scholars, idiots, young or elder. They all have full access to that inalienable land. As a Kôngo proverb says, "Community land is our life" [N'toto wa kânda ni môyo èto].

The Kisinsi is a system by which the chief is a symbol, the mâmbu, (literally words, affairs, policy) belong to the people of the community (society) in its entirety. In the African system, Kisinsi, the individual is never a land belonging to heirs. The right to heritage belongs to the community only. The African Kisinsi is explicit here by the Kôngo society, that it is a system where leadership is a moving force [Kimfumu ma kiantûmba] held through the "stooling" process [mu ntûmbulu] under the control of all social forces throughout their political, philosophical, religious, and productive relationships in all locative levels, conceptually and cosmologically generated here (see figures 6 through 17) from Kala, emerging life level and its growth towards leadership, to Tukula, present authorities' level and its leadership; from Tukula, through Luvèmba, the step for greatest change and for abandonment of all negative accumulated elements within the system, to Musoni, the social jinn, [sîmbi bia nsi], the step for regeneration of forces, potentialities, and vitality needed to reshape and rebuild the system, i.e. the rebirth of the process, or the dingo-dingo, the constant back and forth flow of energy of change. On the basis of these cosmological ideas, the concept of dictatorship is impossible in the African Kôngo-Kisinsi discussed here through its cosmological ideas.

The Kôngo-Kisinsi is a conceptual system which is aware of Mwisikânda, the human community members, rather than about outsiders' interests [n'luta mia banzênga]. Kisinsi, a strong and fundamental African system that would build a strong Kisafelika, is not a chauvinistic system of philosophy. The Kisinsi is a huge tree which strongly emphasizes first, a positively peaceful and fraternal neighborhood among all its branches: On Kisafelika and Bisafelika, strong neighborhood in continental states and their inhabitants; on Kisinsi, strong neighborhood within the national diversities; on Kisikânda, strong neighborhood in the ethnic groups and communities; on Kisizûnga, strong neighborhood in local communities; on Kisivata, strong neighborhood in the village's subdivisions such as belo, mwêlonzo, môyo and buta³. The Kisinsi deals with all mûntu, human beings, as part of the human race and its community survival.

The Kisinsi is a system of philosophy fundamentally based on tolerance. The Kisinsi punishes with care and love; it regulates social conflicts in the ways of love and autocraticism [zola ye ntungasani]. As a member of Kisinsi, a Mwisinsi does not arm himself against another mûntu, because he himself is a mûntu, a being under the control of the dual soul-mind. He wants to see in all freedom other soul-minds develop in other bodies as in one's self in order to live [zînga, i.e., tâmbula ye tambikisa] receiving and passing on. Because systems do not have the dual [mwêla-ngîndu] by themselves, they become worse when led by leaders whose soul-mind development is under the lowest level of human value understanding. The Kisinsi, as kimpa/system in bad hands, becomes a killer and does kill.

Mûntu, the soul-mind-object [ma kia mwêla ye nitu], should not kill other soul-mind-objects as a respect to himself and to his bumûntu (mindfulness). When a mûntu, in whatever intention, kills another mûntu, he looses his state of inner human being [mbêlo a kimûntu], i.e., that of the soul-mind-object. He identifies himself with an animal, the no-soul-mind-object. Then he loses his verticality [kin-tombayulu], the power to think before making any decision, to yield for horizontality [kilukôngolo], the power to act instinctively as do all prostrated beings.

The act of killing soul-mind-objects is the strongest factor that reveals not only the weakness of a leader, but also his complex of inferiority and all kinds of psychological problems it may reveal. This is, in short, the main ideas that explain the Kisinsi upon which the African concept of law and crime discussed in this chapter find their roots. It is upon this sytem that Africa is going to build its future with its doors largely open not only to its "best friends", if they do exist, but to all its enemies, because they are well known, for they are constituted as human beings, i.e., naturally, rightly and legally co-owners of our planetary land.

African leaders must see today's world policy differently in order to understand carefully from the bottom of their hearts the role that Africa should play in the future of the human beings that we all are, for the peace of this world. African leaders should deeply understand that the continent they are leading today has a special mission. A mission that should develop a new order which will save humanity and this world. As a Negro Slave, Hollis Read, wrote more than a century ago, "Africa has been reserved for the development of a higher order of civilization."⁴ Such an order and responsibility will never be conceived by the awakening of Africa if its leaders continue to follow the path of present world tensions based on ideological antagonisms, and, moreover, if African leaders found African nations upon personal prestige, corruption, human torture, inconceivable expenditures, meaningless projects rather than seeking solutions to real, social problems posed throughout the continent among its inhabitants: Housing, nutrition, water, disease, education, transportation, poverty, rural exodus, and agricultural development.

I think it is a social crime for any African authority "paying" himself, say $5,000 monthly in a country with an economic system where more than 90% of the citizens, because of the poor national planning policy, live with less than $100 for the entire year. Today's African leaders do not seem to be paid. They go as many times as they want to the national bank and "load" trunks of their cars with any amount of money they desire. For them every weekday is a payday. It is a universal shame for foreign governments to support such policies, whatever be their interests, in such corrupted, undemocratic and bankrupted nations. The fall of such governments will weigh more on their supporters rather than on the supported individuals themselves.

To Africans of all ages it is about time to rethink what the Kôngo ancestors aphorismically said once "Don't allow the exploitation to repeat itself" [Nkutu a zèngi fwânda lumbu kimosi].

Proverbs Used Within the Community About the Community

Ngana zitewanga mu kânda mu diâmbu dia kânda

When the African in general, and the Kongolese [N'kôngo] in particular, uses the expression "bambuta bata ngana" or "ngana yata bambuta/kingana kiata bambuta" literally proverbs/theories said by ancestors - he refers, according to the context to a philosophical, social, dialectical, theoretical, legal or judiciary statement. In that case bambuta bata ngana may explicitly refer to one among the following explanations:

According to the unwritten law of our society

Accordingly to the law

Accordingly to the custom

According to the ancient theory
Conformity to the law
Conformity to the social patterns, norms and values
In accordance to the well known cases
Conformity to our principles
The law says
In accordance to the exigencies of the system
Let's consult the law
Our concept of the law tells us that Legally that means . . .
Legally speaking . . .
Judiciary speaking . . .
The law says
The law is . . . etc.

The proverb is one among the most important sources that best explain the African Muntu and his thought. In debates, in ceremonies, in judgments, in joy as well as in misery, proverbs are frequently used to reprimand, to criticize, to compare, to segregate, to encourage, to punish, and to heal. They are used to teach, to explain and to thoroughly code and decode [kânga ye kutula].

For African people, proverbs constitute a special language. Sometimes, for many, proverbs are considered both a secret and a sacred language in their communication where the expression—"talk in proverbial language" [zônzila mu bingana], an expression used within the community to prevent the leak of very fundamental principles of the society, i.e., to prevent the outsider from auditing the debate to have access to any basic systematic concepts of the structural organization of the society, especially its sevuvamu lwa nsi ye kânda]. Could our intellectuals pretend to maintain that our communities' members are safe, secure, happy and well fed today? Maybe they do in their intellectual way, but I cannot say so. Besides, no generation in any society can claim superiority upon the former one. Learning and progress (civilization) are both building block processes. One does not exist without the other.

Regardless of our rejection of what we should really be, sooner or later, our nonsense intellectual realizations within our communities will be destroyed unless they are rooted on our social system [fu-kia-nsi], be they social, economical, political, philosophical, etc. The study of our languages may enable us to understand the systems, what they were, in case they were destroyed by the aggressor. Proverbs are one of the best ways that our concepts are well coded and thoroughly kept. Proverb study is a very rich and broad field that all African thought and wisdom lovers, linguists, philosophers, and all knowledge lovers should investigate. Proverbs for one main reason, in any African context, are regarded as the warehouse of the ancient African wisdom. They are very meaningful by themselves, and paramount in historical, philosophical, legal, religious and theoretical information about African schools of human knowledge. African youths and modern scholars must dig deeply for that knowledge if they wish to develop new theories about the development of modern Africa according to its realities. It is not a degradation to our young scholars if they do have some time to spend at our griots' feet to be "fed" by the past experience [nkuma], our cultural heritage [fwa dia lusânsu lwêto].

Important

The young African "scholars" must agree that one's assimilated education is sometimes very meaningless within the context of African realities. Aware of this situation, it is advisable that one seeks, after one's studies abroad, contact with village sages to learn about their opinions for "The true leaders of opinion are not always the stereotyped well-educated, professional individuals active in official or voluntary work (M. Kochen, 1976:18)."

In a small area, Maniânga, in Lower-Congo, students of Luyalungunu Iwa Kûmba-nsi Institute collected more than 1,500 proverbs and proper nouns in a short time. No one could convince those young people that African people did not have logical systems as it is always charged by certain biased groups. For them, thinkers such as Socrates, Plato, etc., existed only in the West. Africa did, as it does today, have its own "masters of thought" because their ideas remain with us: proverbs, legends, tales, myths, etc., even though their names are not known, because names are not very important in the African concept in the process of art creation. No one creates alone.

The proverbs below are excerpted from the unpublished Dictionary of Nouns and Proverbs Kôngo, [Dîngu kia Nkûmbu ye Ngana Zêto], collected under our direction (1964-73). This short list shows us how strong the concept of kânda (both a biological and social community) is among the Bântu people in particular and among African people in general.

The Kongolese word "kânda" has always been translated within western literature of Africa, in the anthropological point of view, as "clan", a word which has a negative connotation. This is not the way it is seen and understood by ourselves. As such, to be clear, the concept of community as it can be seen and understood in the African world does not exist in developed countries of the west. In those countries, from the African point of view, the word "community" is a meaningless word, empty of its meaning: Do you have any problem with foes, don't you believe it, if the police do not come as soon as possible, you may be killed on the street by that group and no one from your pretended community will dare to come out of his house to save your life. Their concept of law says so: "Don't involve yourself in somebody's else's affairs; that is his business." And this is the concept of law that the modern African is involved in, that is why our continent is swimming in blood.

Now let's examine these few proverbs, i.e., Kongo thoughts related to the concept of "kânda", community; thoughts which are frequently repeated within the community about the community:

1) Kânda mukûtu, variant Kânda mutu.

The community/society did exist before you; the community leads everything, for it is the head. What is good for the community is good for its members. Everybody is a social product. One accepts the community as it is, not as one wants it to be.

2) Kânda wakândula bièla bia kânda.

The community massages its members' organs. The community solves community problems.

- 3) Kânda wakânda mambu.
The community leadership prevents problems and conflicts within the community. It is the responsibility of the community to create laws for its members.
- 4) Vo zèyi kânda, zèyi Nzâmbi.
If you know the community you know God. God is only visible through our attitude vis-a-vis our neighbors. Our existence creates God's existence.
- 5) Nzâmbi mu kânda (kena).
God (exists) in the community. The natural principle of change transmits itself perpetually in us through the community continuum.
- 6) Untèla n'kîngu miankulu (mia kânda) kidi yazâya miampa, variant Wata diampa teka ta diankulu.
Tell me the old principles/theories in order to understand the new ones. All educational process is gradual. Don't reverse the historical truth. History accumulates itself. One can only build on old materials. Natural laws are irreversible. To be born, one has first to be conceived. Before laughter there is funny hearing.
- 7) Mbôngo a kânda ka mbôngo âku ko.
The community's goods are not your goods. Public wealth is not private wealth. Don't put your hand upon public goods (wealth).
- 8) Mu kânda, babo longa ye longwa.
Within the community everybody has the right to teach and to be taught. Education is a matter of reciprocity. True knowledge is acquired through sharing.

9) N'kîngu mia kânda n'kîngu mia nsi.

Principles (theories) of the community are also national principles. What belongs to the community belongs to the nation. What is private to a group is public to all groups. Individual productions contribute to community wealth.

10) Kânda ka ditûngwanga va lwèka lwa fu kia nsi ko.

The community, as well as the nation, is not built outside of its social system. A society is its concepts, be they political, philosophical, social or economical.

11) Kânda n'landa: bankaka kwènda; bankaka kwîza, variant

Kânda ngongo: bankaka kwènda; bakaka kwîza. The community is a channel: people go (die), people come (are born). The community renews perpetually its members and its principles accordingly to its [fu] systems, conforming to the natural laws, that of birth and death, the theory of [makwènda-makwîza], what goes will come back, the perpetual process of change through [dingo-dingo], the constant back and forth flow of [ngolo zanzîngila] living energy.

12) Kutômbi didi dia minika mia kânda vo kwena mu kânda ko.

Don't seek for the center of social waves if you don't belong within the community and its system. Do not force open somebody else's system's door when it is not open to you. The study of a system is possible only if it opens itself.

- 13) Dia ye nwa, walambalala; bwatûngulwa bwâla kuzèyi bo ko.

Eat, drink, and then sleep for you ignore how the village was built. Just watch and see, don't be involved in fundamental social issues of cultural and systematic discrepancies.

- 14) Kutômbi didi dia (ngolo za) zûnga ko kwidi zûngwa (cfrl 2).

Don't seek to know the regional center of driving forces for fear of being confined by these forces.

- 15) Sîmbi bia nsi (bia kânda) mu kilômbo binikukinanga.

Societal leaders move and act through masses. A true leader mingles in the crowd. A leader that stands aloof to his people is a puppet.

- 16) Kânda diakuta Nzûndu, nkio⁵ diawunuka, uk-itèle Zûndu. Nga zèyi diswasâni diena va kati kwa Nzûndu ye Zûndu e ?

The community named you Nzûndu,⁶ you thought it was mistaken itself; you call yourself Zûndu⁷. Can you tell the existing difference between Nzûndu and Zûndu?

⁵ Nkio', shortening of nkiôngono.

⁶ Nzûndu; anvil—symbol of productivity within the community. Name given to a child wherein the community hopes that his birth will revive its stagnant economy.

This proverb contains a very simple, but basic philosophical truth about proper noun meaning among the African people, the self, i.e., a) to be what one is, and b) to try to realize what the community (society) expects from you in accordance to the label (name) you bear. If the community wants you to be "Community-Anvil" [Nzûndu-a-kânda], be that community "Anvil" and don't make yourself a "Frog-Within-The-Community" [zûndu-mu-kânda], i.e. a "Drunkard-Within-The-Community." (For more information read our Makuku Matatu, Chapter 2).

17) Nga nzèza mûntu katûnga fu kia bwâla?

Could a strange person build a favorable social system of a village that is not his own? Community members only, of a given society, are able to do what a stranger cannot do for its safety as well as for its human well-being. No one can do better for you than yourself.

⁷ Zûndu; by fault of eliminating the "N" from the above name, the name becomes Zûndu (frog); for the Kongo, Zûndu is the symbol of drunkard, but also of habitual drunkenness. In suppressing certain letters, mainly "n" and "m" from their names, many intellectuals in present Africa bear names with a vulgar meaning or simply meaningless names, as in the case of the name Zûndu.

- 18) Wampâna nsèngo, kunkâmbi kwè ngâtu bwè isadila yo ko.

If you give me a hoe don't tell me where or how I should use it. Don't stifle my field of activities and my normal development by pretended assistance.

- 19) Kânda diazûngulwa lusunga lwa kimfumu-dikânda luzîmbale.

When the community leadership loses its direction, the community is oppressed. There is only the leadership and its direction that should be blamed in any social, economic or political crises. One spits only at the leader.

- 20) Ka ngw'ândi ko, kânda dian'kitula kinsevanseva ye luntoyo.

It is the community that made him/her a habitual smiler and a talkative individual, not his/her mother. Community members are born simple, nice, and good, but they become what the community wants them to be/become. The human being is a social product; he is what he eats, learns, hears, sees, feels, and lives. The actual behavior of a human being is a learned behavior. Very often one's nature is oppressed by the society.

- 21) Kânda kându: ka kilôswa; ka kisâmbu.

The community is a taboo: never can one throw it away, and never can one worship it. No one can be otherwise than what one is. Societies, like human beings, have their own identities/ personalities, be they open or hidden.

22) Kânda diansânsa, kânda isânsa.

The community took care of me; I will take care of that community. Community life is a process of receiving and transmitting/passing on. [tâmbula ye tambikisa] Teach a child completely and thoroughly about what you are as a community and your teaching will go on completely and thoroughly. Life and living is a seedling process.

23) Kiasôla kânda ko; kânda diansôla.

I did not choose my community (society/race); it is the community that chose me by giving birth to me/by bringing me where I am. The community has responsibilities to me as I have responsibilities vis-a-vis to it. Discrimination is a disease.

24) Kânda diasâla nsâng'a n'kènto ka ditûmbukanga ko.

As long as there is a female "shoot" within the community, it cannot be annihilated. The presence of a female in the community is the symbol of continuity of life in that community, and on the contrary, her absence is the symbol of its end. The feminine is life (God) in and around us.

25) Kânda diamôyo dîmbu yèmba.

The common and public house is the symbol of an alive community. The yèmba/boko is the point of centralization and decentralization of forces as well as of activities within the community. Its animation is a sign of vitality within the community. Well seated institutions are key to social, economical, political, and philosophical stability of nations; they are, not only nations' hearts, but also their brains.

26) Kânda nkasa ye nome/niosi.

The community is at the same time poison and honey. The community is very sticky to its members. It is hard, even hostile to live within, but it is however the best place to "stick on" [nama], i.e., to live and to belong to.

27) Kânda i (mbûndani a) bafwa ye bamôyo.

The community is the union of the ancestors and of the living people. The community is an accumulation of the living unity of the physical and spiritual elements.

28) Mu kânda ka mwena nzaku (za n'toto) ko.

There are no boundaries of land within the community land. The freedom of land use by all community members is warranted within the community. There is no privacy on land issues; its ownership is public for no one came in this world with a piece of land in his/her hand. Therefore it cannot be sold, bought or alienated.

29) Wasînga kânda ukisîngidi.

If you curse the community you curse yourself. It is uneasy for one to blame or condemn one's community. Avoid the attack of the community against you.

30) Wakatuka mu n'kîngu mia fu kia kânda kitukidi mapeka ye wûngani.

If you do leave the principles of the community system, you become an errant and a deviant. The loss of one's own rights of belonging to a community (society/nation) is maybe more harmful than an imprisonment for life.

31) Kânda diafûka nza yifûkidi.

If the concept of community is annihilated/ destroyed, the world is destroyed. If principles, concepts, norms and values that make world communities alive are violated, weakened or completely destroyed, the human being will easily destroy his world.

32) Yimbu mu kânda sînsu kia mfwîlu a kânda.

The poison within the community is a symptom of community/social destruction. Deadly weapons in man's community not only are a symbol of the disorganization of the society which possess them, but more importantly they are a symptom of its own destruction, and of the approaching end of man's world.

33) Dièla dia kânda m'bikudi.

The wisdom of the community prophesizes. The community sees farther than an individual can. Anyone who learns to see through the community's eyes (wisdom) is a very bright person.

34) Kala n'lôngi a kânda mbo' wazâya mayenda mu kânda.

Be a community teacher/leader in order to know what goes on within the community. The real wisdom of a society and its very basic needs are only known by those who mingle within the reality of people's daily lives in that society.

35) Kânda kabelanga nzèza ko.

The community is not hostile to a stranger. The community welcomes all human beings as long as they do not dare to interfere with its basic social practices/principles.

36) Kubungi kûmu kia kânda mu kinzèza kiâku ko.

Do not try to destroy the reputation of the community/society while wearing, somewhere else, the label of "being a stranger." Your misconduct, elsewhere, has direct or indirect impact on your community/society as well as on yourself.

37) Mvita makânda mawûbi ulèndanga zo.

The quarrels (wars) between communities/societies are solved by diplomatic encounters. The diplomacy [kimawûbi] is the leading key to peace.

38) Ku kânda dia mbadio mpaka (ntantani) ze' ko; nga ziswèmi mu dia diâku zazèyi?

There are lots of conflicts within the "So's" community; do you realize how many there are within yours? Tend to your affairs and let others preoccupy themselves with theirs. Try to learn thoroughly what is going on in your own society before probing other societies.

- 39) Lumbu-ki bisikânda, mbazi bakulu ba kânda, variant Lumbu-ki lesi bia kânda, mbazi bakulu mu kânda.

Today we are community members; tomorrow we will be the ancestors of the community. What we do and think today prepares us for what will be the community's assessment tomorrow. If we are today, simple individuals within the community, we may tomorrow be deified (spiritualized), i.e. be considered as the source of driving forces and radiations within the living community, and this in accordance with our attitude vis-a-vis to that community during our physical lifetime [ku nseke]. Any seed can give life to a big tree.

- 40) Mu kânda kikânda, bukânda, kinkwèzi, kimwâ-nambuta, kisikânda, kikûndi, kinzâyani. Ka mwena kimpala ko.

Within the community there are all alliances: community righteousness, marriage alliances, affiliation, friendship, relationship; there is no antagonism. It is pleasant to live within a community, for in the community, in the African concept, indeed your pain and pleasure are shared, your joys doubled, even tripled. The community, your community as well as my community, is your place of joy, love and life.

- 41) Mwîsi wa mbôngi a kânda wubote ke lusekeseke lwa nim'a lônde ko.

Better the smoke from the community's public house rather than warmth from beyond our boundaries. Social conflicts within the community are less harmful than an exile.

42) Kânda diakôndwa n'toto, bilesi bilaukidi/bimwângane.

If the community lacks the land, the door for survival, its members will disperse. The community land, its availability to all members, is the symbol of security and of togetherness within the community. A community leader as well as a national one must know that community/national land is the first property of the society that should be protected, even at the price of blood. A leader that sells or alienates the land of the community/society is a murderer, because he prevents the community/society from having access to its first source of all possibilities for survival.

43) Dûnga mu kânda ka (biena) kinkuma ko.

Events within the community are not a rarity. Human community always has problems to confront. Life within the community is a perpetual debate. To be a community member is to be ready to confront problems.

44) N'samu mia kânda miale' bulungi, variant N'samu mia kânda ka mivwîdi bulungi ko: mia ndo ka ndo.

Community issues (affairs) do not have anniversaries; they happen anytime. Anything at anytime may happen within the community. With regard to anniversaries, they belong to seasons, plants, and to living beings. Any community member as well as any community leader must be aware about the "kôndwa-kwa-bulungi" principle in community affairs.

- 45) Wazangisa Kimvwâma zimbisi n'swa ye niènze mu kânda.

In worshipping one's own wealth one looses rights and social enjoyment of his/her community. Mûntu, the human being, is fundamentally a social being and, as such, his assumed private rights are very meaningless before the social and collective rights. A shared wealth procures more internal happiness.

- 46) Makani ma kânda, mwâna mu ntûnda; ka matewanga nkûmbu ko.

Community plans/projects, are an infant in their mother's womb, they are without name. Social driving forces, their sources, are fundamentally unknown. If the name of your plan/project explicitly tells you what you want to do, don't tell it to your enemy, and the best way to keep it secret is to knot it = code it [kânga yo kolo].

- 47) Kolo diakânga ngânga, kutula ngânga, variant Kolo diakanga mwisikânda, mwisikânda kutula dio or Kolo diakânga mwisikânda, kutula mwisikânda.

A code (knot) from a specialist should be decoded by a specialist (of the system=kimpa, fu). What is fundamentally systematic can only be easily understood within the system. Our present knowledge in ways of coding and decoding cultural codes of alien cultures is the cornerstone in human antagonism in the world today.

48) Mfumu-dikânda n'tu a mbwa watôndila makome.

The community leader is a dog's head; everybody knocks upon it. One only spits at the leader. A true leader is an object of critics.

49) Kwena sîmbi kia kânda, kwena didi dia kânda.

Where there is the community djinn (leadership), there is the center of the community. Societies like people have their hearts.

50) Kisikânda, vo ka butukila ko (mu) bukwângi.

If not by birth, one becomes a member of the community by refuge (adoption/exile). All means are available to integrate a society.

51) Kânda, kându kia kânda ye nsi.

The community is a taboo for the community and for the nation. National pride is made by men of deeds, members of national communities. There are not two different laws in one nation: one for the poor and the other for the rich or one for the village and another for the city.

52) Bându dia kânda nsâng'a mûntu ye n'toto.

The initial community capital (bându, from bânda, to start) is its human resources and the land. Life would be impossible within the community without land and without valid people in it. The community must pay a particular attention to its youth as well as to its land, the fundamental capitals of a society.

53) Mbôngi nkat'a kânda ye nsi.

The public house of the community is the seating of the community as well as of the nation. Community unity finds its foundation from "boko", the public house/institution. Societies as well as people, have their rolls of life; these rolls, nzingu/nkata, are rolled and unrolled within social and public institutions.

54) Mbûngi a kânda va kati kwa nsi ye yulu.

The center (cavity) of the community is located between the above and below world. The reality of the cultural heritage of a community, i.e., its knowledge, is the experience of that deepest knowledge found between the spiritualized ancestors and the physically living thinkers within the community.

Africa was invaded in all its regions by travellers, missionaries, newsmen, pilots, peacemakers, apartheid-minded-individuals, and today, by "bought-men", the mercenaries, with the main goal, in accordance to what one tells us, to understand and to civilize its people. The mission of civilization having "accomplished" her "noble" mission, which was a total failure, African people were still known as people without logic, people without systems, people without concepts, the primitive people, unlawful societies, etc. And one may ask what is wrong with social science scholars and their academic world? How long should we continue to lie? Proverbs related to the community, and our comments on them prove the contrary of what has always been said and taught about African people. They tell us how lawful, philosophical, systematic and practical African people were in their own world. Should not one be astonished by African wisdom, should one undertake a more or less complete study of that African wisdom hidden in proverbs, the old way of theorizing among people of oral literature? One must understand that a proverb, for African people and those with a basically oral literature, is not seen and understood in the way the western world sees and understands it. For us, because of the lack of material to write on in the past, proverbs are principles, theories, warehouses of knowledge, booklets, taped information, and, above all, they have "force de loi", force of law, in judiciary circumstances. A court without proverbs (translated here as judiciary referential legal documents) belongs to the dead [Mbasi-a-n'kanu yakôndwa bingana ya bafwa], says an unwritten Kôngo constitutional legal passage/proverb.

Hearing Is Seeing, and Seing Is Reacting/Feeling

Wa i mona, ye mona i sunsumuka

Life is fundamentally a process of perpetual and mutual communication; and to communicate is to emit and to receive waves and radiations [minika ye minienie]. This process of, receiving and releasing or passing on [tâmbula ye tambikisa] is the key to human being's game of survival. A person is perpetually bathed by radiations' weight, [zitu kia minienie]. The weight [zitu/demo] of radiations may have a negative as well as a positive impact on any tiny being, for example a person who represents the most vibrating "kolo" (knot) of relationships. The following expressions are very common among the Bântu, in general, and among the Kongo, in particular, which prove to us the antiquity of these concepts in the African continent; Our businesses are waved/shaken; our health is waved/shaken; what we possess is waved/shaken; the communities are waved/shaken: Where are these (negative) waves coming from [Salu bièto bieti nikunwa; mavîmpi nikunwa; bituvwîdi nikunwa; makânda nikunwa: Kwè kutûkanga minika miâmi]?

For the Bântu, a person lives and moves within an ocean of waves/radiations. One is sensitive or immune to them. To be sensitive to waves is to be able to react negatively or positively to those waves/forces. But to be immune to surrounding waves/forces, is to be less reactive to them or not at all. These differences account for varying degrees in the process of knowing/learning among individuals.

A sickness may be caused by waves/radiations sent or emitted by a strange body within a given milieu. Although the subject has already been discussed otherwise in Kindoki and Makuku Matatu, we repeat this discussion here to help those who may not have the chance to read my previous works. The following picture will be very helpful.

When a vibrating knot [kolo] of relationships, i.e. a living being M, is in communication with a visible source of waves, VSW, in a radius [n'nienie] of audibility AB on the line of the waves' extent direction, AC, one knows that little or no attention is paid to the importance of the waves/vibrations. Images and voice/sound alone are the important factors of this communication. On the other hand, images and voices/sounds alone can disturb such a communication. Remark that the intensity of the voice/sound [zu/n'nîngu] diminishes as one becomes oblivious to all directions (upwards, downwards, backwards, or sideways) from VSW. If the voice from VSW cannot be heard outside the circle of audibility [lukôngolo lwang-wîla] formed by the radius AB, we then say that the point B is the point where the "voiced-wave-message" becomes a voiceless-waved-message". Beyond this point voices become less important, i.e., waves/vibrations and images invade the B-C field of communication.

These waves and images can be disturbed by other waves and images. This disturbance, like what happened to the disturbed voices, may confuse the original message. This is why it is very often difficult for the invisible destination ID, e.g., the dreamer, located in any point in the field of communication BC within waves' strata [nyalu/ngwèngwe a minika], 7-0, to understand the communication.

In a crowded place, it is easy for someone to be confused about one's own name when called by someone else standing at VSW. This may happen because of the existence of other voices/forces are the disturbing agents throughout the field of communication A-B in its diverse points of waves' strata [ngwèngwe za minika] 13-8. One has to be told by somebody else that "you are called." This teller [sunsumuni/te] was able to hear the calling voice/vibrations from the VSW, because he was more aware and more sensitive to that voice hearing is seeing, and seeing is reacting/feeling [Wa i mona, ye mona i sunsumuka]. There is a fundamental relationship between hearing, seeing and feeling/reacting [wa, mona ye sunsumuka]. Feeling is understanding. The Bântu do not "feel" pain, unless they "see" them [mona mpasi] as we have said in our second chapter. To have one's senses in a perfect state of health is to have the key to the basic process of accumulating knowledge. One who does not have one's senses in that state is said to be, at a certain level, a mentally "disabled" person, i.e., a being scored under the level of knowing [tûlwa/kiâtwa ku nsia tëzo kia zâya/nzailu].

What was said above reveals the pattern in the process of natural voiceless communications throughout, waves/radiations and dreams [minika/miniemie ye ndozi] as we discussed the issue in Makuku Matatu.

A dream [ndozi] is a voiceless communication. It is at the same time a means and a message. This message can be audible, pictorial and scenic. It has an origin [tûku], a channel [ngongo/n'landa], with or without an addressee receptor [tâmbudi]. The origin/source of the message can be natural, spiritual or supernatural. Before becoming a dream [ndozi], this communication was a "wireless" communication from its source (say the point VSW within the waves' strata 13), to the point at which it becomes a dream (i.e., any point within the field of communication B-C). Such a communication is voiceless from any point outside of the wave stratum circle B through the field of communication B-C to the wave stratum circle C. Certain waved communications are voiceless from their origin, say VSW, to C, i.e., to the endless [sênsêle]. The communication passes through two main fields A-B and B-C, before becoming a dream at the point where the dreamer stands, say at the point C.

In the first field, A-B, this communication was principally a "voiced-pictorial-waved-message" [n'samu-wangwa-wambona-wanikunwa]. In this same field, other positive or negative "voiced-pictorial-waved-messages" are able to disturb the first one. These disturbing messages, i.e., the unwanted ones, can be under diverse forms: noise, call, event, scream, picture, a motion/movement, a laugh, etc.

On the contrary, in the second field, B-C, the communication becomes principally a "vibrated-pictorial-voiceless-message" [n'samu-wanikunwa-wambona-wadikama]. While running through this field, the waved message can also be disturbed by other waved and unwanted messages. In other words, this message becomes entangled with all kinds of symbols and images, and is said to be "sticky" [n'samu weka lunama]. These sticky and unwanted messages add to the true and original message/communication different symbolic forms which are very often bizarre and frightening: sinking in water or in volcanic lava; burying oneself; lizards, being surrounded by red-hot-lava, and all kinds of nightmares. These symbolic images cover deeply and entirely the true meaning of the dream. One then has to undergo the process of removing or of discarding all those false symbols and their unwanted meanings added to the dream's message in order to discover the true symbol of that dream and its meaning to the dreamer or to his community. This elimination process is to dig up the garbage or rubbish [sâta mfuti].

Because the dreamer cannot always understand the message contained in his dream, he needs help just as in the case of the person who could not hear the call of his name only with the aid of an intermediary who was sensitive enough to understand the call. In the case of the process of explaining dreams, this helper is called dream-interpreter [m'bângudi-a-ndozi]. The dream can be a reflection of diurnal activities, a repetition of past activities, or a projection of one's own activities and imagination in the future. But, most importantly, it can be a warning about a future or imminent event: good or bad news. A dream-interpreter [M'bângudi-a-ndozi], is a person whose sensitivity to and awareness of waves, symbols and their meanings are very high. There is a lot to learn through the dream state [ndozi], about people and their health, about societies and their organizations, about science, the past, the present and the future of humanity and the world. But only a few people can understand them. The scholar as well as the common man, very often, are unable to see what is true or false in a dream, the waved-sticky-message [n'samu-wa-lunama-wanikunwa].

The Bântu/Kôngo concept of dream [ndozi], is the direct application of their theory about radiation. This theory is very popular in African daily expressions, but ignored by African intellectuals as well as by African wisdom lovers. In accordance with this theory [lôngi diâdi], it is the waves/radiations that shake/wave societies, nations and communities [i minika/minienie minikunânga bimvuka, zinsi ye makânda]. In other words, it is the waves/radiations [minika/minienie], which are very often the cause of accidents, sicknesses, fatigue, tensions, changes, etc., (see Kindoki). Radiations of a strange body within a given milieu, as well as words, may have a catastrophic impact upon that environment.

It is 1939. I was 5 years old. A man of the true name Ma-

Matidi-Mukôdia, in the village of Kûmbi, came into the picture (était à la page). This man, after the loss of many of his family members, underwent a psychological crisis. Without the knowledge of the other inhabitants of the village, he went to buy strong baneful “knots” (sachets) of an n’kisi [mafutu ma n’kisi wambi] and he interred them, at night, throughout the entire village and in all its exits [mafula]. Three weeks after this undercover operation the entire village was shaken/waved by strange ailments [vata diadio dianikunwa kwa mpila vûnga bianzênga] People screamed and murmured: where are these waves coming from that shake/wave the village? [Bântu bakwâya ye vunguta: Kwè kweti tûkanga minika mieti nikuna vata?]

Because of this social imbalance, locale elders called for an urgent debate/meeting in order to “nail/hammer the issue” and “knot it” in nkôndi, the “problem-nailing-recorder-object,” [sîmbi bia vata biavwândisa bântu mu koma binko ye kânga/loka nkôndi/mfûna] i.e., send defensive waves/radiations through the village via the air and the earth in order to “attack” the source of those negative radiations and the wrong-doer at their center (See figure 21).

A few days after the ritual ceremony of tying the “vibrating knot” of social self-defense, Matidi-Mukôdia lost his equilibrium and became seriously sick. The village council sat again to discuss the issue and interview the dying sickman. Matidi accepted his guilt and explained what he did. It was a Sunday. Matidi-Mukôdia asked the crowd to follow him in order to unearth all the negative vibrating knots [mafutu/makolo ma minika miambi] he had interred in the village, which were the source of the negative waves [minika miambi] that shook the whole village. We all went after him to see, with our own eyes, the n'kisi that waved/shook the community of the village. After the operation had been unearthed the negative waves disappeared from the village [minika miambi miavila mu vata].

Superstition? Hallucination? Magic manipulation? Unscientific-related issue? I cannot tell. One sole thing I know, it happened and I was among the witnesses on the spot.

When a Mûntu, in general, and a Mukôngo, in particular, says our bodies are being shaken/waved [nitu zèto zeti nikunwa bènì] or our community is being ghastly shaken/waved again and again [kânda diètò dieti nikunwa ye nikunwa] or we are in a waving/vibrating period [mu tându kia ndikununu/ndikutusununu twena], he is referring to that theory of waves/radiations which can positively or negatively bathe and shake/wave bodies, nations, governments and communities/societies, be they developing or advanced. Likewise when a, deep-going person, psychiatrist, seer [m'fièdi/ngûnza], says people are murmuring about you [bântu beti kwènda niungutanga mu ngeye] or you are followed by bad luck [n'loko weti kulândanga], he is referring to that theory [lôngi]. These waves may have good or bad consequences upon people, nations and social organizations [Minika miâmi milènda tûkisa lèmina diambi evo diambote mu bântu, zinsi ye mu bimvuka]. Three cases are meanwhile possible in this process of communication by natural or supernatural waves/radiations:

1. The human being, receiver [tâmbudi], i.e., dreamer, can receive and understand thoroughly the waved message [n'samu wanikunwa/tubwa] and take then his precautions. The receptibility, like the audibility, depends not only on the perfectibility (health) and sensibility of the senses, but also on the distance and obstacles met in the field of communication [yînza dia ntambukusulu/dia minika].

2. He can only receive and understand a part of the waved message, whereby a certain anxiety and doubt comes to the dreamer/receiver in accordance with what I dreamed, I doubt if people in my village community are fine [Kizèyi ko keti ku vata mbote kwâu bena].
3. He may not receive the message at all. In this case he is totally ignorant of it, whereupon baneful, disastrous and unforeseen consequences may affect his daily life.

Because of this, the Muntu will, for a dream, consult the m'fièdi, deep-heart-going-person, dream-interpreter [m'bângudi-a-ndozi], soothsayer [m'moni-a-mâmbu], seer-through-life-rolls [n'zingumuni-a-mâmbu]. He may also decide to discuss the situation in a community council, with a wise friend, or if such be the case, "kângisa mio, i.e., minika", literally tie/knot them, i.e., code them into a vibrating knot that could produce defensive radiations/waves in order to avoid undesirable or disastrous consequences within the community.

It is using both mental and natural laser power [Lèndo kiampîtila]. And man continues to dream old as well as new dreams in the same way his great-great-great-grandparents dreamt.

Is That Magic?

Ket'i Muyeke?

When one fundamentally understands an African language and the symbolic cultural concepts generated by that language, one must wonder where technological direction the African traditional concept of knowing [zâya] is heading. Can we today, with our present system of coding and decoding cultural concepts, be able to unearth that yet unknown dimension?

Lèmba-dia-Kânda, literally "The Soother-of-the-Community", was the unique sister of Baniunguta-Kwâu, literally "Let-Them-Murmur", and the unique sister of the community [kânda]. Unexpectedly Lèmba-dia-Kânda was kidnapped on her way to the field. She was badly beaten and left for dead by her unknown kidnapper. The community in its entirety was shocked by this unhuman treatment.

Baniunguta-Kwâu, Lèmba-dia-Kanda's brother, took the initiative to see, the specialist-owner of the televisor-pot [ngânga-sênso] in order to get revenge on his sister. "The initiative is positive," agreed the whole community.

"We want to know who the kidnapper was of the community's unique sister," the only question asked of the ngânga-sênso. You will, right now, see the proof about the kidnapper of the unique community sister," [Si lwamona ki-mansuna] responded the ngânga. The ngânga put his sênso in the middle of the circle; he then put in some clear water and medicines [maza malônga ye bikôla]. He asked the elder of the community and the kidnapped sister to wash their hands within the sênso, the *televisor-pot*⁸.

After this ritual, the ngânga-sênso covered his sênso with a piece of red cloth. He then talked to himself in a very strange language and, pointing to the elder of the community said uncover "the televisor-pot" [Yabula sênso]. Surprisingly, everybody could see the unknown kidnapper within the plate (pot) beating the unique community sister. "What do you want?" [Bwâbu nki luzolele], said the ngânga "Do what you usually do" [Sa bu usânga], "Break the needle; kill him" [tabula ntûmbu] responded the community members.

The ngânga took the knife appropriated for the practice and knocked it on the head of the kidnapper whose shadow was radiating within the sênso. At once the clear water was transformed (changed) into blood., the enemy of the community is unmistakably hit [N'tântu wa kânda utêlo].

Is that magic [ket'i muyeke] or just unthinkable discourses of the so called "primitive" and "illogical" people by the specialists of the understanding of man? Or a precursor of the yet unknown field whose ground is already laid in Africa? This is one of the "knowing" aspects aborted by colonization everywhere in the world.

The African concept of knowing [zâya], about waves [minika], still is fundamentally unearthed; it does have a different direction within a different dimension; maybe it is unfelt because it is unknown by specialists of the current well known concept of knowing/knowledge [zâya/nzailu].

Figure 22.

If a Mukôngo, in particular, and a Mûntu in general, sits down for awhile on one side of his/her path, he will make sure before leaving that he picked up [bônga bèndo] his electronic radiated shadow [kîni kia minika/minienie kisîdi va bèndo] left on the spot where he was sitting: To pick up one's own radiated shadow left on the seated spot [bônga bèndo/kîni, variant bônga kîni kia minienie mia bèndo], for fear of being manipulated by one's own enemy in case this enemy possesses delicate knowledge about [kîni kia bendo], the electronically radiated shadow (sensitivity) upon things we touch or sit down on.

Do not such concepts reflect a high level of thinking about electronics and advanced concepts in technology? Are not concepts and ideas, be they mythical, utopian or magic, precede all inventions? Would our present world's main concept of knowing [zâya] change when this concept fully comes to its visibility or understanding [mbwèno yâyi bu yina sènsa va mpènsa]? I cannot tell because I don't know, but one thing is true people will be curious about it. Then we will see if this concept will not stop, for the sake of world peace, the appearance of the world's unwanted leaders' faces from the TV screen [sènsa] because of their undemocratic, dictatorial and "mandateless" regimes.

THE "V": BASIS OF ALL REALITIES

In 1964, at the age of 30, I was introduced to one of the most important, secret, and sacred teaching of Kôngo; a Bântu speaking ethnic group in the center of West Africa, along the shores of the Atlantic Ocean. Here the word Bantu should be understood as an anthropological term. As such, one has to see and understand it as a complex house with tens, if not hundreds of rooms. Each of these rooms will be seen, understood, and taken as an ethnic group such as that of the Kôngo people.

These teachings of Kôngo were offered at the Lèmba Institute in Maniânga, the Lower-Congo where I was born. This institute was one of five main institutes that existed in the ancient Kôngo kingdom prior to the Colonial Era. The four others were Kimpasi, Kinkîmba, Bwèlo and Kikûmbi. The last, Kikûmbi Institute, was specialized to focus on womanhood and all its related issues. All teachings in these institutes were Bântu people teachings, i.e., related to the complexity of the "Bântu house" as they were disseminated within "Kôngo room."

Because of their secrecy, sacredness, as well as their mystic nature, only initiated individuals were allowed to enter these institutions. The exception is Kikûmbi that requires one major condition for any female candidate to enter: The condition to enter the womanhood institution is to "be of age." This means to have had one's first menstruation [yikama or kala ku mbôngo]. It is at this stage that a female candidate of Bântu culture in the Kôngo area is introduced to the secrecy and sacredness of the first "V", in both its biological aspects to life and living in the "inner environment" of any life to be [Fu-Kiau, 1991]. The Kíkumbi was the only institution that disseminated not only the secrecy and sacredness of the first "V" to its candidtaes, but its mystic meaning as well!

To illustrate to these candidates that the teachings were highly powerful, secret and sacred, all candidates were painted with the tukula (red), the symbol of both danger and death, maturity and leadership. The symbolic painting of candidates in red [tukula] was fundamental to convey the essence of the teaching to all. This prevented these teachings from being violated by those who offer the first environment, the inner environment, to any living being to be born. Here we are talking about what I call the reverse "Vee", as it will be discussed.

Because of their closed door policy to the non-initiated [biyînga], colonial powers decreed these institutions as dangerous to the survival of colonization. Consequently, these institutions were destroyed without taking into consideration their social, cultural, educational, spiritual or moral values. Many of their unyielding leading masters [ngudia-ngânga] were executed or jailed for life. The remaining masters took these institutions underground for hundreds of years for fear of reprisal from both the colonial and religious powers.

It is at the feet of some of these underground masters that I learned not only about the "V" (the basis of all realities), but the foundation of the Bantu people system of thought as well, their cosmologies. No one can truly understand the "Vee" without any basic knowledge upon Bantu world view, or their cosmologies. Our own work, as would later write two American scholars, is the first on the subject: "This study is the first in any language to reveal the system of popular Kôngo religion, its cosmology" [McGaffey et. al. 1974].

Understanding the world view of a people is the cornerstone for understanding their culture. If the Bantu cosmology was only revealed to the outside world by 1966, a few years after the liberation of most Bantu people area, then one can also say that the Bantu world is yet not truly understood by the outside world—neither culturally, artistically, nor philosophically. Therefore, western literature of Africa prior to this date must contain many fantasies which must be dismissed if one is willing to contribute to the process of "Building African scholarship in Africa and Diaspora."¹ Superficial scholarship anywhere in the world is very dangerous in terms of human relationships. It is always better to remain quiet than to utter wrong statements about other cultures (come to haunt you). Many of the world's tensions today are the results of such wrong statements.

It is not easy for outsiders to access the cultural core of a given people unless one is guided by a local native master. This is the case of the "Vee" here. This Kongo "V" was never talked or written about because it is an integral part of the Kongo cosmology; a world view that was never revealed before 1966 by local masters. Now we are able to talk about and discuss it openly as it was understood and disseminated in ancient institutions of the Bantu world.

The "Vee", what is it? One may promptly ask.

Because this subject is exciting and vital to life, I have lectured on this subject many times since I have been living in the States; both privately and publicly, in colleges, universities, museums, cultural centers, and in jails as well. Everything, including individual and collective life depends upon it. National security itself, of any country, is subject to it. And yet, it remains a secret to the great majority because they are not aware of it. The "V" is one of the most important keys in understanding life on the planet earth, and in the cosmic bodies (planets) as well (if life exists there too). It is, in some way, life itself (as we "try" to know it). Everything is a "V" because the beginning itself, or the big bang, exploded in the form of the "V". Because it is the bridging "wire" between thinking-matter the human [mûntu], and the world of unthinking-matter (the world and source of "ungrasped" ideas and images). The "Vee" is the basis of all inspirational realities such as great ideas, images, illustrations, inventions of all orders (including works of art), wars and conceptions, both biological and ideological as well. It is the process [dingo-dingo] to all changes, social and institutional; natural and unnatural, seen and unseen.

To talk about the "V" is to talk about realities, whether they are biological, inspirational or ideological, material or immaterial. They all pop into our minds in forms of the Vee (beam span of the Vee) inside us at the Musoni zone of the Kôngo cosmology. We seek for ideas and images through "the open beam of the Vee" inside our mind and on the contrary we focus details and specificities under reverse beam of the "Vee". This "V" is not a religion nor an academic exercise which may consist of transferring bones from one graveyard to another. It is one of the most secret keys of life and living.

Cosmically, the Vee teaches with all simplicity the formation process [dingo-dingo] of the universe and its bodies or planets [Fu-Kiau, 1994] while biologically, it explains the formation as well as the developmental process of life through all its stages; conception, birth, maturity, and death. With the Vee one can ideologically understand social systems: their rise and their fall (Fu-Kiau, 1980).

The "Vee" has a standing ground, the untouchable "dark matter" that constitutes the "printing dark room" of realities. From this dark room, pictures and ideas become realities in human minds which channel them into transformation processes that lead them to tangible realities. "Vee" is the core to all circles inside which "Vee" stands. These "Vees" are individual or collective, material or immaterial, biological or ideological. Inside the community circle's "Vee" stands the master [ngânga], teacher, priest, as a power figure. This power figure, the leader/priest [ngânga], who stands powerfully at the center of the community issues [mâmbu], became the Egyptian ankh or symbol of life.

Healing African wisdom of
to see Dr. Malidoma Somé

Of course, among the Bântu people, an ngânga stands "vertically," and powerfully inside the community "Vee" [telama lwîmbangânga mu kânda], as the symbol of active life in the community.

Figure 24.

From inside the "Vee" the human being [mûntu] comes to be [kala], and within the Vee he extinguishes [zima] as living energy. Therefore, the Vee in reality, is a living pyramid in constant motion, which follows the path of life and passes the four main points of demarcation of the cosmogram [dikenga], which in turn is symbolized by the flame of life inside the community circle. The closer one is to the center of this flame, whose "Vee" is the symbol, the healthier and more powerful one is. On the contrary, the more distant one is from this center, the weaker and less powerful one becomes. (See figure 19).

African people in Africa and Diaspora have lost their closeness to the center of the community cultural "Vee". The Bântu-Kôngo philosophy, whose "Vee" is only one of its most important aspects, teaches that the human being [mûntu plural bântu] is both a living-energy-being (spiritual being) and a physical being (matter). It can be said a "V-H being", i.e., he is a being [kadi/be] that stands vertically, i.e., he thinks-reasons-ponders, before he walks and acts to meet horizontally the challenges of the instinctive world; this is the horizontal world, which is the main ground to all learnings.

Walking horizontally is a process and a motion with one intention, which is going to learn from one's environment, the circle, for "knowledge is not in us; it is outside of us." We are only shelving machines, living computers, with the power to collect and shelve the information for future use, at will.² Horizontal motion [kilukôngolo], is especially a cognitive process [dingo-dingo dianzâyila]. Without this cognitive motion, the human being [mûntu] becomes powerless in his own environments, both inner and outer.

On the "V-H" ground, vertical-horizontal [Kintombayulu-Kilukôngolo], the human being [mûntu] has two planes for his motion/movement. On the horizontal plane he can move in four directions: forwards, backwards, leftwards and rightwards. Motions towards these four directions are for learning, i.e., collecting information (data) to be shelved in his bank, the mind. But thanks to the vertical plane, he can walk into three more directions, of which one is critical to both his health and self-healing. The vertical plane allows him to walk downwards, upwards and for "perfect" health, true self-knowing and self-healing, walk innerwards.

Figure 25.

The Bantu people, in their teaching, believe that the human being suffers mostly because of his lack of knowing how to walk towards this 7th direction, the innerwards direction. Their own words put it so perfectly well: Kani ka bwè, kana ku lumoso-ku lubakala-ku n'twâla-ku nima-mu zulu evo mu nsi ukwènda, vutukisa va didi i yând. (No matter what, you may walk leftwards, rightwards, forwards, backwards, upwards or downwards, you must come back to the core/center).

The human being is nothing unless he discovers how to walk towards the 7th direction, the center [didi], the inner world which represents the essence of his being [bukadi bwândi/bukadi bwa mbêlo ândi]. As such, one has to discover, or rediscover, this walk towards the 7th direction, not only for the sake of health and self-healing, but because it empowers one for self-knowing as well. It allows us to truly become "thinking-acting-beings" [kadi-biyîndulanga-mu-vânga], i.e., doers [vângi] because we are masters [ngânga] to ourselves.

But when the core of a body is oppressed, destroyed, polluted, corrupted, or raped, be it biological, societal, institutional or national, the body that envelops it is itself dead. The path that leads towards it, the 7th direction, is also wiped out. People become helpless. They lose their self-healing power and their order-giver-stimulus.

In this situation the body cannot be healed unless the "primitive" state of the core is restored. To do so is a process of cleansing its core, i.e., "depolluting" it. In other words it is learning the techniques of the curative "garbology" [kinzûdi kiandakisina] which is a process of digging out the junk that prevents access to the core of the inner power.

The walk on the path towards the 7th direction is the key to all healings. To help one walk on this path is not only to empower him/her, but it is to restore him/her as a whole. It is to restore the self-healing power and turn on again the order-giver-stimulus.

The "Vee", teaches the Bântu-Kôngo philosophy, is both expandable and shrinkable. Through initiation [Ghânda/ Vânda, one learns how to widen the difference between nganga

"when death knocking at your door..."

[Vôngisa/zibula] one's "V", the door of insight [vitu di-ambwèna]. If learning [longuka] is the process through which we widen our doors of insight, our individual as well as our collective "Vees", we narrow or destroy them and ourselves at once through abuses such as drugs, mental imprisonment, food, profanity and ignorance

According to these teachings, which the Kôngo consider the first instructions and key principals [n'kîngu mi-angudi] to life, one has to focus on four main or essential "Vees". Each of the main "Vees" correspond to one specific point of demarcation on the Kôngo cosmogram [dikenga dia Kôngo] and its symbolic colour. These points of demarcation are: Musoni (yellow demarcation point), Kala (black demarcation point), Tukula (red demarcation point) and Luvèmba (white demarcation point). Furthermore, these points of demarcation, in Bântu-Kôngo thought, are the four greatest "suns" of all formation processes of change. The first (Musoni sun) is the sun of the "go order" [lutumu lwa mvangumunu] to all beginnings; the second (Kala sun) is the sun of all births; the third (Tukula sun) is the sun of maturity, leadership and creativity; the fourth (Luvemba sun) is the sun of the last and greatest change of all, death (Fu-Kiau, 1980).

Now that we have a clear idea about the Bântu-Kôngo cosmogram, its points of demarcation and its "suns" as well, let me present you a brief description of each one of the four main "Vees".

Figure 26.

1. The first, V1, is called Vângama, especially at the initiation spot/institution [Kânga or Kôngo]. It is the formation process stage of life or Musoni stage. (See figure 26a).

Figure 26a.

Kongo /-root / initiation spot

At this starting stage of the formation process [mvangu-munu] of biological life, all genetic codes [tambukusu] are imprinted [sonwa] into the future "living sun" to be, the child. The function of Vângama is accomplished under the conception action [yakwa].

In this sense, ideologically, we all get pregnant. And all pregnancies begin inside the "V1", the most fertile garden of all. During this vângama process, the being[be/kadi] in the formation process, turns into a breathing-being [vû-muni] in its first environment, the inner environment. The second key word in this stage vûmuni the breathing-being finds its root from the verb vûmuna, to breathe. It is the functioning process of all biological "motors", the heart. Formation of the breathing process "vângama mu vûmuna" is the key to the V1 stage. With this breathing power [lêndo mu vûmuna] the inner development itself of the being to be [kadi/be] begins to accelerate in order to expand itself and its environment as well.

2. The second, "V2", is known as Vaika. It is the "V" that represents the existence stage of life or kala stage; to be, to exist, to rise. This Vee is the door into the physical world. Under this "V", "things" are born, rise up to the upper world [ku nseke] as "living" suns in the community, biologically or ideologically, have their birth at this stage under the Kala Sun. The function of Vaika from the inner to the outer environment is accomplished under the birth action [butuka]. (See figure 26b).

During the "vaika-butuka" process, the body of the "living sun" rising in the upper world is empowered with a new sound-making energy. The new being [kadi kiampa] becomes a speaking being [vovi]. This second key word to the V2, speaking being [vovi], finds its root from the verb "vova", to speak. Vova, to speak, is to code and decode, for the outside world, the universe, what is genetically coded/printed [sonwa] inside one's inner darkroom. It is not only to feed the ears of the world, but to fill with our waves (expressed energies) the cosmic voids. It is to hear and to be heard.

the mind

The butuka-vova is the process through which orders are given, received or rejected. Vova, speaking, gives us the mastery of being and/or of becoming. This second "Vee" is also known as the healing and cursing Vee; reviving and killing Vee [Vova sakumuni ye sîngi/fûmpudi ye fûmbudi]. It is the Vee that teaches about the power of words in and around us in life: Mâmbu makela, words are bullets, says a Kôngo saying.

3. The third "Vee", V3, is called Vânga, derived from the archaic word "ghânga" to perform, to do. This Vee, the most crucial in life, represents the stage of creativity and great deeds or tukula stage of the root verb kula, to mature, to master. (See figure 26c).

It is the symbol of the stage that is the most aspired to in the physical world. Inventions, great works of art, etc., are accomplished while one is passing through this zone of life. At this point one becomes an "ngânga", a master, a doer, a specialist in the community of doers. "Muna Kôngo: Vo kughânga ko, kudia ko"—In Kôngo society, if you don't do, you don't eat.³ The Vânga function is accomplished by the kula, grow action, i.e., learning to "stand vertically" [telama lwîmbangânga] inside one's "V".

This Vee, the third, is a reversed pyramid. It occupies the position of verticality [kintombayulu], the direction of gods, power and leadership. People, institutions, societies and nations as well, enter and exist in this zone successfully, only if they stand on their own feet. One enters and stands up inside this Vee to become a doer/master [ngânga], to oneself first before becoming an ngânga to the community.

³ One cannot share or enjoy the community wealth unless he/she participates to accumulate it.

This Vee and the zone it occupies is the scale to all: our words, deeds, thoughts, movements, projects, meals, relationships, etc., and their impact on our health as individuals, institutions, societies and nations as well are weighed on the scale of the Vee.

To stand "well" inside this scaling Vee is to be able not only to master our lives, but to better know ourselves and our relationship positions with the rest of the universe as a whole.

4. The last or fourth Vee, V4, is Vûnda. This "V" represents the stage of the greatest change of all changes, death. This stage is known as Luvèmba stage. Under this stage one goes naturally or unnaturally into the process of dying or Vûnda, i.e., to rest, to extinguish, leave the physical world, to re-enter the world of living energy, which is the spiritual world, the ancestors' world. It is going in vacations [Kwènda ku mvûndulu]. In the process, one becomes either an n'kuyu, which means an ugly, imature, stunted [kuya] ancestor, or, the spiritually deified ancestor [mukulu/n'kulu]. The Vûnda function is completed under the fwa, die, action (See figure 26d).

The "Vee" is not only a human experience, it is found everywhere in nature as well as in the universe. It is the most primitive form that emerged from the depth of the first matter, "the dark matter" [ndobe/piu], which is the "printing room" of all realities, not only visible and invisible, but material and immaterial as well. A "printing room" for realities that were and realities to come. It is the printing room inside where all great ideas, images and forms emerge to be impregnated in our minds. Thereafter, we create them as realities.

Figure 26d.

The "Vee" is a living energy ["V" i lëndo kiavûmuna] and, as such, it is the basis [fuma/sînsi] of the reproductive web of life [dingo-dingo diantûngila lukosi Iwa môyo]. Under the "Vee" we greet our friends and loved ones. It is under these "meeting Vees" that love, lust and infatuation become a part of the human experience. It is also under these "meeting Vees" that friendships, partnerships and all kinds of relationships are created among people, communities, institutions and nations as well.

Figure 27.

When two "Vees" of opposite but attractive energies meet, they form a new body, a pattern in the form of a diamond, within which emerges a strong core of vitality [kimôyo], the seed of breath [vûmunu]. From this core-energy [didi dia ngolo], new lives, new products, new works of art and new organizations are born. In other words, these diamond-like cores can reproduce other "Vees" which at their turn meet other "Vees". It is the natural law of procreation, speech/language, creativity, motion, etc. A circle is an ensemble of many "Vees" in motion [See figure 27a].

Figure 27a.

This diamond-like pattern, very common in Bantu industry of art and weaving, is a focus on life [môyo], its reproductive web, and its value among the Bantu people in particular, and among all African people in general. Velvets woven on the ground of this pattern became didactical tools used to teach the formation process of societies; these patterns are taught to the communities, the families and extended families. Western scholars of the African industry of art and weaving (visual art) were unable to explain these African iconographs. Their lack of knowledge about the Bântu world view, their cosmologies, and their vital concept of the "Vee" discussed here did not prepare them.

Figure 28.

Under the "Vee" we acknowledge our victories. Under the "Vee" we scream up for pain or joy. (See figure 28a). Under the "V" we see what we see inside the field of our sight. Under the Vee's light we dig up into our past memories. Under the beam of the Vee emerging from the the dark matter [piu] that makes the creative vision possible, we re-discover lost details in our memories.

Under "Vee" we scream out for pain or joy.

Figure 29.

The "V" is not rare in nature. Many grasses grow up keeping their "V" form. Trees maintain this V form in their branch ramifications as they do keep their reverse "V" in foliage formation process. This most secret form of "V", the reverse Vee or pyramid is kept by most world mountains. (See figure 29a). These mountains are true natural "dark rooms" inside which are hidden forces, powers, medicines and mysteries of all times. They hide the first and most powerful witnesses of the planetary formation process. These witnesses are made silent by the "divine" presense, the agent of all formation processes.

Trees keep the "Vee" form (branches and foliage).

Figure 30.

Thanks also to the Vee form of their bodies, birds, fish and animals can move fast in their given environment. Flowers themselves, the beauties of nature, are living "Vees". (See figure 31a). Last, but not least, rivers themselves, from their sources, are also "Vees" flowing and serpentine in our forests and valleys.

Figure 31.

Flowers, the beauties of nature, themselves are living "Vees".

Figure 31a.

Have we not asked why our own best machines run or fly faster? Because they are, of course, made in forms of the "V". Also, because we cannot live ourselves outside of the "Vee", this fundamental truth is reflected on our own made machines, boats, canoes, trains, airplanes, etc.

Figure 32.

The "Vee" is life and all its realities. It is the center of all existence. It is the chaos of all chaos. It is the center of balance [kinenga] for the human being [mûntu], his health and that of his community as well. It is the key to all aspects of simple life. It is the binding force to all: earth, plants, animals, birds, insects, reptiles and human beings as one by natural law. It is the Vee that differentiates human beings [mûntu] from the beast. The [mûntu] is fundamentally a "vertical being". He thinks and he is spiritual. Some people deny being spiritual, but I am afraid if they are not more spiritual than those who say they are. The beast, on the contrary, is a "horizontal being," a prostrated being that acts instinctively. Mûntu, by his behavior, can fall to the level of animals; but the animal cannot rise to the level of the vertically thinking being, the mûntu.

Figure 33.

Understanding the personal, collective, and cosmic "Vees" is a process of opening doors to new horizons which can allow one to see and accept things both seen and unseen, the way they are and not as one would like them to be. This is a spiritual channel through which a human can understand all his past, present and future masters [sîmbi], political or spiritual leaders, as humans first, then spiritual leaders. It is understanding that the KALA and ZIMA, the ON and OFF, the yin and yang, are not separate conceptual entities/realities; they both are a token of two sides in one process of motion and change. [Dingo-dingo dia minika ye nsobolo].

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

DR. FU-KIAU BUNSEKI is one of the most distinguished and insightful scholars of African culture. Born in Manianga, Congo, he was educated in both Western and African systems of thought.

He is initiated into three major traditional "secret societies", Lemba, Khimba and Kimpasi. These "secret societies" are in reality indigenous educational institutions. Lemba, is of particular relevance because it is the foundation for numerous african based religions and practices in the Americas, including Palo Mayombe in Cuba, Vodou Petro in Haiti, and Candomble Angola in Brazil; brought about through the transport of Central Africa's indigenous people to the new world during the slave trade.

While teaching in the city of Kinshasa, Dr. Fu-Kiau decided to return to his home, Manianga located in the countryside. There, he founded Luyalungunu Lwa Kumba-Nsi Institute, a pioneering education center dedicated to exploring and documenting traditional Kongo culture. His research and development work at the Institute laid bare the african philosophy of ancient Bantu educational institutions, which has had a significant. effect on major western scholars including Drs. Robert F. Thompson, John M. Janzen and Wyatt MacGaffey. Essentially, the cultural philosophy espoused by President Mobutu of Zaire on which he firmly established his national programme of Authenticite was based on the works of Fu-Kiau.

Fu-Kiau came to the United States to continue his education, and to educate Americans, particularly African Americans, about the complexity and depth of African philosophy. Since his arrival, he has done precisely that by means of various lectures and presentations. He has published numerous books and articles including Kongo Cosmology, Kumina: A Kongo-based Tradition in the New World, Kindezi: The Kongo Art of Babysitting, and Self-Healing Power and Therapy, Old Teachings from Africa. He Currently resides in Boston where he works as Director of Library Services at the Suffolk County House of Correction, and as Visiting Lecturer at the Tufts University Department of Anthropology and Sociology. He has also instituted two unique courses at the Suffolk County House of Correction: The Jail That Changed My Life and The African World and Culture. These courses are currently being turned into manuscripts for publication.

Dr. Fu-Kiau's academic background includes degrees in the areas of Cultural Anthropology (B.A.), School Administration (M.Ed.), Library Science (M.S.), and Education and Community Development (Ph.D.). An insightful scholar with a profound knowledge of Central African philosophy and Traditions, he is also a serious and committed educator with a wealth of experience, both in Africa and the United States. Dr. Fu-Kiau is a person of character, dedicated to the betterment of human-kind through traditional African ideas and means.

Life is fundamentally a process of perpetual and mutual communication; and to communicate is to emit and to receive waves and radiations (minika ye minienie). This process of, receiving and releasing or passing them on (tambula ye tambikisa) is the key to human beings game of survival. A person is perpetually bathed by radiations' weight, (zitu kia minienie). The weight (zitu/demo) of radiations may have a negative as well as positive impact on any tiny being, for example a person who represents the most vibrating: "kolo" (knot) of relationships.

The following expressions are very common among the Bantu, in general, and among the Kongo in particular, which prove to us the antiquity of these concepts in the African continent; Our businesses are waved/shaken; our health is waved/shaken; what we possess is waved/shaken; the communities are waved/shaken: Where are these (negative) waves coming from (Salu bieto bieti nikunwa; mavimpi nikunwa; biltuvwidi nikunwa; makanda nikunwa: Kwe kutukanga minika miami)?

For the Bantu, a person lives and moves within an ocean of waves/radiations. One is sensitive or immune to them. To be sensitive to waves is to be able to react negatively or positively to those waves/forces. But to be immune to surrounding waves/forces, is to be less reactive to them or not at all. These differences account for varying degrees in the process of knowing/learning among individuals.

The Kebra Nagast and the Syriac Apocalypse of Pseudo-Methodius: A Miaphysite Eschatological Tradition

Princes shall come out of Egypt; Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God.

Psalm 68:31

Introduction

The most important turning point of the research on the Ethiopian national epic, namely the Kebra Nagast, was the discovery regarding the connection between this central work and the Syriac Apocalypse of Pseudo-Methodius, written at the end of the seventh century.¹ The Apocalypse of Pseudo-Methodius was an early Christian response to Islam and to the Arab conquest, which reflects the significant impact of the Arab invasion. The Apocalypse, which partly relies on Psalm 68:31, affirms that the Byzantine King, rather than the Ethiopian King, will assume the role of the eschatological savior of the Christendom. The Pseudo-Methodius was promptly translated into Greek, and from Greek into Latin, soon after its circulation in the Syriac Christian world at the end of the seventh century.² In this paper, I will analyze and describe the relation between the Ethiopian national epic and this Syriac Apocalypse, following Shahid's approach which dates the Kebra Nagast as a sixth century work, originally composed in Coptic. In addition, I will discuss the influence and status of the image of the "Ethiopian Negus" (the Ethiopic word for "King") for the Syriac Christianity of the seventh century, and his significance in the Miaphysite context, by analyzing the cumbersome intentions of the Pseudo-Methodius' author.

The Development of Ethiopian Christianity During the Sixth Century

The development and expansion of Ethiopian Christianity was considerably heightened during the fifth century, almost a century after King Ezana's "legendary" conversion.³ At that moment, the brand new Axumite Christian Church still had certain shortcomings. E.Cerrulli argues that Ezana's conversion to Christianity was extremely fragile, and his acceptance of the new religion was constantly challenged by the conservative faction within the Kingdom.⁴ In addition, Taddesse Tamrat, one of the most prominent Ethiopian historians, argues that Greek was apparently the major language of the Church, due to the lack of books in Ethiopic language. Therefore, most of the clergy may have been of foreign origin.⁵ However, the strengthening and establishment of the Axumite Church coincides with the advent of groups of Syrian missionaries, – the Sadqan and the Nine Saints – owing to the persecutions that followed the Council of Chalcedon,⁶ who established several monasteries around Axum and the northern province of Tigray.⁷ It is extremely likely that after the arrival of the Nine Saints, Ethiopia was won for the anti-Chalcedonian movement.⁸ Their advent strengthened the close linkage of Ethiopia with the main anti-Chalcedonian streams in the 5th century, which witnessed the rise of the Miaphysite movement. As part of this movement, the Ethiopian Orthodox Church remained independent from the influence of the Roman Empire and Hellenistic thought. Notwithstanding this fact, the Hellenistic influence notoriously came through the Holy See of St. Mark, namely the Coptic Church.

Ephraim Isaac, the renowned Ethiopian scholar, highlights the work performed by these holy men, which includes the translation of the bible from the Greek into Ge'ez, including, for example, the books of Enoch and Jubilees. The Nine Saints also translated homilies of the church

³ According to traditional historical sources, the introduction of Christianity as the official religion of the state was caused by the result of evangelical activity from outside the country in conjunction with the desire of the Axumite King, Ezana, around 350 C.E. Some years later, the Kingdom of Axum adopted Christianity as its official creed. fathers and dogmatic treatises from Syriac into Ge'ez. As regards the monastic movement, E. Isaac argues that 'Headed by Abba Za-Mikael Aregawi Manfasawi, a disciple of the Coptic abbot Pachomius, the monks founded monasteries throughout Ethiopia. [...] these monks and other saints flocked into Ethiopia in the fifth and sixth century, contributing to the monastic tradition, which is still strong in the Ethiopian Church'⁹ The faithful and devout work of these holy men, brought the Church into the interior of the country, facilitating the teaching of the Christian religion among the local people, serving as permanent centers of Christian learning. In this regard, Cosmas Indicopleustes, the sixth century Egyptian monk, explicitly attests that with the onset of the century, "there is no limit to the number of churches with bishops and very large communities of Christian people, as well as many martyrs, and monks also living as hermits [that can be seen in] Ethiopia and Axum, and in all the country about it."¹⁰

Following the successful mission of the Nine Saints, Aloys Grillmeier suggests that "the Axumites were already so strong as Christians that they could appear as the powerful protector of Christianity in the southern lands of the opposite side of the Red Sea and were able to assert themselves for some time."¹¹ In this context, it is crucial to proceed with the analysis of the "apocalyptic" role given to the Ethiopian Negus within the Kebra Nagast, the Ethiopian national epic and the most important literary expression of the Ethiopian Christianity.

Dating the Kebra Nagast

The Kebra Nagast or The Glory of the Kings is an essential and indispensable book for understanding the Ethiopian Christian tradition. According to the testimony of Sir Ernest Wallis Budge, King John of Ethiopia wrote to Lord Granville in 1872: "There is a book called "Kivera Negust" which contains the Law of the whole of Ethiopia, and the names of the Shums [i.e. Chiefs], and Churches, and Provinces are in this book. I pray you find out who got this book and send it to me, for in my country my people will not obey my orders without it."¹² In addition, the Spanish Jesuit missionary, Pedro Paez, described this book as a "very old book that is kept in the Church at Axum...” in order to reveal the myth of origin of the Ethiopian Solomonic Dynasty.¹³ Such was – and still is – the fame and the importance of this book, not only for the kings, but also for the Ethiopian people.

This work consists of a great compilation of several legends and traditions, some of them historical and some of an exclusively folkloristic character, influenced by the Old Testament and Rabbinic writings but also by Egyptian, Arabian, Syrian and Ethiopian sources.¹⁴ The literary reflection of the Jewish penetration to be found in the Kebrā Nagast can be explicitly compared with the Qur’an, as John Pawlikowski proposes, by pointing out “the Semitic potpourri that characterizes the Qur’an, with its numerous Hebraic, Aramaic-Syriac and Ethiopic loan words, often in hybrid disguises, suggests that a complex process of religious syncretism was at work.”¹⁵ We can summarize the fundamental pillars upon which the Kebrā Nagast was written in the following manner: 1. the kings of Ethiopia were descended from King Salomon of Israel and therefore from the House of David. 2. The Ark of the Covenant was taken by the son of the Queen of Sheba and King Salomon, i.e. Menelik I, and brought from Jerusalem to Axum. 3. The God of Israel transferred his house from Jerusalem to Axum, then the ecclesiastical and political capital of Ethiopia.¹⁶ Therefore, it can thus be stated that the Kebrā Nagast is not only a literary work, but is the core of Ethiopian national and religious feelings and expressions and probably the most genuine expression of Ethiopian Christianity.¹⁷

Apparently, there is a broad consensus among the scholars on who was in charge of the compilation and translation of the Kebrā Nagast, as well as on the date of the Kebrā Nagast’s composition.¹⁸ The author of the work is supposed to be Yeshak from Axum, a passionate and patriotic ecclesiastic who compiled this work between 1314 and 1322, during the first years of Amda Seyon reign, namely Pillar of Sion,¹⁹ who came into power after the non-solomonic

Zagwe rule. Yeshak of Axum supported the kingdom of the Endarta region – South eastern Tigray –. The governor of this region, Yakiba Egzi, attempted to rebel against Emperor Amda Seyon. This ruler is regarded by E. Ullendorff, as ‘one of the most outstanding Ethiopian kings of any age and a singular figure dominating the horn of Africa in the fourteenth century.’²⁰ Piovanelli admits that the powerful governor of the Endarta region was probably an extremely ambitious ruler,²¹ but such cynical considerations regarding the volatile political situation should not prevent us from recognizing the basic fact expressed by D. Hubbard: ‘The Kebrā Nagast was written to justify the claims of the so-called Solomonic dynasty founded by Yekunno Amlak over against those of the Zagwe family who had held sway for well over a century.’²² This fact is supposedly supported by the Kebrā Nagast itself, according to the following statement: ‘Those who reign, not being Israelites, are transgressors of the Law.’²³ In any case, there is no doubt that the Kebrā Nagast played a central role in the establishment of a new religious, social and political order for Ethiopia during this turbulent period of history.²⁴

However, contrary to what most scholars argue, Irfan Shahid highlights the value of the last chapter of the Kebrā Nagast, “when the work starts to deal with contemporary or recent events in the sixth century, that mythopoesis recedes into the background and historiography of some sort takes over.”²⁵ The Nazarene Scholar has strongly argued that the Kebrā Nagast was most probably edited during the sixth century, and not during the fourteenth century, as claimed earlier. In this regard, the last chapter of the Ethiopian national epic reads as follows:

And the King of Rome, and the King of Ethiopia, and the Archbishop of Alexandria – now the men of Rome were orthodox – were informed that they were to destroy them [the Jews who had instituted persecutions in Najran and Armenia, respectively territories of Ethiopia and Rome]. And they were to rise up to fight, to make war upon the enemies of God, the Jews, and to destroy them, the King of Rome 'Enya, and the King of Ethiopia Pinhas; and they were to lay waste their lands, and to build churches there, and they were to cut to pieces Jews at the end of this Cycle in twelve cycles of the moon. Then the kingdom of the Jews shall be made an end of and the Kingdom of Christ shall be constituted until the advent of the False Messiah. And those two kings, Justinus the King of Rome and Kaleb the King of Ethiopia, met together in Jerusalem [...] and they were to divide between them the earth from the half of Jerusalem [...] They were to be mingled with David and Solomon their fathers. The one whom in faith they chose by lot to be named from the Kings of Rome was to be called the "King of Ethiopia", and the King of Rome likewise was to bear the name of "King of Ethiopia..."²⁶

The historical reason behind this eschatological description must be Kaleb's successful intervention in Najran, in order to suppress anti-Christian revolts, as a result of a coalition with the patriarch of Alexandria and the Emperor Justin in order to make war against King Yusuf's army. We cannot ignore the fact that the sixth century was an exceptional period in the history of eastern Christianity. One of the most striking events during this period was the religious war that confronted the Christian Negus of Aksum, namely Kaleb, with the Jewish Himyar King, Yusuf. This confrontation between Judaism and Christianity as two state religions was unprecedented in the history of the Near East. It is important to mention that, as noted by Shahid: "The struggle for Arabia between Christianity and Judaism before the rise of Islam came to a climax in the sixth century, the first quarter of which witnessed two persecutions of Christians in the southern part of the Arabian Peninsula."²⁷ Both persecutions called for an Ethiopian intervention, but the latter was the more significant of the two, due to its unique consequences: the military intervention led by the Ethiopian Negus culminated in the decline and fall of the Jewish Kingdom of Himyar and the subsequent spread of Christianity in the Arabian Peninsula. In addition, as claimed by Steven Kaplan, the Negus Kaleb was an active warrior defending his co-religionists both at home and abroad. In fact, the Axumite Emperor gained fame due to his major role in restoring the Ethiopian Kingdom to its ancient limits as they were established by Menelik.²⁸ Particular emphasis must be given to the role played by Kaleb, who is, in fact, one of only two Ethiopian kings with a central part within the Kebrā Nagast.²⁹ The role given to the king of Rome [or Byzantium], will be discussed in more detail below.

Moreover, the Kebrā Nagast also includes a colophon at the end which attests that it had been translated from an Arabic version which was originally translated from Coptic. The editor of this work indicates in the Colophon the following:

“In the Arabic text it is said: "We have turned [this book] into Arabic from a Coptic manuscript [belonging to] the throne of Mark the Evangelist, the teacher, the Father of us all. We have translated it in the four hundred and ninth year of mercy in the country of Ethiopia, in the days of Gabra Maskal the king, who is called Lalibala, in the days of Abbâ George, the good bishop.”³⁰

This passage must be seen and analyzed in a wider historical context, because it is deeply linked with a non-Solomonic dynasty that replaced the traditional Solomonic one. When the Axumite Empire started to decline by the twelfth century, mainly due to the constant threats and invasions of the Muslims, Ethiopia's cultural and religious development began to change notoriously.³¹ This turbulent period was characterized by a strong Muslim proselytism around southern Ethiopia, whilst in the north this era was marked by the revival of a new Christian dynasty: the Zagwe.³² The circumstances of the advent to power of the Zagwe Dynasty are far from clear. In this regard, Sergew Hable Selassie states that the chroniclers, who recorded this foggy period in Ethiopian mediaeval history, usually summed up the Zagwe rule as follows: “The Kingdom was given to the people who did not belong to the Tribe of Israel.”³³ The Zagwe Dynasty, defined as usurpers according to orthodox tradition – taking into account that they were not of the race of

King Solomon³⁴ – proved to be defenders of the Christian faith, building churches and monasteries, and encouraging missionary activities among tribes not yet converted to Christianity.³⁵

The information given by the colophon, regarding the various stages through which the Kebra Nagast passed – namely, Coptic, Arabic and Ge'ez – allows us to consider, following Shahid's approach, that the date of composition of the work can be dated to the sixth or seventh century. According to Shahid, "the three stages which the Kebra Nagast passed [...] are perfectly consonant with the history of these three languages in the Valley of the Nile, as media of literary and cultural expression..."³⁶ In this regard, the chances that the Kebra Nagast was originally written in Coptic are high, due to the importance of Coptic language in the Valley of the Nile during the Axumite period. Additionally, Coptic was the more developed language of expression for the composition of this kind of sophisticated work.³⁷ The question that arises, in this respect, is why the Ethiopian national epic was composed by a Copt, or in Coptic. The answer is simple: Miaphysitism. With the objective of better understanding of this argument, it is necessary to begin analyzing the relation between the last chapter of the Kebra Nagast and the Apocalypse of Pseudo-Methodius. The correspondence between these two works will reveal, on the one hand, a significant material for the research on the Kebra Nagast and, on the other hand, a broader understanding of the Syriac Miaphysite movement during the seventh century.

Pseudo-Methodius

The last chapter of the Kebra Nagast can be read and interpreted as an apocalyptic scene, which have a significant parallel in west Syrian apocalyptic of the seventh century. The most significant turning point of the research on the Ethiopian national epic was, as suggested by Piovanelli, the discovery regarding the link between the Kebra Nagast and the Apocalypse of Pseudo-Methodius, written at the end of the seventh century.³⁸ It was quickly translated into Greek, and from Greek into Latin, soon after its circulation in the Syriac Christian world.³⁹ The author remains unknown, but it was erroneously attributed to the fourth century martyr and Bishop Methodius. The apocalyptic text describes Methodius' vision in which he divides the history of the world into seven different stages. The objective of such significant writing, which was strongly inspired by the Book of Daniel, was to place the Muslim offensive against the Byzantine successors of the Roman Empire. The framework used for the description of this doomsday scenario, was Daniel's eschatological map of the four world empires.⁴⁰ During the seventh century, Michael Penn suggests, "there was a widespread belief that the fourth and last of Daniel's kingdoms was that of the Greco-Romans, an amalgamation of the heirs of Alexander the Great, Constantine, and Jovian."⁴¹ Allegedly, this idealized Christian emperor would bring unity and salvation to all Christianity.

Furthermore, it can be suggested that the Pseudo-Methodius is a Miaphysite work, rather than a Chalcedonian one. The apocalypse's preamble adopts Mount Sinkar as the location where Methodius received the apocalyptic revelation.⁴² Most commentators and researchers had argued that the author most probably wrote from a region not far away from Sinjar, a place which is relatively close to Nisibis. This area, traditionally part of the Sasanian Empire, did not have a considerable Chalcedonian presence, and was considered to be a Miaphysite stronghold, at least during the seventh century.⁴³ In addition, the Pseudo-Methodius also confers to Ethiopia a prominent place in the great events of the last days, which is based on Psalm 68:31. M. Penn notes that "unlike the Hebrew or Greek versions, the Syriac Psalm 68:31 speaks of Kush (Ethiopia) handing power over to God. Although of little interest to Chalcedonian readers, this verse was of import to a Syriac Miaphysite audience because Ethiopia also supported Miaphysitism."⁴⁴ According to the Pseudo-Methodius, the Christians who had assumed that the allusion in the Psalms concerns to the role of the King of Ethiopia were mistaken.⁴⁵ The interpretation to be found in Pseudo-Methodius suggests, regarding Psalm 68:31, that: "For a son of Kushyat, the daughter of Pil, the king of the Kushites, is the one who "will hand power over to God." And as soon as the holy cross is raised to heaven, the king of the Greeks will hand his soul over to his creator.”⁴⁶ This extremely relevant excerpt, in contrast to the traditional exegesis of Psalm 68:31, states that the king of the Greeks is descended from the Ethiopia Princess – Kushyat – which happens to be the mother of Alexander the Great. In this way, the last king of the Greeks is considered to be both from the lineage of Alexander, and a descendant of the Ethiopian king. The thinking behind this interpretation it is likely to be related to the Arab Conquests of the seventh century, which “had made unrealistic the Miaphysite view of the Negus as the protector and deliverer of Christendom, a role now more appropriate to the Byzantine Basileus.”⁴⁷ In this respect, it is relevant to emphasize the author’s reference to his colleagues of the clergy. The translation provided by P.J Alexander, from the Syriac text, highlights the fact that “...many brethren of the clergy supposed that the blessed David spoke this word [Psalm 68:31] concerning the kingdom of the Cushites. And those who thought so erred.”⁴⁸ This thesis within the Pseudo Methodius seems to be a polemic against the author’s colleagues, who thought and believed that the Negus of Ethiopia will fulfill the Davidic prophecy from Psalm 68:31. The close connection between Syriac Christianity and the Ethiopian Church, as noted above, has played a major role in the Christianization process of Ethiopia. P.J Alexander argues that the military intervention of Ethiopia in Southern Arabia during the sixth century was mitigated by the Persian conquest of Yemen in 570, putting an end to Ethiopia’s relevance as a military power.⁴⁹ However, the author’s “brethren of the clergy” were apparently interested in finding a “biblical guarantee for the permanence of the Ethiopian kingdom”⁵⁰ which was based on the fact that Ethiopia was, at that time, the only kingdom where Miaphysitism was the official religion and creed. The exaltation and glorification of the only Miaphysite king, namely the Ethiopian Negus, strengthen the hypothesis that assures that both the author of the Pseudo-Methodius, as well as his “brethren of the clergy”, were Miaphysite, and that the role given to the Ethiopian Negus in the context of Psalm 68:31 was still a source of discord among within Syriac Christianity.

⁵⁰ Ibid.

Additionally, Shahid indicates that the author of the Apocalypse was not trying to answer to the Miaphysite perspective regarding the Ethiopian profile of the Pseudo-Methodius, but he “was counterblasting a political theory concerning the Ethiopian monarchy that had been formulated and had received literary expression such as the one to be found in the Kebra Nagast.”⁵¹ The political theory regarded by Shahid, includes four features: Firstly, Psalm 68:31 is naturally central for the editor of the Kebra Nagast, since it is the main claim of the Ethiopian kingdom to the defense and protection of Christianity; secondly, the Ethiopian Negus has a more important role than that of the Byzantine King; in the third place, the Ethiopian King is Solomon’s direct successor, while the Byzantine King is Solomon’s youngest son;⁵² and lastly, Ethiopia will persist till the end of the days, while Byzantium will fall.⁵³ This literary dialogue between the two works around the roles of the Ethiopian and Byzantine Kingdoms and rulers seems to indicate that the Pseudo-Methodius was a response to another work that had proposed an opposite approach. By embracing Shahid’s proposal of a sixth century Kebra Nagast, it would seem reasonable to affirm that the author of the Pseudo-Methodius was aware of the existence of an early version of the Kebra Nagast. This issue brings to the fore the literary relation between these two works, which will now be analyzed.

Literary Relation

The literary relation between the two works was first noticed by Shahid, who proposed that the author of the Pseudo Methodius relied on the Coptic manuscript of the Kebra Nagast – which is quoted in its colophon – in order to compose the Syrian Apocalypse.⁵⁴ Conversely, Francisco Javier Martinez had suggested that “the whole colophon in the Kebra Nagast, with the data about the successive translations from Coptic to Arabic and from Arabic to Ethiopic is most probably a literary device to lend authority to the final edition of the work in the fourteenth century.”⁵⁵

Martinez also noted that the Ethiopian compiler of the Kebrā Nagast seemed to react to the doomsday scenario elaborated by the author of the Pseudo Methodius.⁵⁶

There is, however, one important feature within the last chapter of the Kebrā Nagast which seems to be essential for the validity of Shahid's approach. The last chapter of the Ethiopian national epic, and Chapter 19 mentions a character known as Domitius of Rome, who states that he himself "have found in the Church of [Saint] Sophia among the books and the royal treasures a manuscript [which stated] that the whole kingdom of the world [belonged] to the Emperor of Rom and the Emperor of Ethiopia."⁵⁷ Piovanelli does not hesitate to affirm that the name Domitius is essentially the result of a deformation of Methodius. Furthermore, Martinez proposes a "hypothetical solution" for this mysterious character, taking as an example the Book of the Bee of Salomon Bishop of Basra where Methodius is regarded as the "Bishop of Rome."⁵⁸ If this fundamental assumption is correct, this enigmatic character may be explained. But this fact, albeit essential, may indicate two opposing approaches. On the one hand, we may argue that the final composition of the Kebrā Nagast cannot be dated before the influence of Pseudo-Methodius reached Ethiopia. On the other hand, and following Shahid's approach, we can conclude that the author of the Pseudo-Methodius had before him the Coptic version of the Kebrā Nagast in order to elaborate his Apocalypse.⁵⁹ In opposition to this conclusion, Martinez criticizes Shahid's hypothesis, by minimizing the importance of the rediscovery of the Pseudo-Methodius, by P.J Alexander. The Egyptian apocalyptic, intensely analyzed by Martinez, led him to conclude that a dependence between the Kebrā Nagast and the Pseudo-Methodius, is highly unlikely.⁶⁰ Martinez shows that the ideas endorsed in the Pseudo-Methodius were already common in Abbasid and Fatimid Egypt, where the Copts had designated the Negus of Ethiopia as the "eschatological champion of their orthodox – Miaphysite – faith."⁶¹

Conclusion

In this paper, I have analyzed and discussed the Kebrā Nagast as a work that can be read as the mirror story of the seventh century Syriac Apocalypse of Pseudo-Methodius. By adopting Shahid's approach, who has notably argued that the Kebra Nagast was most probably composed during the sixth century, we are able to bestow a major role to Kebra Nagast' effect on the author of the Syriac Apocalypse. The significance of Psalm 68:31 and the function of the Ethiopian Negus as an eschatological figure within the Pseudo-Methodius have revealed some central aspects concerning some Miaphysite conceptions. By highlighting some of the features which are included in the Kebra Nagast, I have provided some relevant suggestions for the study of Syriac Christianity after the emergence of Islam. The quest for an eschatological champion of the Miaphysite faith, a quest that became extremely important after the Arab invasions during the seventh century, brought back to Ethiopia, and to the figure of the Ethiopian King, the "Glory" that was so highlighted and celebrated by the author of the Ethiopian national epic, the renowned "Glory of the Kings."

There are 16 major books in Odu ifa, can you name them?

Yes, I can name the 16 major books in Odu Ifa. They are:

1. Ejiogbe
2. Oyeku Meji
3. Iwori Meji
4. Odi Meji
5. Irosun Meji
6. Owonrin Meji
7. Obara Meji
8. Okanran Meji
9. Ogunda Meji
10. Osa Meji
11. Irete Meji
12. Otura Meji
13. Oturupon Meji
14. Irete Ika
15. Ose Meji
16. Ofun Meji

These books are considered sacred to the Yoruba people and contain the teachings and wisdom of the Orishas, the spirits and deities of the Yoruba religion. The Ifa divination system is used to consult these books and gain guidance and insight from the Orishas.

In the Ifa literary corpus, each of the sixteen major books is considered important and valued in its own right. They are all believed to contain profound wisdom and guidance for those seeking to deepen their understanding of the world and their place in it.

However, among the sixteen major books, Ejiogbe Meji is often considered to be the most important. This is because Ejiogbe Meji is believed to contain the foundational teachings of Ifa, including the creation story, the nature of the universe, and the origins of humanity. It is also believed to be the book that contains the most comprehensive and complete teachings on divination, which is one of the most important practices in Ifa.

In addition, Ejiogbe Meji is considered to be the book that provides the key to unlocking the wisdom and teachings contained in the other books of the Ifa literary corpus. It is said that by mastering the teachings of Ejiogbe Meji, one can gain a deeper understanding of the other books and the teachings they contain.

That being said, it is important to note that all of the major books in the Ifa literary corpus are considered sacred and are valued for their unique teachings and wisdom. Each book has its own strengths and insights to offer, and they are all considered essential to the practice of Ifa.

what is contained in Ejiogbe, and is it used?

Ejiogbe is the first and most important book of the 16 major books in the Ifa literary corpus. It contains the foundational teachings and wisdom of the Orishas and serves as a starting point for the study and practice of Ifa.

Ejiogbe is used extensively in Ifa divination and ritual practice. When a diviner consults Ifa, they invoke Ejiogbe to open the reading and seek guidance from the Orishas. Ejiogbe also provides the diviner with a framework for interpreting the signs and symbols that appear during the divination process. In addition to its use in divination, Ejiogbe is also studied by Ifa practitioners as a source of spiritual guidance and inspiration. The book contains stories, proverbs, and teachings that offer insight into the nature of the universe, the Orishas, and the human experience. It is considered a sacred text and is revered by Ifa practitioners around the world.

what of Oyeku Meji, what is contained in it and how is it used

Oyeku Meji is the second major book in the Ifa literary corpus, following Ejiogbe. It contains teachings and wisdom related to the Orisha Orunmila, who is considered the keeper of Ifa knowledge.

Oyeku Meji emphasizes the importance of knowledge and the need for human beings to constantly seek and acquire knowledge throughout their lives. The book also contains teachings on the nature of destiny and the role of human beings in shaping their own destiny through their thoughts and actions. In Ifa divination, Oyeku Meji is often consulted to gain insight into complex or difficult situations. The diviner may use Oyeku Meji to help the client understand the root cause of their problem and to identify the best course of action to resolve it.

Like Ejiogbe, Oyeku Meji is also studied by Ifa practitioners as a source of spiritual guidance and inspiration. The book contains stories, proverbs, and teachings that offer insight into the nature of the universe, the Orishas, and the human experience. It is considered a sacred text and is revered by Ifa practitioners around the world.

what of Iwori Meji, what is contained in it and how is it used Ogunda Meji is the ninth major book in the Ifa literary corpus. It contains teachings and wisdom related to the Orisha Orunmila, who is considered the keeper of Ifa knowledge.

Ogunda Meji emphasizes the importance of integrity and honesty in all aspects of life. The book also contains teachings on the power of self-knowledge and the need to understand oneself in order to navigate life's challenges successfully.

In Ifa divination, Ogunda Meji is often consulted to gain insight into issues related to personal integrity and self-knowledge. The diviner may use Ogunda Meji to help the client understand their own motivations and desires and to provide guidance on how to navigate ethical dilemmas with honesty and integrity.

Like the other major books in the Ifa literary corpus, Ogunda Meji is also studied by Ifa practitioners as a source of spiritual guidance and inspiration. The book contains stories, proverbs, and teachings that offer insight into the nature of the universe, the Orishas, and the human experience. It is considered a sacred text and is revered by Ifa practitioners around the world.

what of Osa Meji, what is contained in it and how is it used

1 / 1

Osa Meji is the tenth major book in the Ifa literary corpus. It contains teachings and wisdom related to the Orisha Orunmila, who is considered the keeper of Ifa knowledge.

Osa Meji emphasizes the importance of patience and endurance in the face of adversity. The book also contains teachings on the power of wisdom and the need to cultivate a deep understanding of the world in order to navigate life's challenges successfully.

In Ifa divination, Osa Meji is often consulted to gain insight into issues related to patience, endurance, and wisdom. The diviner may use Osa Meji to help the client identify areas where they need to cultivate greater patience and to provide guidance on how to access their own inner wisdom in order to overcome obstacles and challenges.

Like the other major books in the Ifa literary corpus, Osa Meji is also studied by Ifa practitioners as a source of spiritual guidance and inspiration. The book contains stories, proverbs, and teachings that offer insight into the nature of the universe, the Orishas, and the human experience. It is considered a sacred text and is revered by Ifa practitioners around the world.

what of irate Meji and Otura Meji what is contained in it and how is it used

1 / 1

Irete Meji is the eleventh major book in the Ifa literary corpus, while Otura Meji is the twelfth. Both books contain teachings and wisdom related to the Orisha Orunmila, who is considered the keeper of Ifa knowledge.

Irete Meji emphasizes the importance of self-reflection and personal responsibility in one's life. The book also contains teachings on the power of inner transformation and the need to address one's own flaws and weaknesses in order to grow and evolve.

In Ifa divination, Irete Meji is often consulted to gain insight into issues related to personal growth and self-improvement. The diviner may use Irete Meji to help the client identify areas where they need to take responsibility for their actions and to provide guidance on how to overcome negative patterns of behavior.

Otura Meji, on the other hand, emphasizes the importance of humility and service to others. The book contains teachings on the power of sacrifice and the need to put the needs of others before one's own desires.

In Ifa divination, Otura Meji is often consulted to gain insight into issues related to service and sacrifice. The diviner may use Otura Meji to help the client understand how they can best serve their community and to provide guidance on how to cultivate humility and put the needs of others before their own.

Like the other major books in the Ifa literary corpus, Irete Meji and Otura Meji are also studied by Ifa practitioners as a source of spiritual guidance and inspiration. The books contain stories, proverbs, and teachings that offer insight into the nature of the universe, the Orishas, and the human experience. They are considered sacred texts and are revered by Ifa practitioners around the world.

what of Oturupon Meji, and Irete Ika what is contained in it and how is it used

1 / 1

Oturupon Meji is the thirteenth major book in the Ifa literary corpus, while Irete Ika is the fourteenth. Both books contain teachings and wisdom related to the Orisha Orunmila, who is considered the keeper of Ifa knowledge.

Oturupon Meji emphasizes the importance of balance and harmony in one's life. The book contains teachings on the power of moderation and the need to avoid extremes in one's thoughts and actions.

In Ifa divination, Oturupon Meji is often consulted to gain insight into issues related to balance and harmony. The diviner may use Oturupon Meji to help the client identify areas where they are out of balance and to provide guidance on how to restore harmony in their life.

Irete Ika, on the other hand, emphasizes the importance of spiritual growth and the pursuit of knowledge. The book contains teachings on the power of self-discovery and the need to cultivate a deep understanding of the world in order to live a fulfilling life.

In Ifa divination, Irete Ika is often consulted to gain insight into issues related to spiritual growth and the pursuit of knowledge. The diviner may use Irete Ika to help the client identify areas where they need to deepen their understanding of the world and to provide guidance on how to access their own inner wisdom in order to achieve their goals.

Like the other major books in the Ifa literary corpus, Oturupon Meji and Irete Ika are also studied by Ifa practitioners as a source of spiritual guidance and inspiration. The books contain stories, proverbs, and teachings that offer insight into the nature of the universe, the Orishas, and the human experience. They are considered sacred texts and are revered by Ifa practitioners around the world what of Ose Meji, and Ofun Meji what is contained in it and how is it used

1 / 1

Ose Meji is the fifteenth major book in the Ifa literary corpus, while Ofun Meji is the sixteenth. Both books contain teachings and wisdom related to the Orisha Orunmila, who is considered the keeper of Ifa knowledge.

Ose Meji emphasizes the importance of community and the need to work together to achieve common goals. The book contains teachings on the power of cooperation and the need to treat others with respect and kindness.

In Ifa divination, Ose Meji is often consulted to gain insight into issues related to community and social relationships. The diviner may use Ose Meji to help the client identify areas where they can strengthen their relationships with others and to provide guidance on how to work collaboratively with others in order to achieve their goals.

Ofun Meji, on the other hand, emphasizes the importance of purity and the need to maintain a clean and clear spiritual path. The book contains teachings on the power of integrity and the need to avoid deception and dishonesty.

In Ifa divination, Ofun Meji is often consulted to gain insight into issues related to personal integrity and spiritual purity. The diviner may use Ofun Meji to help the client identify areas where they need to cultivate greater honesty and to provide guidance on how to live a more authentic and virtuous life.

Like the other major books in the Ifa literary corpus, Ose Meji and Ofun Meji are also studied by Ifa practitioners as a source of spiritual guidance and inspiration. The books contain stories, proverbs, and teachings that offer insight into the nature of the universe, the Orishas, and the human experience. They are considered sacred texts and are revered by Ifa practitioners around the world.

So, if I want to learn this Ifa Literary corpus, where can I get the books?

The Ifa Literary corpus is traditionally passed down through oral transmission from Ifa practitioners to their students. However, there are published versions of the books available that you can use to deepen your understanding of Ifa.

You can find published versions of the Ifa Literary corpus through various sources, including online bookstores and specialty stores that sell books on African spirituality and religion. It is important to note, however, that not all versions of the books may be authentic or accurately reflect the teachings of Ifa. Therefore, it is recommended that you consult with a reputable Ifa practitioner or scholar to guide you in selecting the best sources for your study.

Additionally, it is important to approach the study of Ifa with respect and a willingness to learn from the tradition itself rather than attempting to extract only what you find useful or applicable to your own goals or interests. Ifa is a complex and deeply rooted spiritual tradition that requires patience, dedication, and a willingness to learn from the wisdom of those who have gone before you.

Do you have a name for a book I can buy to start the process

1 / 1

Yes, there are published versions of the Ifa Literary corpus that you can use to start your learning process. One widely recognized and respected version of the Ifa Literary corpus is the "African Traditional Religion" series by Dr. Afolabi Epega and Philip Neimark. This series includes translations of the sixteen major books of Ifa along with commentaries and explanations of their teachings.

Another recommended source is "The Handbook of Yoruba Religious Concepts" by Baba Ifa Karade, which provides an accessible introduction to the basic concepts of Ifa and Yoruba spirituality, including the Ifa Literary corpus.

It is important to note, however, that reading books alone cannot substitute for the guidance and instruction of a reputable Ifa practitioner or community. If you are interested in learning more about Ifa, it is recommended that you seek out a reputable practitioner or community to guide you in your study and practice.

Note from the Editor

This volume contains an English translation of the famous Ethiopian work, KEBRA NAGAST, The Glory of Kings. This book has been held in the highest honour in Ethiopia for several centuries and has been, and still is, venerated by the people as containing the final proof of their descent from the Hebrew Patriarchs, and of the kinship of their kings of the Solomonic line with Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

In other words, the book proves:

1. That the lawful kings of Ethiopia were descended from Solomon, King of Israel.
2. That the Tabernacle of the Law of God, the Ark of the Covenant, was brought from Jerusalem to Aksum by Menyelek, Solomon's firstborn son.
3. That the God of Israel transferred His place of abode on earth from Jerusalem to Aksum, the ecclesiastical capital of Ethiopia.

Menyelek was performing the Will of God in removing the Tabernacle of Zion from Jerusalem, as God was satisfied that the Jews were unworthy¹ to be custodians of the Ark wherein His Presence was², and the Ark wished to depart. Ethiopia had stretched out her hands to God (Psalm 68:31) and He went to her with the Ark, to preside over Menyelek's kingdom, which was established in accordance with the commandments that He had given Moses and the prophets and priests of Israel.

The line of kings founded by Solomon continued to reign even after the Ethiopians became Christians under the teaching of Frumentius and Adesius, and that line continued unbroken until the tenth century of our era. God then permitted the line to be separated from the throne, and allowed the Zagwe Kings to rule over Ethiopia until the reign of Yekuno Amlak, who restored the Solomonic dynasty A.D. in 1270.

Ethiopian literature documents a legend to the effect that when God made Adam He placed in his body a "Pearl" or "Seed"³ which He intended should pass from Adam into the bodies of a series of holy men, one after the other, until the appointed time when it should enter the body of Mary, and form the substance of her firstborn son Jesus, the Christ. This "Pearl" had passed through the body of Solomon, an ancestor of Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ and Menyelek, the son of Solomon by the Queen of Sheba, were sons of Solomon, and so, they were akin to each other. But Christ is the Son of God, and therefore, being the kinsman of Christ, Menyelek was divine.

¹Isaiah 65:1-7

²Kings 19:15

³I John 3:9

The KEBRA NAGAST asserts that the kings of Ethiopia who were descended from Menyelek were of divine origin, and that their words and deeds were those of gods.

The Ark of the Law which Menyelek removed from the Temple of Jerusalem was a rectangular box made of hardwood plated with gold, and measuring about four feet long, two feet six inches wide, and two feet six inches deep. It was provided with a cover upon which rested the Mercy seat and figures of the Cherubim.¹ In the KEBRA NAGAST no mention is made of the Mercy seat and the Cherubim, but we read there that Moses made a case shaped like the "belly of a ship," and in this the Two Tables of the Law were placed. The case made by Moses carried the written Word in stone, and later on the Woman carried the living Word Incarnate. Although western history is silent as to the place where the Tabernacle of the Law was finally deposited, Ethiopian tradition asserts that it survived all the troubles and disasters that came upon the Abyssinians in their wars with the Muslims, and that it was preserved at Aksum.

This complete, modern translation of the KEBRA NAGAST derives mainly from the Spanish version of this work which appeared in Toledo in 1528 and in Barcelona in 1547, with its French version published in Paris in 1558. Many subsequent translations and editions have been made into German, English, Italian and other languages.

This popular edition conforms to the classic literary style of Budge's Translation-Commentary, with its elegant Old English phraseology and syntax. After verifying and correlating its factual aspects with previous manuscripts and other reference sources, the editor proudly presents this new edition of the KEBRA NAGAST (The Glory of Kings) in order to establish the truth of the origins of the Solomonic dynasty of Kings and the current abode of the Ark of the Covenant.

Its companion manuscript, the FETHA NAGAST, or the book of the Justice of the Kings is currently being translated into Spanish and remains virtually unknown to the world, along with the vast collection of Ethiopian literature written in "Geez" the language of the Aksumite empire, precursor of modern Ethiopia.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I wish to express my deep gratitude to the Embassy of Israel in Jamaica for the extraordinary assistance provided towards this project. The wealth of research material they gave me proved to be of invaluable help. I especially recognize the untiring support of Ambassador, H.E. Mr Uri Prosor; Cultural Attaché, Mr Abbie Avidan and Deputy Chief of Mission, Mrs Talya Lador-Fresher.

I am also greatly indebted to Mr Errol St B Smith, special consultant and principal contributor to this work, for providing rare comparative manuscripts and historical documents; to Mr M Matthews, Director, Press Department Embassy of Ethiopia, Washington, DC for his timely advice and assistance; to Prof. Beatriz Susana Bou, Department of Technical Translations, Universidad de Rosario, Argentina and Professors Linda Strebin and June Strebin of the Laboratorio de Idiomas, Universidad de Carabobo, Venezuela; who, as my former tutors, gave me valuable insight into the intricacies of ideological translation techniques.

Among those who helped edit and correct the original drafts, and who made many helpful manuscript suggestions are Mrs Deloris Williams and Miss Etta McLarty, both of Church Teachers' College, Mandeville; editor-researcher Mr Emerson F Dorway of West Indies College, and Pastor H H Holmes (Central Jamaica Conference of Seventh-Day Adventists). In manuscript review and final draft preparation, I had the expert assistance of Mrs Dorothea Oliphant-Watson, Mr Christopher Morrison and Miss Valerie Tibby.

Very gratefull thanks are due to the following institutions for providing research and reference materials: The World Jewish Bible Society, Israel Society for Biblical Research, The British Museum, El Archivo De Indias (Spain) and the Imperial Ethiopian World Federation.

Finally, my sincere thanks go to all those who offered words of encouragement and support, and to my family who patiently and stoically bore with me through these eight years of toil and labour.

INTRODUCTION

Ethiopia is a unique phenomenon in Africa for, along with Egypt, it is one of the two African nations that can trace its history into antiquity; but while Egypt became more and more alienated from its ancient culture owing to successive conquests, Ethiopia retained its original character, and has been able to preserve and to perfect an enduring culture born of the ancient encounter and the gradual fusion of two equally gifted peoples: the Cushites — who were most likely indigenous — and Semitic tribes who may have emigrated from Arabia.

The Egypt of the Pharaohs believed that it had received certain of its divinities from Ethiopia. The Greeks regarded it as the original home of wheat and of the olive tree; and recent anthropological discoveries confirm the antiquity of man's presence in Ethiopia.

Ethiopia has had a continuous existence as a nation for no less than 2,000 years, and for most of this period its contacts with the rest of the world were limited and intermittent.

The truly mystical and biblical era of Ethiopia's history began during the Sabaean period (around 750-650 BC) when there emerged on the Ethiopian plateau and coasts Sabaean influences from the south of Arabia. Among these were astral religion, sacred royalty and the language and writings that have been preserved by the Ethiopian church in the form of Geez (Ethiopic).

This Sabaean stage of its past led the Ethiopian nation to include in its ancient traditions the biblical episodes of the Queen of Sheba's visit to Solomon, as related in the First Book of Kings, Chapter 10:1-10. Then from the 2nd to the 9th centuries A.D. the mingling of new immigrants with people who had been on African soil for some time, created an independent nation based at Aksum on the plateau of the province of Tigre, and which still remains Ethiopia's religious centre.

The decline of the Aksumite empire began in the 7th century A.D. with the expansion of Christianity in the civilized world, which gravely affected the commercial revenues of these regions by devaluing incense and myrrh. At the same time, the Ethiopian Church retained an archaic Christianity that was very Semitic and still heavily influenced by the Judaism that had nurtured it. This, however, was balanced by the fact that Ethiopian emperors were considered the masters of the waters of the Nile river, which according to popular belief, they could divert to the point of starving Egypt.

During the 10th century, under very obscure circumstances, the usurping dynasty of the Zagwe kings appeared in Ethiopia, and later, ecclesiastical texts accused this dynasty of having not been of pure "Solomonic" stock, that is, not descended from the union of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. The Zagwe, who were princes from the Lasta region of Central Ethiopia, took advantage of the eclipse of the Aksumite sovereigns to transfer the seat of the empire to their own region.

The restoration of the Solomonic dynasty of kings took place late in the 13th century when a powerful sector of the Church proclaimed the Solomonic princes to be the legitimate heirs of the Aksumite line, as defined by the traditions of the KEBRA NAGAST (The Glory of Kings). The Zagwe kings were suddenly swept away, and the restored Solomonic dynasty, starting with Yekuno Amlak (who ruled 1270-1285), transferred the seat of the empire further south to the province of Shoa.

The KEBRA NAGAST, or the Book of the Glory of Kings of Ethiopia, has been in existence for at least a thousand years, and contains the true history of the origin of the Solomonic line of kings in Ethiopia. It is regarded as the ultimate authority on the history of the conversion of the Ethiopians from the worship of the sun, moon, and stars to that of the Lord God of Israel.

It was during the era of the European conquests and colonization of the African continent, that renewed interest by scholars in the legendary country of "Prester Juan" began. Fragmentary accounts and oral reports of a remote Christian kingdom in the heart of Africa amidst a sea of pagan nations, captured the imagination of several European explorers. Both Spain and Portugal hoped to find in this kingdom a possible ally against Islam and the rising power of the Ottomans.

One of the earliest collections of documents of the country of the “Negus” (King) came through the writings of Francisco Alvarez, official envoy which Emanuel, King of Portugal, sent to David, King of Ethiopia, under Ambassador Don Roderigo De Lima. In the papers concerning this mission, Alvarez included an account of the King of Ethiopia, and a description in Portuguese of the habits of the Ethiopians, which was printed in 1533.

In the first quarter of the 16th century, PN Godinho published some traditions about King Solomon and his son Menyelek, derived from the KEBRA NAGAST. Further information about the contents of the KEBRA NAGAST was supplied by Baltazar Téllez (1595-1675), the author of the Historia General de Etiopía Alta (Coimbra, 1660). The sources of his work were the histories of Manuel Almeida, Alfonso Méndez and Jerónimo Lobo.

Among the most complete, and least known, translations of the KEBRA NAGAST, is the exhaustive work of Enrique Cornelio Agrippa (1486-1535) Historia de las cosas de Etiopía (Toledo, 1528) – a greatly amplified account. Agrippa was an alchemist, expert in magical sciences and Cabala, and physician to the King; he resided in the courts of Maximilian I and of Charles V; eventually he suffered imprisonment in Grenoble by orders of Francis I, where he died.

Additional information on Arabic additions to the original narratives of the KEBRA NAGAST was included by the Jesuit priest Manuel Almeida (1580-1646) in his Historia de Etiopía which does not appear to have been published in its entirety. Manuel Almeida was sent out as a missionary to Ethiopia, and had abundant opportunity to learn about the KEBRA NAGAST at first hand, owing to his excellent command of the language. His manuscript is a valuable work. His brother, Apollinare, also went out to the country as a missionary and was, along with his two companions, stoned to death in Tigre.

Job Ludof, whose Historia Aethiopica was published in Frankfurt in 1681, refers several times in his work to the Historia General by Baltazar Téllez, but it is pretty certain that he had no first-hand knowledge of the KEBRA NAGAST as a whole.

It was not until the close of the eighteenth century when James Bruce of Kinnaird (1730-1794), the famous British explorer, published an account of his travels in search of the sources of the Nile, that some information as to the fabulous contents of this extraordinary book came to be known among a select circle of scholars and theologians.

When he was leaving Gondar, Ras Michael, the powerful “Wazir” of King Takla Haymanot, gave him several most valuable Ethiopic manuscripts and among them was a copy of the KEBRA NAGAST. When the third edition of his Travels in Search of the Sources of the Nile was published, there appeared a description of the contents of the original manuscript. In due course these documents were given to the Bodleian Library at Oxford University.

In the year 1870 Francis Praetorius published, along with a Latin translation, the Ethiopic text of chapters 19 to 32 of the KEBRA NAGAST, edited from another manuscript by Domingo Lorda; this was given to the Bibliotheca Palatina. This work by Praetorius made known for the first time to the small circle of Western Ethiopic scholars, the exact form of the Ethiopian legend that makes the King of Ethiopia to be a descendant of Solomon, King of Israel, by Makeda, the Queen of Ethiopia, better known as the Queen of Sheba.

The beginnings of foreign penetration into Ethiopia followed the devastating Muslim attacks upon the kingdom in 1541. These were led by Ahmed Gran of Harar, causing the empire to appeal to Portugal for aid. Christopher da Gama, the son of Vasco da Gama, landed at Massaua in 1541 with 400 men, but was killed with most of his soldiers in a battle with the enemy. Subsequently a new army, equipped with firearms, was built up with the cooperation of the remaining Portuguese, and in 1543 Gran’s forces were routed and their leader killed.

Attempts by the Portuguese who had assisted in the victory, and later by the Jesuits to convert the country to Roman Catholicism led to much conflict within the realm, until finally the Jesuits were expelled in 1633. Two centuries later, in 1855, Theodore, a military leader of vision, assumed the imperial title, and immediately began to revive the power of the empire and endeavoured to unite and reform the country.

However, as a consequence of the two-year delay by Queen Victoria of Great Britain, in replying to a letter Theodore had sent concerning the free use of the abundant annual flood waters of the Blue Nile, the Emperor imprisoned several British diplomats and officials at Magdala. All diplomatic efforts failed to secure their release, and in July 1867 a military force under Sir Robert Napier was dispatched to Ethiopia to secure the release of the British prisoners.

King Theodore and his army set out for Magdala to meet the British, but the mountain fortress was captured by Napier's forces in 1868, and Theodore committed suicide to avoid capture.

In August 1868, the great collection of Ethiopic manuscripts and documents that the British soldiers found at Magdala was taken away and brought to the British Museum. Among them were two fine copies of the legendary KEBRA NAGAST.

These manuscripts were classified as Oriental 818 and Oriental 819 respectively, and were fully described by Professor Wright in his Catalogue of the Ethiopic Manuscripts (London, 1877).

Within the context of the fascinating history of this fine manuscript of the KEBRA NAGAST (Oriental 819), written during the reign of Emperor Iyasu I (A.D.1682-1706), its eventual return to Abyssinia was truly providential, and it came about in the following manner: On the 10th of August, 1872, Prince Kasa, who was subsequently crowned as King John IV, wrote to the British nobleman Earl Granville, saying: "There is a book called KEBRA NAGAST which contains the law of the whole of Ethiopia, and the names of the Shums (Chiefs). I pray you find out who got this book, and send it to me, for in my country my people will not obey my orders without it."

A copy of this letter was sent to the British Museum and the trustees decided to grant King John's request. The manuscript was restored to him on 14th December 1872, with these words added to the last folio: "This volume was returned to the King of Ethiopia by order of the Trustees of the British Museum, December 14, 1872. (Signed) J. Winter Jones, Principal Librarian."

At the beginning of the 20th century, H Le Roux, an envoy from the President of the French Republic to Menyelek II, King of Ethiopia, went before the king, in order to see this manuscript (Oriental 819) and to obtain his permission to translate it into the French language. Le Roux, having made his request to Menyelek II personally, the king then made a reply, which LeRoux translates thus: "We are a people who defends itself not only by the force of arms, but also by the authority of its writings; and upon its traditions and history resides the strength of the kingdom. Myself as Emperor, and all subjects of the realm, agree that this book be translated into the French language, and thus bring to the knowledge of the peoples of the world that we are the custodians of God's Covenant through the treasures that he has bestowed upon us. By this it will be understood that God's aid shall always be with us, to deliver us from the enemies who attack us."

The king then gave orders that the manuscript was to be fetched from Addis Ababa, where the monks tried to keep it on the pretext of copying the text, and in less than a week it was placed in the hands of Le Roux, who could hardly believe his eyes.

Le Roux further commented: "I have achieved what I thought was impossible: the book which I now have in my hands contains the true history of the Queen of Sheba and of Solomon, the same that Negus and Priests of Ethiopia regard as the most authentic of all the versions that circulate within the European Libraries and among the Abyssinian monasteries. This is the book that King Theodore clutched against his heart on the night of his suicide; the same one that English soldiers carried away to London and which an ambassador returned to King John.”

With the help of a friend, Le Roux translated several of the chapters of the KEBRA NAGAST, and in due course published his translation, La Reine de Saba (Paris, 1914).

The catalogues of the Ethiopic manuscripts in Oxford, London and Paris, which had been published by Dillman, Wright and Zotenberg, did supply a good deal of information about the contents of the KEBRA NAGAST in general, but scholars feel that it is impossible to judge the literary and historical value of the work by the mere transcription and translation of the headings of the chapters only.

In 1882, under the auspices of the Bavarian government in Munich, Germany, Dr C Bezold prepared an edition of the Ethiopic text edited from the best manuscripts available then, into a German translation, which was published under the aegis of the Bavarian Academy and entitled KEBRA NAGAST (Munich, 1909). The main authority for the Ethiopic text in Dr Bezold's edition is the famous manuscript which was sent as a gift to the Academie Française by King Sahla Dengel of Ethiopia, who died in 1855. According to Zotenberg in his Catalogue des manuscrits ethiopiens this manuscript must belong to the thirteenth century, and if this is so, then it probably is the oldest Ethiopic manuscript in existence.

None of the manuscripts of the KEBRA NAGAST give any indication as to the identity of its compilers, the time when it was written, nor the circumstances under which it was compiled. Most scholars do believe, however, that it was compiled soon after the restoration of the “Solomonic line of kings” when the throne of Ethiopia was occupied by Yekuno Amlak who reigned from 1270 to 1285.

It is possible that in its original form the Ethiopic text was translated from an Arabic version which in turn came from the Coptic since, during the one hundred and thirty-three years of the reign of the usurping Zagwe kings in Ethiopia (1137-1120), no one dared to compile the Solomonic traditions of the KEBRA NAGAST in any of the languages of the kingdom. Thus for the three centuries of the Zagwe era, it remained mainly in its Arabic version.

During the persecutions of the Christians in Egypt and in Ethiopia by the Muslims, in the tenth, eleventh and twelfth centuries, many churches, monasteries and their libraries of manuscripts perished. However, the Solomonic kings, who settled in the province of Shoa during the period of the Zagwe domination, managed to preserve chronological and genealogical records of their ancestry along with other historical documents that contained the annals of their predecessors.

The greater part of the narrative contained in the KEBRA NAGAST is based upon legends and traditions that are exceedingly ancient. These legends and traditions are derived from a variety of sources and can be traced to the Old Testament and Chaldean writings, also to Syrian works like the Book of the Bee, to ancient Khoranic stories and commentaries and to apocryphal books like The Book of Adam and Eve, Kufale, The Instructions of Saint Peter to his disciple Clement, The Life of Hanna The Mother of the Virgin Mary, The Book of the Pearl, and The Ascension of Isaiah. Along with extracts from these works, there are sections in which works attributed to Gregory Thaumaturgus and to Domitius, Patriarch of Constantinople, are quoted at length.

The purpose of the authors or compilers, and the later editors of the KEBRA NAGAST, remains a singularly inspired one: that is, to glorify Ethiopia by narrating the history of the coming of the "Spiritual and Heavenly Zion" — the Tabernacle of the Law of the God of Israel — of her own free will from Jerusalem to Ethiopia, and to make it quite clear that the King of Ethiopia was descended from Solomon, the son of David, King of Israel, and through him from Abraham and the early Patriarchs.

The KEBRA NAGAST was also intended to make the people of Ethiopia realize that their country was specially chosen by God to be the new home of the Spiritual and Heavenly Zion. This Zion existed originally in an immaterial form in heaven, where it was the habitation of God. When Solomon finished building the Temple of God, Zion was established there, in the Holy of Holies, and from it God made known His commands when He visited the Temple. It was at all times regarded to be the visible emblem of God Almighty and the material duplicate of the immaterial Zion in heaven.

It is hoped that in this brief introduction giving a sketch of the literary history of the KEBRA NAGAST, the reader will have found some useful insight into the majestic role that divine providence has set aside for the black race, and that in diligently reading with an open mind the dramatic unfolding of one of the most enigmatic and fascinating episodes in the continuing evolvement of God's relationship with man, further evidence of His infinite love towards us will be realized.

NOTE ON BIBLICAL REFERENCES

Biblical texts and references throughout the KEBRA NAGAST correspond to the rare Ethiopic Version, translated from the Septuagint in the 4th century A.D. This version of the Scriptures is thus around 1,200 years older than the "Authorised Version" (King James; 1611) and is by far, a more complete one.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE VERSIONS OF THE KEBRA NAGAST

The existence of the KEBRA NAGAST seems to have been unknown in Europe until the middle of the 16th century, but the earliest English language summary of the contents of the KEBRA NAGAST was published by James Bruce of Kinnaird (1730-1794) in an account of his travels in search of the sources of the Nile river. Bruce had made for himself a copy of the KEBRA NAGAST which in due course he gave to the Bodleian Library, where they are classified as "Bruce 87" and "Bruce 93".

In 1877 Prof. W Wright of Cambridge University published a full description of the manuscript of the KEBRA NAGAST in the Makdala Collection at the British Museum. These are known as "variant readings" or scholarly commentaries supplied from Oriental manuscripts 818 and 819 now deposited at the British Museum.

In the year 1907 a rendering of the French version of the KEBRA NAGAST into English was made by Mrs J Van Vorst. This was entitled Magda, Queen of Sheba (New York, and London). However, as this version contains most of the legends and additions that were included in the Arabic language account, it is not regarded as an authoritative work.

The last known English translation-commentary on the KEBRA NAGAST was that done by E Budge, archaeologist, Egyptian and Assyrian antiquities (1857-1934) who conducted numerous excavations in Egypt and the Sudan. Budge's work is an extensive collation of Oriental 818 and Dr C Bezold's Bavarian Academy publication (1909). Both Bezold's text as well as the Oriental manuscript 818 represents the KEBRA NAGAST in the form that the Ethiopian priests and scribes have considered authoritative. Nevertheless, Prof. Wright had regarded these sources as "apocryphal works", and he thought it probable that an Arab author might have supplied the fundamental parts of the narrative, and that the authors of the Ethiopic version stated that the original source of their work was a Coptic archetype in order to give it an authority and importance which it would not otherwise possess.

It is believed that the Western Hemisphere division of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church has an abridged English language version of the KEBRA NAGAST, perhaps made by themselves from their own sources. In spite of several requests from this editor, however, I have not been able to peruse these.

It is important to note that virtually every English language translation and scholarly commentary of the KEBRA NAGAST, treats the work inclusive of all the legendary and obviously fictional stories, which are of undoubted Arabic sources, as one complete unit. No distinction is made between the original Geez writings and the later additions.

A careful study of the KEBRA NAGAST made while compiling and translating the work into English, has convinced me that the original form of the KEBRA NAGAST was that existing in the Coptic manuscript belonging to the Patriarchal Library at Alexandria, and that the Arabic version made from these was greatly supplemented by the scribes in the various monasteries of Egypt. Subsequently these enlarged versions found their way into Ethiopia via the Blue Nile.

This editor has received a French paraphrase of the Arabic text of the KEBRA NAGAST which was printed by Amelineau in his Contes et Romans, (Paris, 1888); also a copy in Spanish from the Arabic text printed by Bezold. From these I have been able to separate all the fictional additions, in order to bring out a complete and authentic version in English of the KEBRA NAGAST.

The extensive fictional and legendary narratives will appear in its entirety in a sequel to this modum version, and will be entitled, LEG-ENDS OF THE KEBRA NAGAST.

La Gloria de los Reyes

Respecto de la Gloria Imperial

He aquí la interpretación elucidada de los Patriarcas respecto del esplendor, la grandeza y la dignidad que Dios otorgó a los descendientes de Adán, y muy especialmente concerniente al esplendor y la grandeza de Sión, el Tabernáculo de la Ley de Dios, del cual El mismo es el creador original, en su fortaleza sagrada, antes de la creación de ángeles y seres humanos. De ese modo el Padre, el Hijo y el Espíritu Santo en completa armonía y total acuerdo, establecieron el Sión Celestial que sería la habitación de su gloria.

De tal fonna el Padre, el Hijo y el Espíritu Santo dieron la palabra, así: “Hagamos al hombre a nuestra imagen, conforme a nuestra semejanza”¹ y así en total acuerdo y voluntad opinaron ellos. Y el hijo pronunció, diciendo: “Yo encarnaré mediante el cuerpo de Adán,” y el Espíritu Santo pronunció, diciendo: “Yo habitaré en el corazón de los Profetas y los Santos”; y este acuerdo y convenio se cumplió en Sión, la ciudad de su gloria.

Y así El crió a Adán en SU PROPIA IMAGEN Y SEMEJANZA, para de esta manera conquistar a Satanás el pecador orgulloso junto con sus seguidores, y establecer a Adán — su hijo propio — con los santos, con sus hijos, para su adoración. Ya que el portento de Dios fue concretado en sus palabras cuando El dijo: “Yo me haré hombre, y estaré en toda mi creación, en carne y hueso viviré.” Y así en los días postreros, por voluntad divina fue concebido en el cuerpo del Segundo Sión, el Segundo Adán, o sea nuestro Salvador, Jesucristo.

Esta es nuestra gloria y nuestra fé, nuestra esperanza y nuestra vida, el Segundo Sión.

KEBRA NAGAST
(The Glory of Kings)

PART I

The Beginning

“And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the Ark of His Testament...”

Revelation 11:19

THE GLORY OF KINGS

1. CONCERNING THE GLORY OF KINGS

This is the interpretation and explanation of the Patriarchs concerning splendour, greatness and dignity, and how God gave them to the children of Adam, and especially concerning the splendour and greatness of Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God, of which He Himself is the maker and the fashioner, in the fortress of His Holiness before all created things, angels and men. For the Father and the Son, and the Holy Spirit with good fellowship and goodwill and cordial agreement together made the Heavenly Zion to be the place of habitation of their Glory.

Then the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit said: "Let us make man in Our similitude and likeness"¹ and with ready agreement and goodwill They were all of this opinion. And the Son said: "I will put on the body of Adam," and the Holy Spirit said: "I will dwell in the hearts of the Prophets and the Righteous"; and this common agreement and covenant was fulfilled in Zion, the city of their Glory.

And He made Adam in his own image and likeness, so that He might remove Satan because of his pride, together with his host, and might establish Adam, His own plant, together with the righteous, His children, for His praises. For the plan of God was decided upon and decreed in that He said: "I will become man, and I will be in everything which I have created; I will abide in flesh." And in the days that came after, by His good pleasure there was born in the flesh of the Second Zion the Second Adam, who was our Saviour Christ. This is our Glory and our faith, our hope and our life, the Second Zion.

2. THE GREATNESS OF KINGS

Let us consider and let us begin to state which of the Kings of the earth, from the first even unto the last, in respect of the Law and the Ordinances and honour and greatness, we should magnify.

Gregory, the worker of wonders and miracles, who was cast into a cave because of his love for the martyrdom of Christ and suffered tribulation for fifteen years, said: "When I was in the pit I pondered over this matter, and over the folly of the Kings of Armenia, and I said, In what does the greatness of Kings consist?

Is it in the multitude of soldiers, or in the splendour of worldly possessions, or in extent of rule over cities and towns?" This was my thought each time in my prayer, and I was stirred to meditate again and again upon the greatness of Kings. And now I will begin.

3. THE KINGDOM OF ADAM

And I go up from Adam and I say, God is King in truth, and for Him praise is, and He appointed under Him Adam to be King over all that He had created. And he drove him out of the garden because of his apostasy through the sin of the Serpent and the plotting of the Devil. And at that sorrowful moment Cain was born, and when Adam saw that the face of Cain was ill-tempered and sullen and his appearance evil, he was sad. And then Abel was born, and when Adam saw that his appearance was good and his face good-tempered he said: "This is my son, the heir of my Kingdom."

4. CONCERNING ENVY

When they had grown up together, Satan had envy of him, and he cast this envy into the heart of Cain, who was envious of Abel first, because of the words of his father Adam, who said: "He who hath the good-tempered face shall be the heir of my kingdom"; and secondly, because of his sister with the beautiful face, who was born with him and who had been given unto Abel, even as God commanded them to multiply and fill the earth. The face of the sister who had been born with Abel resembled that of Cain, and their father had transferred the two sisters when giving them in marriage; and thirdly, because when the two brothers offered up sacrifice, God accepted the offering of Abel and rejected the offering of Cain. Because of this envy Cain killed Abel. Thus fratricide was first created through Satan's envy of the children of Adam.

Having killed his brother, Cain fell into a state of trembling and panic, and he was repulsed by his father and His Lord. Then Seth was born, and Adam looked upon him and said: "Now hath God shown compassion upon me and He hath given unto me the light of my face. In sorrowful remembrance I will console myself with him. The name of him that shall slay my heir shall be blotted out, even to his ninth generation."

5. THE KINGDOM OF SETH

Adam died and Seth reigned in righteousness. And Seth died and Enos reigned, and Enos died and Cainan reigned. Then Cainan died and Mahalaleel reigned; Mahalaleel died and Jared reigned, and Jared died and Enoch reigned in righteousness, and he feared God, and God hid him so that he might not see death. And he became a king in his flesh in the land of the living. After Enoch disappeared Methuselah reigned, then Lamech reigned; and Lamech died and Noah reigned in righteousness and he pleased God in all his works.

6. THE SIN OF CAIN

That accursed man Cain, the murderer of his brother, multiplied evil and his seed did likewise, and they provoked God to wrath with their wickedness. They had not the fear of God before their eyes, and they never kept in mind that He had created them, and they never prayed to Him nor worshipped Him, nor called upon Him nor rendered service to Him in fear. They ate, drank and danced, and played upon stringed instruments and sang lewd songs; they worked uncleanness without law, without measure and without rule. And the wickedness of the children of Cain multiplied, until at length in their filthiness they introduced the seed of the ass into the mare, and the mule came into being, which God hath not commanded; even as those who give their children who are believers unto those who deny God, and their offspring become the seed of the filthy Gomorraites, one half of them being of good, and the other half of them of evil seed. As for those who do this wickedness, their judgment is ready and their error lasting.

7. CONCERNING NOAH

Noah was a righteous man. He feared God and kept the righteousness and the Law which his fathers had declared unto him (Noah was the tenth generation from Adam), and he kept in remembrance and did what was good. He preserved his body from fornication, and he admonished his children bidding them not to mingle with the children of Cain, the arrogant tyrant and divider of the kingdom who walked in the counsel of the devil, who maketh evil to flourish. Cain had taught them everything that God hated: pride, boastfulness of speech, self-adulation, calumny, false accusation and the swearing of false oaths. And besides all these things, in the wickedness of their uncleanness, which was unlawful and against rule, man wrought pollution with man and woman worked with woman the abominable thing.¹

8. THE FLOOD

This thing was evil before God, and he destroyed them with the waters of the flood which was colder than ice. He opened the doors of heaven and the cataracts of the flood poured down; He opened the fountains that were under the earth and the fountains of the flood appeared on the earth. The sinners were blotted out for they reaped the fruit of their punishment. And with them perished all beasts and creeping things, for they were all created for the glorification of Adam, and for his glory; some to provide him with food, some for his pleasure and some for the glorification of his creator so that he might know them, even as David said: "And Thou hast set everything under his feet"² for his sake they were created and for his sake they were destroyed, with the exception of eight souls, and seven of every kind of clean beasts and creeping things, and two of every kind of unclean beast and creeping things.

¹Romans 1: 24-29

²Psalms 8:6

9. THE COVENANT OF NOAH

Noah the righteous man died and Shem reigned in wisdom and righteousness, for he was blessed by Noah when he said: “Be master to thy brother.” And to Ham he said: “Be servant to thy brother.” And he said unto Japhet: “Be thou servant to Shem my heir and be thou subject unto him.”¹ And again after the flood, the Devil, our enemy, did not cease from his hostility against the children of Noah, but stirred up Canaan the son of Ham, and he became the violent tyrant and usurper who rent the kingdom from the children of Shem. They had divided the earth among them and Noah had made them swear by the name of his God that they would not encroach on each other’s boundaries, and would not eat the beast that had died of itself or had been torn by wild animals, and that they would not cultivate harlotry against the law, lest God should again become angry with them and punish them with a flood.

As for Noah he humbled himself and offered up sacrifice, and he cried out and groaned and wept. And God held converse with Noah, who said unto him: “If Thou wilt destroy the earth a second time with a flood, blot Thou me out with those who are to perish.” And God said unto him: “I will make a covenant with thee that thou shalt tell thy children that they shall not eat the beast that had died of itself or that hath been torn by wild beasts, and they shall not cultivate harlotry against the law; and I on my part, covenant that I will not destroy the earth a second time with a flood, and that I will give unto thy children Winter and Summer, Seedtime and Harvest, Autumn and Spring.”²

10. CONCERNING ZION

“And I swear by Myself and by Zion, the Tabernacle of My Covenant, which I have created for a mercy seat and for the salvation of men, that in the latter days I will make it to come down to thy seed and that I will have pleasure in the offerings of thy children upon the earth, and the Tabernacle of My Covenant shall be with them forever. And whenever a cloud shall appear in the sky, so that they may not fear and imagine that a flood is coming, I will make to come down from My habitation of Zion the Bow of My Covenant, that is the rainbow, which shall crown with colours the Tabernacle of My Law. And it shall come to pass that when their sins multiply and I am wishful to be angry with them, I will remember the Tabernacle of My Covenant, and I will set the rainbow in the sky, and I will put away Mine anger and will send compassion.

¹Genesis 9:25-27

²Genesis 8:21 and Genesis 9:4

And I will not forget My Word, and that which hath gone forth from My mouth I will not take back. Though heaven and earth pass away My Word shall not pass away.”¹ And the Patriarchs who were there answered and said to the blessed Gregory: “Behold now, we understand clearly that before every created thing, even the angels, and before the heavens and the earth, and before the pillars of heaven and the abysses of the sea, He created the Tabernacle of the Covenant, and that which is in heaven goeth about upon the earth.”

11. DECLARATION OF THE PATRIARCHS

And they answered and said unto him: “Verily the Tabernacle of the covenant was the first thing to be created by Him, and there is no lie in thy word; it is true, correct, righteous and unalterable. He created Zion before everything else, to be the habitation of His glory, and the plan of His Covenant was that which He said: ‘I will put on the flesh of Adam which is of the dust, and I will appear unto all those whom I have created with My hand and with My voice’.” If the heavenly Zion had not put on the flesh of Adam, then God the Word would not have appeared and our salvation would not have taken place. The testimony is in the similarity ... the heavenly Zion is to be regarded as the similitude of the Mother of the Redeemer, Mary. For in the Zion which is built, there are deposited the Ten Commandments of the Law which were written by His hands, and He Himself, the Creator, dwelt in the womb of Mary, and through Him everything came into being.

¹Matthew 24:35

It was Canaan¹ who rent the kingdom from the children of Shem, and he transgressed the oath which his father Noah had made them to swear. The sons of Canaan were seven mighty men, and he took seven mighty cities from the land of Shem and set his sons over them; likewise he also increased his portion double. And in later days God took vengeance upon the sons of Canaan, and made the sons of Shem to inherit their country. These are the nations they inherited: the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, the Hittites, the Amorites, the Jebusites and the Girgasites; these are they whom Canaan seized by force from the seed of Shem. For it was not right for him to invade the Kingdom and to falsify the oath, and because of this they ceased to be and their memorial perished, through transgressing God's commandment and worshipping idols, and bowing down to them.

They are the ones who made magical images; they went to the tombs of their fathers and made an image or statue of gold, silver or brass, and a devil used to hold converse with them out of each of the images of their fathers, and say unto them: "My son, offer up unto me as a sacrifice the son whom thou lovest." And they slaughtered their sons and their daughters to the devils, and they poured out innocent blood to please filthy demons.

13. ABRAHAM

Terah begot a son and called him Abram, and when Abram was twelve years old his father Terah sent him to sell idols. And Abram said: "These are not gods that can deliver us," and he took away the idols to sell even as his father had commanded him. Then he said unto those unto whom he would sell them: "Do you wish to buy gods that cannot make deliverance, things made of wood, stone, iron and brass, which the hand of the artificer made?" And they refused to buy idols from Abram because of himself had defamed the images of his father. And as he was returning, he stepped aside from the road and he set the images

¹Son of Ham (Genesis 10:6)

down, and looked at them, and said unto them: "I wonder now if you are able to do what I ask you at this moment, and whether you are able to give me bread to eat and water to drink?" None of them answered him since they were pieces of wood and stone; and he abused them and heaped revilings upon them and they never spoke a word. Then he buffeted the face of one, kicked another with his feet, and a third one he knocked over and broke to pieces with stones, and he said unto them: "If you are unable to deliver yourselves from him that buffeteth you, and you cannot repay with injury him that injureth you, how can ye be called 'gods'? Those who worship you do so in vain, and as for myself I utterly despise you, and you shall not be my gods." Then he turned his face to the east, stretched out his hands and said: "Be Thou my God, O Lord, Creator of the heavens and the earth, Creator of the sun and the moon, Creator of the sea and the dry land, Maker of the majesty of the heavens and the earth, and of that which is visible and that which is invisible; O Maker of the universe, be Thou my God. I place my trust in Thee, and from this day forth I will place my trust in no other save Thyself."

Then there appeared unto him a chariot of fire which blazed, and Abram was afraid and fell on his face on the ground; and God said unto him: "Fear thou not, stand upright." And he removed the fear from Him.

14. THE COVENANT OF ABRAHAM

And God held converse with Abram, and said unto him: "Fear thou not. From this day thou art My servant, and I will establish My Covenant with thee and with thy seed after thee, and I will multiply thy seed, and I will magnify thy name exceedingly. And I will bring down the Tabernacle of My Covenant upon the earth seven generations after thee, and it shall go round about with thy seed, and shall be salvation unto thy race; and afterwards I will send My Word for the salvation of Adam and his sons for ever.

Those who are of thy nation are evil men, and My divinity which is true, they have rejected. As for thee, that day by day they may not seduce thee, come get thee forth out of this land, the land of thy fathers, unto the land which I will show thee, and I will give it unto thy seed after thee.” And Abram made obeisance to God and was subject to his God. And God said unto him: “Thy name shall be Abraham;” and He gave him the salutation of peace and went up into heaven.¹

Abraham returned to his abode and he took Sarah his wife, and went forth and did not go back to his father and his mother, nor to his house and family. He forsook them all for God’s sake. And he arrived in the city of Salem, and dwelt there and reigned in righteousness, and did not transgress the commandments of God. So God blessed him exceedingly, and at length he possessed three hundred and eighteen stalwart servants who were trained in war, and who stood before him and performed his will. They wore tunics richly embroidered in gold, and they had chains of gold about their necks, belts of gold round their loins and they had crowns of gold on their heads; and by means of these men Abraham vanquished his foes. He died in the glory of God, and was more gracious and excellent than those who were before him. He was gracious and held in honour, and highly esteemed.

15. ISAAC AND JACOB

Isaac his son became king and did not transgress the commandments of God; he was pure in his soul and in his body, and he died in honour. Then his son Jacob reigned, and he also did not transgress the commandments of God, and his possessions became numerous, and his children were many; God blessed him and he died in honour.²

16. REUBEN

After him, Jacob's firstborn transgressed the commandments of God and the kingdom departed from him and from his seed, because he had defiled his father's wife, and his father cursed him and God was angry with him. He became the least among his brethren, and his children became leprous and scabby. Although he was the firstborn son of Jacob,

¹Compare Genesis 12 and 13:14-17

²Genesis 35:9-12

the kingdom was rent from him.¹ Then his younger brother reigned and was called Judah because of this; his seed was blessed and his kingdom flourished. Ten generations after, Jesse reigned. And this is what I say concerning the kingdom: the blessing of the father was on the son, so that the kingdom was blessed with prosperity. As for the kingship over Israel, after the death of Jesse, David reigned in righteousness, in integrity, and in graciousness.

17. THE GLORY OF ZION

Concerning Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God; at the very beginning, as soon as God had established the heavens, He ordained that it should become the habitation of His glory upon the earth; and willing this He brought it down to the earth and permitted Moses to make a likeness of it. And He said unto him: "Make an ark or tabernacle of wood that cannot be eaten by worms, and overlay it with pure gold.² Thou shalt place therein the Word of the Law, which is the Covenant that I have written with my own fingers, that they may keep my law, the Two Tables of the Covenant."³

The heavenly and spiritual within it is of divers colours, and the work thereof is marvelous, resembling jasper and the sparkling stone, the topaz and the hyacinthine stone, and the crystal and light. It catches the eye by force and astonishes the mind and stupefies it with wonder. It was made by the mind of God and not by the hand of man. He himself created it for the habitation of His glory; it is a spiritual thing and is full of compassion; it is a heavenly thing and is full of light. It is a thing of freedom and a habitation of the Godhead, whose habitation is in heaven and whose place of movement is on earth. It dwelleth with men and with the angels; a city of salvation for men, and for the Holy Spirit a habitation.

Within it are a vessel of gold containing a measure of the manna which came down from heaven; the rod of Aaron which sprouted after it had become withered though no one watered it,⁴ broken in two places it became three rods being originally only one rod.

¹Genesis 35:22; Genesis 49:3-4; I Chronicles 5:1

²Hebrews 8:5

³Exodus 25:10

⁴Hebrews 9:4

Moses covered the Ark with pure gold and made for it poles to carry it, and rings in which to place them; and they carried it before the people until they brought it into the land of their inheritance. And prophets were appointed over the children of Israel in the Tabernacle of Testimony, and the priests wore the ephod¹ so that they might minister to the Tabernacle of Testimony; and the high priests made offerings so that they might obtain remission of their own sins and of the sins of the people likewise.

In this way did God command Moses on Mount Sinai, and He showed him the work and the construction and pattern of the Tent; and Zion was revered and had exceedingly great majesty in Israel, and it was acknowledged by God to be the habitation of His glory. He himself came down on the mountain of His holiness and He held converse with His chosen ones. He opened to them a way of salvation and He delivered them from the hand of their enemies. He spoke with them from the pillar of cloud and commanded them to keep His Law and His commandments, and to walk in the precepts of God.

This is the salvation of the children of Adam, for since the Tabernacle of the Law of God hath come down, they shall be called 'Men of the House of God' even as David said: "His habitation is in Zion.² And My habitation is here, for, I have chosen it; and I will bless her priests and make her poor to be glad. And unto David will I give seed in her, and upon the earth one who shall become king, and in the heavens one from his seed shall reign in the flesh upon the throne of the Godhead. As for his enemies, they shall be gathered together under his footstool, and they shall be sealed with his seal."

18. THE DIVISION OF THE EARTH

From the middle of Jerusalem, and from the north thereof to the southwest is the portion of the Emperor of Rome; and from the middle of Jerusalem from the north thereof to the south and to Western India is the

¹Ephod: a sacred vestment worn by the high priest portion of the Emperor of Ethiopia. For both of them are of the seed of Shem, the son of Noah, the seed of Abraham, the seed of David, the children of Solomon. For God gave unto the seed of Shem glory because of the blessing of their father Noah. The Emperor of Rome is the son of Solomon, and the Emperor of Ethiopia is the first-born and the eldest son of Solomon.

²Psalms 9:11

PART II

Solomon And Sheba

“I am black, but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, as the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon.”

The Song of Solomon 1:5

19. THE QUEEN OF THE SOUTH

Our Lord Jesus Christ, in condemning the Jewish people who lived at that time, spoke saying: "The Queen of the South shall rise up on the Day of Judgment and shall dispute with, and condemn, and overcome this generation who would not hearken unto the preaching of My word, for she came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon."¹ The Queen of the South of whom He spoke was the Queen of Ethiopia. And this Queen of the South was very beautiful in face, and her stature was superb. Her understanding and intelligence which God had given her were of such high character that she went to Jerusalem to hear the wisdom of Solomon. This was done by the Will of God and it was His good pleasure. Moreover, she was exceedingly rich, for God had given her glory, riches, gold and silver and splendid apparel, camels, slaves and trading men. And they carried on her business and traded for her by land, in India and in Aswan.

20. TAMRIN THE MERCHANT

There was a certain wise man, the leader of a merchant's caravan, whose name was Tamrin, and he used to load 520 camels and he possessed about 73 ships.

In those days King Solomon wanted to build the House of God, and he sent out messages among all the merchants in the east and in the west, in the north and in the south, bidding the merchants to come and take gold and silver from him, so that he might take from them whatsoever was necessary for the work. And certain men reported to him concerning this rich Ethiopian merchant, and Solomon sent to him a message and told him to bring whatsoever he wished from the country of Arabia; red gold, and black wood that could not be eaten by worms, and sapphires. That merchant was Tamrin, the merchant of the Queen of Ethiopia, and he went to Solomon the King, and Solomon took whatsoever he desired from him, and he gave to the merchant whatsoever he wished for in great abundance. Tamrin was a man of great understanding and he saw and comprehended the wisdom of Solomon, and he marvelled and watched carefully so that he might learn how the king gave answers by his word, and understand his judgment and the readiness of his mouth, the discreteness of his speech and the manner of his life, also his occupations and his love, his administration and his table and his law. Those to whom Solomon had to give orders he addressed with humility and graciousness, and when they had committed a fault he admonished them gently. For he ordered his house in the wisdom and fear of God, and he smiled graciously on the fools and set them on the right road, and he dealt gently with the maidservants. He opened his mouth in parables and his words were sweeter than the purest honey. His whole behaviour was admirable and his whole aspect pleasant. For wisdom is beloved by men of understanding, and is rejected by fools.

When that merchant had seen all these things he was astonished and he marvelled exceedingly. Those who were accustomed to see Solomon held him in complete affection, and he became their teacher; and because of his excellence and wisdom those who had once come to him did not wish to leave him and go away from him.

The sweetness of his words was like water to the man who is thirsty, and like bread to the hungry man; like healing to the sick and garments to the naked man. He was like a father to the orphans, and he judged with righteousness and impartiality. He had glory and riches which God had given unto him in great abundance, namely, gold, silver, precious stones and rich apparel, cattle, sheep and goats innumerable. In the days of Solomon the King, gold was as common as bronze, and silver as lead; bronze, lead and iron were as abundant as the grass of the fields. God had given unto him glory, riches and wisdom, and grace in such abundance that there was none like unto him among his predecessors and among those who came after him.

21. THE RETURN OF TAMRIN TO ETHIOPIA

And it came to pass that the merchant Tamrin wished to return to his own country, and he went to Solomon and bowed low before him, embraced him and said unto him: "Peace be to thy majesty! Send me away and let me depart to my country, and to my Lady, for I have tarried long in beholding thy glory and thy wisdom, and the abundance of dainty meats which thou hast given me. And now I would depart to my Lady. If only I could abide with thee, even as one of the very least of thy servants, for blessed are they who hear thy voice and perform thy commands. If only I could abide here and never leave thee, but thou must send me away to my Lady because of what hath been committed to my charge, so that I may give unto her her property, for I am her servant.” And Solomon went into his palace and gave unto him whatever valuable thing he desired for the country of Ethiopia, and he sent him away in peace. Tamrin then bade him farewell and went forth, journeyed along his road and came to his Lady, and delivered to her all the possessions which he had brought.

He related unto her how he had arrived in the country of Judah and Jerusalem, and how he had gone into the presence of Solomon the King, and all that he had heard and seen. He told her how Solomon administered justice and how he spoke with authority and decided rightly in all matters which he enquired into; how he returned soft and gracious answers, and how there was nothing false about him. He further related unto her how he appointed inspectors over the 700 woodmen who hauled the timber and the 800 masons who hewed the stone, also how he sought to learn from all the merchants and dealers concerning their craft and their country, and how he received information and imparted it twofold, and how all his handicraft and his works were performed with wisdom.

Each morning Tamrin related to the Queen about the wisdom of Solomon and how he taught wisdom and how he directed the affairs of the kingdom based on a wise system. For no man defrauded another nor stole the property of his neighbour, nor was there a thief nor a robber in his days. In his wisdom he knew those who had done wrong and he chastised them and made them afraid, and they did not repeat their evil deeds, but they lived in a state of peace and fear of the king.

These things did Tamrin relate unto the Queen, and each morning he recalled the things that he had seen with the king and described them unto her. The Queen was dumbstruck with wonder at the things that she heard from the merchant, her servant, and she pondered in her heart that she would go to Solomon the King; and she wept because of her great pleasure in those things that Tamrin had told her. She was most anxious to go to him, but when she considered the long journey she thought that it was too far and too difficult to undertake. Time after time she asked Tamrin questions about Solomon, and time after time Tamrin told her about him and she became most desirous to go that she might hear his wisdom, and see his face, and embrace him and petition his royalty. And her heart inclined to go to him, for God had made her heart to desire it.

22. THE QUEEN OF ETHIOPIA PREPARES FOR HER JOURNEY TO JERUSALEM

And the Queen said unto her subjects: “Ye who are my people, listen to my words for I desire wisdom and my heart seeketh to find understanding. I am smitten with the love of wisdom, for wisdom is far better than treasures of gold and silver, and wisdom is the best of everything that hath been created on the earth. Unto what under the heavens shall wisdom be compared? It is sweeter than honey and it makes one to rejoice more than wine; it shines more than the sun and it is beloved more than precious stones. It fattens more than oil, and it satisfies more than dainty meats, and it gives more fame than thousands of gold and silver. It is a source of joy for the heart, a bright and shining light for the eyes and a giver of speed to the feet; a shield for the breast and a helmet for the head.

It maketh the ears to hear and hearts to understand, it is a teacher of those who are learned, and it is a consoler of those who are discreet and prudent. It giveth fame to those who seek after it. And as for a kingdom, it cannot stand without wisdom, and riches cannot be preserved without wisdom; the foot cannot keep the place where it has set itself without wisdom. And without wisdom that which the tongue speaks is not acceptable. Wisdom is the best of all treasures. He who heaps up gold and silver does so to no profit without wisdom, but he who heaps up wisdom no man can snatch it from his heart. That which fools heap up, the wise consume. And because of the wickedness of those who do evil, the righteous are praised; and because of the wicked acts of fools the wise are beloved. So I will follow the footprints of wisdom and it shall protect me for ever.” Then the Queen made ready to set out on her journey with great pomp and majesty, and with great equipment and many preparations. By the will of God her heart desired to go to Jerusalem so that she might hear the wisdom of Solomon, so then, she made ready to set out. Seven hundred and ninety-seven camels, and mules and asses innumerable were loaded, and she set out on her journey and travelled on without pause, and her heart had confidence in God.

23. THE QUEEN OF ETHIOPIA COMES TO SOLOMON THE KING

And she arrived in Jerusalem, and brought to the King many precious gifts which he desired to possess greatly. And he paid her great honour and rejoiced, and he gave her an habitation in the royal palace near him. He sent her food both for the morning and evening meal, each time fifteen measures of finely ground white meal, cooked with oil and gravy and sauce in abundance, and thirty measures of crushed white meal wherefrom bread for three hundred and fifty people was made, with the necessary platters and trays; ten stalled oxen, five bulls and fifty sheep without counting the kids, and deer, gazelles and fatted fowls, and a vessel of wine containing sixty measures, and thirty measures of old wine, and twenty-five singing men and twenty-five singing women, and the finest honey and rich sweets and some of the food which he himself ate, and some of the wine whereof he drank. And every day he arrayed her in eleven garments which bewitched the eyes. And he visited her and was gratified, and she saw his wisdom, his just judgments, his splendour, and his grace, and heard the eloquence of his speech. She marvelled in her heart and was utterly astonished in her mind, and she recognized in her understanding and perceived very clearly with her eyes how admirable he was. She wondered exceedingly because of what she saw and heard with him: how perfect he was in composure and wise in understanding, pleasant in graciousness and commanding in stature. She observed the subtlety of his voice and the discreet utterance of his lips, and that he gave his commands with dignity, and that his replies were made quietly and with the fear of God. All these things she saw, and she was astonished at the abundance of his wisdom, and there was nothing whatsoever wanting in his word and speech, but everything that he spoke was perfect.

Solomon was then working at the building of the temple of God, and he rose up and went to the right and to the left, and forward and backward. And he showed the workmen the measurement and weight and the space covered by the materials, and he told the workers in metal how to use the hammer, the drill and the chisel, and he showed the stonemasons the angle, the circle and the surface. And everything was done by his order, and there was none who set himself in opposition to his word; for the light of his heart was like a lamp in the darkness, and his wisdom was abundant as the sand. And of the speech of the beasts and the birds there was nothing hidden from him, and he forced the devils to obey him by his wisdom. And he did everything by means of the skill which God gave him when he made supplication to him; for he did not ask for victory over his enemies, and he did not ask for riches and fame, but he asked God to give him wisdom and understanding whereby he may rule his people, and build His house, and beautify the work of God and all that He had given him in wisdom and understanding .

24. THE CONVERSATION OF SOLOMON WITH THE QUEEN OF ETHIOPIA

Queen Makeda spake unto King Solomon, saying: "Blessed art thou, my Lord, in that such wisdom and understanding have been given unto thee. For myself I only wish that I could be one of the least of thine handmaidens, so that I could wash thy feet, hearken to thy wisdom, apprehend thy understanding, serve thy majesty and enjoy thy wisdom. O how greatly have pleased me thy answering, and the sweetness of thy voice, and the beauty of thy going, and the graciousness of thy words, and the readiness thereof. The sweetness of thy voice maketh the heart to rejoice, and maketh the bones fat, and giveth courage to hearts, and goodwill and grace to the lips. I look upon thee and I see that thy wisdom is immeasurable and thine understanding inexhaustible, and that it is like unto a lamp in the darkness. I give thanks unto Him that brought me hither and showed thee to me, and made me to walk upon the threshold of thy gate, and made me to hear thy voice."

King Solomon answered and said unto her: "Wisdom and understanding spring from thee thyself. As for me, I only possess them in the measure in which the God of Israel hath given them to me because I asked and entreated them from him. And thou, although thou dost not know the God of Israel, hast this wisdom which thou hast made to grow in thy heart, and it hath made thee come to see me, the vassal and slave of my God, and the building of His sanctuary which I am establishing, and wherein I serve and move round about my Lady, the Tabernacle of the Law of the God of Israel, the holy and heavenly Zion. I am the slave of my God and not a free man; I do not serve according to my own will but according to His will. And this speech of mine springeth not from myself, but I give utterance only to what He maketh me to utter. Being only dust He hath made me flesh, and from being only water He hath made me a solid man, and from being only an ejected drop upon the ground that would have dried up, He hath fashioned me in His own likeness and hath made me in his own image."

25. SOLOMON AND THE WORKMAN

And as Solomon was talking in this wise with the Queen, he saw a certain labourer carrying a stone upon his head and a leather-bag of water upon his neck and shoulders, and his food and his sandals were tied around his loins, and there were pieces of wood in his hands; his garments were ragged and tattered, the sweat fell in drops from his face, and water from the bag of water dripped down upon his feet. And the labourer passed before Solomon and as he was going by, the King said unto him: "Stand still!" and the labourer stood still. And the King turned to the Queen and said unto her: "Look at this man. Wherein am I superior to this man? And in what way am I better than this man? And wherein shall I glory over this man? For I am a man, dust and ashes who tomorrow will become worms and corruption, and yet at this moment I appear like one who will never die. Who would make any complaint against God if He were to give unto this man as He hath given to me, and if He were to make me even as this man is? Are we not both men? As is his death, so is my death; and as is his life so is my life. Yet this man is stronger to work than I am, for God giveth power to those who are feeble just as it pleaseth Him to do.” Then Solomon said to the labourer: “Get thee to thy work.”

And he spoke further unto the Queen, saying: “What is the use of us, the children of men, if we do not exercise kindness and love upon earth? Are we not all nothingness, mere grass of the field, which dries up in its season and is burnt in the fire? On earth we provide ourselves with dainty meats, and we wear costly apparel, but even whilst we are alive we are stinking corruption; we provide ourselves with sweet scents and delicate ointments, but even whilst we are alive we are dead in sin and in transgression; being wise, we become fools through disobedience and deeds of iniquity; being held in honour, we become contemptible through magic, sorcery and the worship of idols.

But the man who is a being of honour, who was created in the image of God, if he doeth that which is good becometh like God; and the man who is worth nothing, if he commiteth sin becometh like unto the Devil, the arrogant Devil who refused to obey the commands of His creator, and all the arrogant among men walk in his way, and they shall be judged with him. And God loveth the meek, and those who practise humility walk in His way, and they shall rejoice in His kingdom. Blessed is the man who knoweth wisdom, compassion, and the fear of God.”

When the Queen heard this she said: “How thy voice doth please me! And how greatly do thy works and the utterance of thy mouth delight me! Tell me now: who is it right for me to worship? We worship the sun as our fathers have taught us to do, because we say that the sun is the king of the gods; and there are others among our subjects who worship other things; some worship stones, wood, trees; some worship carved figures, and some worship images of gold and silver. We worship the sun for he cooketh our food, and moreover he lights up the darkness and removeth fear; we call him ‘Our King’, and we call him ‘Our Creator,’ and we worship him as our God; for no man hath told us that besides him there is another god. But we have heard that there is with Israel another God whom we do not know, and men hath told us that He hath sent down to you from heaven a Tabernacle and hath given unto you a Tablet of the ordering of the angels by the hand of Moses the Prophet.

This also we have heard, that He himself cometh down to you and talketh to you, and informeth you concerning His ordinance and commandments.”

26. SOLOMON’S INSTRUCTIONS TO THE QUEEN

And the King answered and said unto her: “Verily, it is right that men should worship God, Who created the universe, the heavens and the earth, the sea and dry land, the sun and the moon, the stars and the brilliant bodies of the heavens, the trees and the stones, the beasts and the feathered fowl, the good and the evil. Him alone we should worship in fear and trembling, with joy and gladness. For He is the Lord of the universe, the Creator of angels and men. It is He Who killeth and maketh to live, Who inflicteth punishment and showeth compassion, Who raiseth up from the ground him that is in misery, Who exalteth the poor from the dust, Who maketh to be sorrowful and Who maketh to rejoice, Who raiseth up and Who bringeth down. No one can rebuke Him, for He is the Lord of the universe, and there is no one who can say unto Him: ‘What hast thou done?’ And unto Him it is right that there should be praise and thanksgiving from angels and men. And verily there hath been given unto us the Tabernacle of the God of Israel, which was created before all creation by His glorious counsel. And He hath made to come down to us His commandments, done in writing so that we may know His decrees and the judgments that He hath ordained in the mountain of His holiness.”

And the Queen said: “From this moment I will not worship the sun, but will worship the Creator of the sun, the God of Israel. And that Tabernacle of the God of Israel shall be unto me My Lady, and unto my seed after me, and unto all my kingdoms that are under my dominion. And because of this I have found favour before thee, and before the God of Israel my Creator, who hath brought me unto thee, hath made me to hear thy voice, hath shown me thy face and hath made me to understand thy commandments.” Then she returned to her quarters.

The Queen used to go to Solomon and return continually, and listened to his wisdom, and kept it in her heart. And Solomon used to go and visit her, and answer all the questions which she put to him, and he informed her concerning every matter that she wished to enquire about. After she had dwelt there six months the Queen wished to return to her own country, and she sent a message to Solomon, saying: "I desire greatly to dwell with thee, but now, for the sake of all my people I wish to return to my own country. As for that which I have heard, may God make it to bear fruit in my heart, and in the hearts of all those who have heard it with me. For the ear could never be filled with the hearing of thy wisdom, and the eye could never be filled with the sight of thy perfections."

It was not only the Queen who came to hear the wisdom of Solomon. Many used to come from cities and country, both from near and from far; for in those days there was no man found to be like unto him for wisdom (and it was not only human beings who came to him, but the wild animals and the birds used to come to him and hearkened unto his voice, and held converse with him), and then they returned to their own country, and everyone of them was astonished at his wisdom, and marvelled at what he had seen and heard.

When the Queen sent her message to Solomon, saying that she was about to depart to her own country, he pondered in his heart and said: "A woman of such splendid beauty hath come to me from the ends of the earth! What do I know? Will God give me seed in her?" And as it is said in the Book of Kings, Solomon the King was a lover of women.¹ And he married wives of the Hebrews, the Egyptians, the Caananites, the Edomites, the Moabites and from Rif² and Kuerge, Damascus and Syria, and women who were reported to be beautiful. And he had 400 queens and 600 concubines. This which he did was not for the sake of fornication but as a result of the wise intent that God had given unto him, and his remembering what God had said unto Abraham: "I will make thy seed like the stars of heaven for number, and like the sand of the sea."³ And Solomon said in his heart: "What do I know? Perhaps God will give me men-children from each one of these women." Therefore when he did thus he acted wisely saying: "My children shall inherit the cities of the enemy, and shall destroy those who worship idols."

²Upper Egypt

³Genesis 22:17

These early peoples lived under the Law of the Flesh, for the grace of the Holy Spirit had not been given unto them. And to those who lived after Christ, it was given to live with one woman under the law of marriage. As concerning Solomon, no law had been laid down for him in respect of women, and no blame can be imputed to him in respect of marrying many wives. But for those who believe, the law and the command have been given that they shall not marry many wives, even as Paul said: "Those who marry many wives seek their own punishment. He who marries one wife hath no sin". And the law restraineth us from the sister-in-law in respect of the bearing of children.

27. THE SEDUCTION OF THE QUEEN OF SHEBA

King Solomon sent a message unto the Queen, saying: "Now that thou hast come here, why will thou go away without seeing the administration of the kingdom, and how the meals for the chosen ones of the kingdom are eaten after the manner of the righteous, and how the people are driven away after the manner of sinners? From the sight of it thou wouldst acquire wisdom. Follow me now and seat thyself in my splendour in the tent and I will complete thy instruction, and thou shalt learn the administration of my kingdom; for thou lovest wisdom and she shall dwell with thee until thine end forever."

The Queen sent a reply message, saying: "From being a fool I have become wise by following thy wisdom, and from being a thing rejected by the God of Israel I have become a chosen woman because of this faith which is in my heart; and henceforth I will worship no other God except Him. And as concerning that which thou sayest, that thou wishest to increase in me wisdom and honour, I will come to thee according to thy desire." And Solomon rejoiced because of this message, and he arrayed his chosen ones in splendid apparel, and he added a double supply to his table. He had all the arrangements concerning the management of his house carefully ordered, since the house of King Solomon was made ready for guests daily.

Then he ordered the royal table according to the law of the kingdom. And the Queen came and went into a place set apart in splendour and glory, and she sat down directly behind him where she could see and learn everything. And she marvelled exceedingly at what she saw and heard, and she praised the God of Israel in her heart. She was struck with wonder at the splendour of the royal palace which she saw, for she could see though no one could see her, even as Solomon had arranged in his wisdom for her. He had beautified the place where she was seated and had spread over it purple hangings and laid down carpets, and decorated it with marbles and precious stones; then he burned aromatic powders and sprinkled oil of myrrh and cassia round about, and scattered frankincense and costly incense in all directions. When they brought the Queen into this abode, the scent all round was very pleasing to her, and even before she ate the dainty meats therein she was satisfied with the smell of them.

With wise intent Solomon sent to her meats which would make her thirsty and drinks that were mingled with vinegar, and fish and dishes made with pepper; and he gave them to the Queen to eat. The royal meal had come to an end, and the administrators, the counsellors, the young men and the servants had departed, and the King rose up and he went to the Queen, and he said unto her: "Take thine ease for love's sake until daybreak." And she said unto him: "Swear to me by thy God, the God of Israel, that thou wilt not take me by force. For if I, who according to the law of men am a virgin, be seduced, I would then travel on my journey back in sorrow, affliction and tribulation."

28. SOLOMON'S OATH TO THE QUEEN OF ETHIOPIA

Solomon answered and said unto her: "I swear unto thee that I will not take thee by force, but thou must also swear unto me that thou wilt not take by force anything that is in my house." The Queen laughed and said unto him: "Being a wise man why dost thou speak as a fool? Shall I steal anything, or shall I carry out of the house of the King that which the King hath not given to me? Do not imagine that I have come here through love of riches. Moreover, my own kingdom is as wealthy as thine, and there is nothing which I wish for that I lack. Surely I have only come in quest of thy wisdom." And he said unto her: "If thou wouldst make me swear, swear thou to me also that neither of us may be unjustly treated.” And she said unto him: “Swear to me that thou wilt not take me by force, and I on my part will swear not to take by force thy possessions.” And he swore to her and made her swear also. And the King went up on his bed on one side of the chamber and the servants made ready for her a bed on the other side. Then Solomon said unto a young manservant: “Wash out the bowl and set in it a vessel of water whilst the Queen is looking on, and shut the doors and go and sleep.” And Solomon spoke to the servant in another tongue which the Queen did not understand, and he did as the King commanded and went to sleep.

The King had not as yet fallen asleep, but he only pretended to be asleep and he was watching the Queen intently. The Queen slept a little and when she woke up her mouth was dry with thirst, for the food which Solomon had given her in his wisdom had made her thirsty indeed. Her mouth was dry and she moved her lips and sucked with her mouth but found no moisture. Then she determined to drink the water which she had seen, and she looked at King Solomon and watched him carefully; she thought he was sleeping a sound sleep. But he was not asleep; he was waiting until she should rise up to steal the water to quench her thirst. She rose up, and making no sound with her feet, she went to the water in the bowl and lifted up the jar to drink the water. But Solomon seized her hand before she could drink the water, and said unto her: “Why hast thou broken the oath that thou wouldst not take by force anything that is in my house?” And she answered and said unto him in fear: “Is the oath broken by my drinking water?” And the King said unto her: “Is there anything that thou hast seen under the heavens that is more precious than water?” And the Queen said: “I have sinned against myself and thou art free from thy oath. But let me drink water for my thirst.” Then Solomon said unto her: “Am I then free from the oath which thou hast made me swear?” And the Queen said: “Be free from thy oath, only let me drink water.” And he permitted her to drink water, and after she had drunk water he worked his will with her and they slept together.

Immediately after he slept there appeared unto King Solomon in a dream a brilliant sun, and it came down from heaven and shed exceedingly great splendour over Israel. And when it had tarried there for a time it suddenly withdrew itself, and it flew away to the country of Ethiopia, and it shone there with exceedingly great brightness forever, for it desired to dwell there. And the King said: "I waited to see if it would come back to Israel, but it did not return. And again while I waited a light rose up in the heavens, and a sun emerged from the tribe of Judah, and it sent forth light which was very much brighter than before." And Israel, because of the brightness of that sun treated that sun with cruelty and would not walk in the light thereof. And that sun paid no heed to Israel, and the Israelites hated Him, and it became impossible that peace should exist between them and the sun.

They lifted up their hands against Him with staves and knives, and they wished to extinguish that sun. And they cast gloom upon the whole world with earthquake and thick darkness, and they imagined that that sun would never more rise upon them. And they destroyed His light and cast themselves upon Him and they set guard over His tomb wherein they had cast Him. He came forth where they did not look for him, and brightened the whole world, especially the First Sea and the Last Sea, Ethiopia and Rome: And He paid no heed whatsoever to Israel, and He ascended His former throne.

When Solomon the King saw this vision in his sleep his soul became disturbed, but his understanding was snatched away by a flash of lightning, and he woke up with an agitated mind. Moreover Solomon marvelled concerning the Queen, for she was vigorous in strength and beautiful of form, and she was undefiled in her virginity. She had reigned in her country for six years and, notwithstanding her gracious attraction and her splendid form, had kept her body pure. Then the Queen said unto Solomon: "Dismiss me, and let me depart to my country." And he went into his house and gave unto her whatsoever she wished for of splendid things and riches, beautiful apparel which bewitched the eyes and everything of great value; camels and wagons six thousand in number, which were laden with beautiful things of the most desirable kind, and wagons wherein loads were carried over the desert, and a vessel to travel over the sea.

29. SOLOMON'S SIGN TO THE QUEEN OF ETHIOPIA

The Queen rejoiced and she went forth in order to depart, and the King set her on her way with great pomp and ceremony. And Solomon took her aside so that they might be alone together, and he took off the ring that was upon his little finger and gave it to the Queen, and said unto her: "Take this ring so that thou mayest not forget me; and if it happens that I obtain seed from thee, this ring shall be unto it a sign; and if it shall be a man-child he shall come to me, and the peace of God be with thee! Whilst I was sleeping with thee I saw many visions in a dream, and it seemed as if a sun had risen upon Israel, but it snatched itself away and flew off and lighted up the country of Ethiopia; maybe that country shall be blessed through thee; God knoweth. As for thee, observe what I have told thee, so that thou mayest worship God with all thy heart and perform his will. For He punisheth those who are arrogant and He sheweth compassion upon those who are humble, and He removeth the thrones of the mighty, and He maketh to be honoured those who are needy. For death and life are from Him, and riches and poverty are bestowed by His will. For everything is His and none can oppose His command and His judgment in the heavens, in the earth, in the sea or in the abysses; and may God be with thee! Go in Peace." Then they separated from each other.

30. THE QUEEN BRINGS FORTH HER SON BAYNA-LEHKEM

And the Queen departed and came into the country of Bala Zadisareya nine months and five days after she had separated from King Solomon. And the pains of childbirth laid hold upon her, and she brought forth a man-child, and she gave it to the nurse with great pride and delight. There she tarried until the days of her purification were ended, then she came to her own country with great pomp and ceremony. And her officers who had remained there brought gifts to their Queen, and made obeisance to her, and paid homage to her, and all the regions of the country rejoiced at her coming. Those who were nobles among them, she arrayed in splendid apparel, and to some she gave gold and silver, and hyacinthine and purple robes; and she gave them all manner of things that could be desired. She ordered her kingdom right and none disobeyed her command, for she loved wisdom and God strengthened her kingdom.

And the child grew and she called his name Bayna-Lehkem, which means "son of the wise man." When the child reached the age of twelve years he went to the Queen his mother and said unto her: "O Queen, make me to know who is my father." And the Queen spoke to him angrily, wishing to frighten him so that he might not desire to go to his father saying: "Why dost thou ask me about thy father? I am thy father and thy mother; seek not to know any more." And the boy went forth from her presence, and sat down. A second time and a third time he asked her, and he implored her to tell him. One day however she told him, saying: "His country is far away, and the road is very difficult; wouldst thou not rather be here?" The youth Bayna-Lehkem was handsome; his whole body and his members, and the bearing of his shoulders resembled those of King Solomon, his father; and his eyes, his legs, and his whole posture resembled those of Solomon the King.

When he was twenty-two years old he was skilled in the art of war and horsemanship, in the hunting and trapping of wild beasts, and in everything that young men desire to learn. And he said unto the Queen: "I will go and look upon the face of my father, and I will come back here by the will of God, the Lord of Israel."

31. BAYNA-LEHKEM SETS OUT FOR JERUSALEM

And the Queen called Tamrin, the chief of her caravan and merchants and she said unto him: "Get ready for thy journey and take this young man with thee, for he bothers me by day and by night. And thou shalt take him to the King and shalt bring him back in safety, if the Lord God of Israel pleaseth." And she prepared a retinue suitable to their wealth and honourable condition, and made ready all the goods that were necessary for the journey and for presenting as gifts to the King. She made ready everything for sending him away, and she gave to the officers that were to accompany him enough money as they would need for him and for themselves on the journey. And she commanded them that they were not to leave him there, but only to take him to the King and then to bring him back again to her, when he would assume rulership over the land.

At that time there was a law in the country of Ethiopia that only a woman should reign, and that she must be a virgin who has never known man, but the Queen had said unto Solomon: "Henceforward a man who is of thy seed shall reign, and a woman shall nevermore reign in Ethiopia; only seed of thine shall reign and his seed after him from generation to generation. All this thou shalt inscribe in the scrolls and in the Book of their Prophets in brass, and thou shalt lay it in the House of God, which shall be built as a memorial and as a prophecy for the last days. And the people shall not worship the sun and the magnificence of the heavens, or the mountains and the forests, the stones and the trees of the wilderness, graven images and figures of gold, or the feathered fowl which fly; and they shall not make use of them in divining, and they shall not pay adoration unto them. And this law shall abide forever. And if there be anyone who shall transgress this law, thy seed shall judge him forever. Only give us the fringes of the covering of the holy heavenly Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God, which we would embrace. Peace be to the strength of thy kingdom and to thy brilliant wisdom, which God, the Lord of Israel, our Creator, hath given unto thee."

And the Queen took the young man aside and when he was alone with her she gave him that symbol which Solomon had given her, that is, the ring on his finger, so that he might know his son, and might remember her word and her covenant which she had made with him, that she would worship God all the days of her life, she and those who were under her dominion, with all the power which God had given her. And the Queen sent him away in peace.

The young man and his retinue made their way and they journeyed on and came into the country of the neighbourhood of Gaza. This is the Gaza which Solomon the King gave to the Queen of Ethiopia.

In the Acts of the Apostles, Luke the Evangelist wrote, saying: "He was the governor of the whole country of Gaza, an eunuch of Queen Candace who had believed on the word of Luke the Apostle."¹

¹Acts 8:26-39

32. BAYNA-LEHKEM ARRIVES IN GAZA

When the young man arrived in his mother's province of Gaza, he rejoiced there in the honour which he received, and in the gifts that were made to him. And when the people saw him they thought him to be the perfect likeness of Solomon the King. They made obeisance to him, and they said unto him: "Hail, the royal father liveth!" And they brought unto him gifts and offerings, fatted cattle and food, as they did to their king. And the people of the whole country of Gaza, as far as the border of Judah, were stirred up and said: "This is King Solomon." Then there were some who said: "The King is in Jerusalem building his house," and others said: "This is Solomon the King, the son of David." And they were perplexed, and they disputed with one another, and they sent off spies mounted on horses who were to seek out King Solomon and to find out if he were actually in Jerusalem, or if he were with them in Gaza.

When the spies came to the watchmen of the city of Jerusalem, they found King Solomon there and they made obeisance to him, and they said unto him: "Hail, may the royal father live ! Our country is disturbed because there hath come into it a merchant who resembleth thee in form and appearance, without the slightest alteration or variation. He resembleth thee in noble carriage and in splendid form, and in stature and goodly appearance; he lacketh nothing in respect of thee and is in no way different from thyself. His eyes are bright like unto those of a man who hath drunk wine, his legs are graceful and slender, and the tower of his neck is like unto the tower of David thy father. He is like unto thee exactly in every respect, and every member of his whole body is like unto thine."

And Solomon the King answered and said unto them: "Where is it that he wisheth to go?" And they answered and said unto him: "We have not enquired of him, for he is awesome like thyself. But his own people, when we asked them, said: 'We have come from the dominions of Queen Candace of Ethiopia, and we are going to the country of Judah to King Solomon'." And when King Solomon heard this his heart was perturbed and he was glad in his soul, for in those days he had no children, except a boy who was seven years old and whose name was Rehoboam.

It happened to Solomon even as Paul said: "God hath made foolishness the wisdom of this world"¹for Solomon had made a plan in his wisdom and said: "By one thousand women I shall father one thousand men-children, and I shall inherit the countries of the enemy, and I will overthrow their idols." But God only gave him three children. His eldest son was the King of Ethiopia, the son of the Queen of Ethiopia, and was the firstborn of whom God spake prophetically: "God sware unto David in righteousness, and repented not, 'Of the fruit of thy body will I make to sit upon thy throne'."² And God gave unto David His servant grace before Him, and granted unto him that there should sit upon the throne of Godhead one of his seed in the flesh, from the virgin, and He should judge the living and the dead, and reward every man according to his work, One to whom praise is meet, our Lord Jesus Christ for ever and ever.³ And He gave him one on the earth who should become king over the Tabernacle of the Law of the holy, heavenly Zion, that is to say, the King of Ethiopia.

As for those who reigned and who were not of Israel, that happened because of the transgression of the law and the commandment, for which God was not pleased.

33. SOLOMON MAKES BAYNA-LEHKEM CAPTAIN OF HIS HOST

And Solomon the King sent the commander of his army with gifts and meat and drink to entertain the traveller. Then the commander set out with a great number of wagons and he came to Bayna-Lehkem, and embraced him, and gave him everything that Solomon the King had sent unto him. And he said unto him: "Make haste and come with me, for the heart of the King is burning up as with fire with the love of thee. Maybe he will find out for himself whether thou art his son or his brother; for in thy appearance and in thy conversation thou art in no way different from him.

And now, rise up quickly for my lord the King said unto me: 'Haste and bring him to me in honour and comfort and with suitable service, and in joy and gladness’.” And the young man answered and said unto him: “I thank God, the Lord of Israel, that I have found grace with my lord the King without having seen his face; his word hath rejoiced me. And now I will put my trust in the Lord of Israel that he will show me the King, and will bring me back safely to my mother the Queen, and to my country Ethiopia.”

And Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada,¹ Commander of the army of King Solomon, answered and said unto Bayna-Lehkem: “My Lord, this is a very small matter, and thou wilt find far greater joy and pleasure with my lord the King. And as concerning what thou sayest ‘my country’, Solomon the King is better than thy mother, and this our country is better than thy country. We have heard that thy country is a land of cold and cloud, of glare and burning heat, and a region of snow and ice. And when the sons of Noah, Shem, Ham and Japhet divided the world among them, they looked on thy country with wisdom and saw that although it was spacious and broad, it was a land of whirlwind and burning heat and therefore gave it to Canaan the son of Ham, as a portion for himself and his seed for ever. But the land that is ours is the land of inheritance, the promised land, which God hath given unto us according to the oath that He swore to our fathers, a land flowing with milk and honey, where food is ours without anxiety, a land that yieldeth fruit of every kind in its season without exhausting labour, a land which God keepeth watch over continually from one year to the next.

All this is thine, and we are thine and will be thine heirs, and thou shalt dwell in our country, for thou art the seed of David, the Lord of my Lord, and unto thee belongeth this throne of Israel.”

And the headmen of the merchant Tamrin answered and said unto Benaiah: “Our country is the better. The air of our country is good for it is without burning heat or fire, and the water of our country is good and sweet, and floweth in rivers; moreover the tops of our mountains run with water. And we do not as in thy country, dig very deep wells in search of water, and we do not die through the heat of the sun; but even at noonday we hunt wild animals, buffaloes, gazelles, birds and small animals. And in the winter God protects us from one year to the next, and in the springtime the people eat what they have trodden with the foot as in the land of Egypt. As for our trees they produce good crops of fruit; and the wheat, the barley and all the cattle are good and wonderful. But there is one thing that ye have wherein ye are better than we are, namely wisdom, and because of it we have come unto you.”

¹IKings 2:35

Then Benaiah, the Commander of the army of King Solomon, answered saying: “What is better than wisdom? For wisdom hath established the earth and made strong the heavens, and restrained the waves of the sea so that it might not cover the earth. However, rise up and let us go to my lord, for his heart is greatly moved by love for thee, and he hath sent me to bring thee to him with all the speed possible.”

And the son of the Queen rose up and arrayed Benaiah and the fifty men who were with him in gorgeous raiment, and they rose up to go to Jerusalem to Solomon the King. When they came close to the place where the horses were exercised and trained, Benaiah went on in front and came to the place where Solomon was, and he told him that the son of the Queen was handsome in his appearance, and that his voice was pleasant, and that he resembled him in form, and that his whole bearing was exceedingly noble. Then the King said unto him: “Where is he? Did I not send thee forth to bring him as quickly as possible?” And Benaiah said unto him: “He is here, I will bring him quickly.” And Benaiah went and said unto the young man: “Rise up O my master, and come;” and making Bayna-Lehkem to go quickly he brought him to the King’s gate. And when all the soldiers saw him they made obeisance unto him, and they said: “Behold, King Solomon hath gone forth from his palace.” But when the men who were inside came forth they marvelled, and they went back to their places, and again they saw the King upon his throne; and wondering they went forth again and looked at the young man, and they were incapable of speaking and of saying anything.

When Benaiah came in again to announce to the King the arrival of the young man, there was none standing before the King, but all Israel had marched outside to see the young man.

34. SOLOMON'S CONVERSATION WITH BAYNA-LEHKEM

Benaiah went out and brought Bayna-Lehkem inside, and when King Solomon saw him he rose up and moved forward to welcome him, and he loosed the band of his apparel from his shoulder, and he embraced and kissed him, and said unto him: "Behold, my father David hath renewed his youth and hath risen from the dead." And Solomon the King turned around to those who had announced the arrival of the young man, and he said unto them: "Ye said unto me, 'He resembleth thee', but this is not my stature, but the stature of David my father in the days of his early manhood, and he is handsomer than I am." And Solomon the King rose up and went into his chamber, and he arrayed his son in apparel made of cloth embroidered with gold, and a belt of gold, and he set a crown upon his head, and a ring upon his finger.

Having arrayed him in glorious apparel which bewitched the eyes, he seated him upon his throne that he might be equal in rank to himself. Then he said unto the nobles and officers of Israel: "O ye who treat me with derision among yourselves and say that I have no son; look ye, this is my son, the fruit that hath gone forth from my body, whom God, the Lord of Israel hath given me when I expected it not."

And his nobles answered and said unto him: "Blessed be the mother who hath brought forth this young man, and blessed be the day wherein thou hadst union with the mother of this young man. For there hath risen upon us from the root of Jesse a shining man who shall be king of the posterity of his seed. And concerning his father none shall ask questions for verily he is an Israelite of the seed of David, fashioned perfectly in the likeness of his father's form and appearance; we are his servants and he shall be our King. And they brought unto him gifts, each according to his greatness.

The young man then took the ring which his mother had given him, and he said unto his father: "Take this ring and remember the word which thou didst speak unto the Queen, and give unto us a portion of the covering of the Tabernacle of the law of God, so that we may worship it all our days, and all those who are subject unto us, and those who are in the kingdom of the Queen." And the King answered and said unto him:

“Why givest thou me the ring as a sign? Without thy giving me a sign I discovered the likeness of thy form to myself, for thou art indeed my son.”

Then the merchant Tamrin spake unto King Solomon saying: “Hearken O King, unto the message which thy handmaiden, the Queen my mistress sent by me: ‘Take this young man, anoint him, consecrate and bless him, and make him King over our country, and give him the command that a woman shall never again reign in Ethiopia, and send him back in peace. And peace be with the might of thy kingdom, and with thy brilliant wisdom. As for me, I never wished that he should come where thou art, but he urged me exceedingly that he should be allowed to come to thee. Besides, I was afraid for him lest he should fall sick on the journey, either through thirst for water, or the heat of the sun, and I should bring my grey hairs down to the grave with sorrow. Then I put my trust in the holy, heavenly Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God, that thou wilt not withhold it in thy wisdom. For thy nobles do not return to their houses and look upon their children, by reason of the abundance of wisdom and food which thou givest them according to their desire. Because of this I, through my fear, sought assurance that thou mightest send him back to me in peace without sickness and suffering, in love and in peace that my heart might rejoice at having encountered thee’.”

The King answered and said unto him: “Besides travailing with him and suckling him, what else hath a woman to do with a son? A daughter belongeth to the mother, and a boy to the father. God cursed Eve, saying: ‘Bring forth children in anguish¹ and with sorrow of heart, and after thy bringing forth, shall take place thy return to thy husband. ‘ As for this son of mine, I will not give him to the Queen, but I will make him king over Israel. For this is my firstborn, the first of my race whom God hath given me.”

Solomon sent unto the young man evening and morning dainty meats and apparel of honour, and gold and silver. And he said unto him: “It is better for thee to dwell here in our country with us, where the House of God is, and where God dwelleth.”

¹Genesis 3:16

Then the young man, his son, sent a message unto him, saying: "Gold and silver and rich apparel are not wanting in our country. But I came hither in order to hear thy wisdom, to see thy face, to salute thee and to pay homage to thy kingdom, and to make obeisance to thee, and then I intended thee to send me away to my mother and to my own country. For no man hateth the place where he was born, and everyone loveth the things of his native country. And though thou givest me dainty meats I do not love them, and they are not suitable for my body, but the meats whereby I grow and become strong are those that are gratifying to me. And although thy country pleaseth me even as a garden, yet my heart is not gratified; the mountains of the land of my mother where I was born are far better in my sight. As for the Tabernacle of the God of Israel, if I adore it where I am, it will give me glory, and I shall look upon the House of God which thou hast built, and I will make offering and supplication to it there.

As for Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God, give me a portion of the covering thereof, and I will worship it with my mother and with all those who are subject to my sovereignty. For my Lady the Queen hath already rooted out all those who served idols, and those who worshipped strange objects. For she had heard from thee and had learned, and she did according to thy word, and we worship the living God." And the King was not able to make his son consent to remain in Jerusalem.

35. SOLOMON QUESTIONS HIS SON BAYNA-LEHKEM

Again Solomon held converse with his son when he was alone, and he said unto him: "Why dost thou wish to depart from me? What dost thou lack here that thou wouldst go back to the country of the heathen? What is it that driveth thee to forsake the Kingdom of Israel?" And his son answered and said unto him: "It is impossible for me to live here. I must go back to my mother, thou favouring me with thy blessing. For thou hast a son who is better than I am, namely Rehoboam who was born of thy wife lawfully, whilst my mother is not thy wife according to the law."

And the King answered and said unto him: "Since thou speakest in this manner, according to the law I myself am not the son of my father

David, for he took the wife of another man whom he caused to be slain in battle, and he begot me by her;¹ but God is compassionate and He hath forgiven him. Who is wickeder and more foolish than men? And who is as compassionate and wise as God? God hath made me of my father, and thee hath He made of me, according to His will. O my son, thou fearer of our Lord God, do not violence to the face of thy father, so that in times to come thou mayest not meet with violence from him that shall go forth from thy loins, and that thy seed may prosper upon the earth. My son Rehoboam is a boy six years old, and thou art my first-born son. Thou hast come to reign and to lift up the spear of him that begot thee. Behold, I have been reigning for twenty-nine years, and thy mother came to me in the seventh year of my kingdom; and please God, He shall make me to attain to the span of the days of my father. And when I shall be gathered to my fathers, thou shalt sit upon my throne, and thou shalt reign in my stead, and the elders of Israel shall love thee exceedingly; and I will make a marriage for thee, and will give thee as many queens and concubines as thou desirest. And thou shalt be blessed in this land of inheritance with the blessing that God gave unto our fathers, even as He covenanted with Noah His servant, and with Abraham His friend, and with the righteous men and their descendants after them, down to David my father. Thou seest me, a weak man, upon the throne of my fathers, and thou shalt be like myself after me, and thou shalt judge nations without number, and families that cannot be counted.

And the Tabernacle of the God of Israel shall belong to thee and thy seed forever. And God shall dwell within it and shall hear thy prayers therein, and thy memorial shall be in it from generation to generation."

And his son answered and said unto him: "O Lord, it is impossible for me to leave my country and my mother, for my mother made me to swear by her breasts that I would not remain here but would return to her quickly, and also that I would not marry a wife here. And the Tabernacle of the God of Israel shall bless me wheresoever I shall be, and thy prayer shall accompany me always. I desired to see thy face, to hear thy voice and to receive thy blessings; and now I desire to depart to my mother in safety."

¹II Samuels 11:1-27

36. SOLOMON SENDS NOBLES OF ISRAEL TO ETHIOPIA WITH HIS SON

Solomon the King went back into his palace, and he gathered together his councillors, his officers and the elders of his kingdom, and he said unto them: "I am not able to make my son consent to dwell here. And now, hearken ye unto me and to what I shall say unto you. Let us make him king of the country of Ethiopia, together with your children; ye sit on my right hand and on my left hand, and in like manner the eldest of your children shall sit on his right hand and on his left hand. Ye councillors and officers, let us give him your firstborn children and we shall have two kingdoms; I will rule here with you, and our children shall rule there. And I put my trust in God that a third time He will give me seed, and that a third king will be to me.

Baltasor the king of Rome wisheth that I would give my son to his daughter, and to make him with his daughter king over the whole country of Rome. For besides her he hath no other child, and he hath sworn that he will only make king a man who is of the seed of David my father. And if we rule there we shall be three kingdoms. And Rehoboam shall reign here over Israel. For thus saith the prophecy of David my father: 'The seed of Solomon shall become three heads of kingdoms upon the earth.' And we will send unto them priests, and we will ordain laws for them, and they shall worship and serve the God of Israel under three royal heads.

And God shall be praised by the race of his people Israel, and be exalted in all the earth, even as my father wrote in his book, saying: 'Tell the nations that God is King.¹ Announce to the peoples His work, praise Him and sing ye unto Him;' and again he saith: 'Praise God with a new song. His praise is in the congregation of the righteous, Israel shall rejoice in his Creator.'² Unto us belongeth the glory of sovereignty and we will praise our Creator. And the nations who serve idols shall look upon us and they shall fear us and make us kings over them, and they shall praise God and fear Him.

¹Compare Psalm 95

²Compare Psalm 96

Now, come ye, let us make this young man king, and let us send him away with your children, ye who possess wealth and position. According to the position and wealth that ye have here, shall your children rule there. And they shall see the ordering of royalty, and we will establish them according to our law, and we will direct them and give them commands and send them away to reign there.”

And the priests, the officers and the councillors answered and said unto him: “Do send thy firstborn, and we will send our children also according to thy wish, for who can resist the command of God and the King? They are the servants of thee and of thy seed as thou hast proclaimed. If thou wishest, thou canst sell them and their mothers to be slaves; it is not for us to transgress thy command and the command of the Lord thy God.” And then they prepared their children to send them into the country of Ethiopia, so that they might reign there and dwell there forever, they and their seed from generation to generation.”¹

37. BAYNA-LEHKEM (MENYELEK I) IS ANOINTED KING OF ETHIOPIA AND IS CALLED DAVID II

And they made ready the ointment of the oil of kingship, and the sounds of the large horn and the small horn, the flute and the pipes, and the harp and the drums filled the air; and the city resounded with cries of joy and gladness. And they brought the young man into the Holy of Holies, and he laid hold upon the horns of the altar, and sovereignty was given unto him by the mouth of Zadok the high priest, and by the mouth of Benaiah the priest, the commander of the army of King Solomon, and he anointed him with the holy oil of kingship.

Then he went out from the house of the Lord, and they called his name David, for the name of a king came to him by the law. They made him to ride upon the mule of King Solomon and they led him round about the city, and said: “We have appointed thee from this moment;” and then they cried out to him: “Long live the royal father!” And there were some who said: “It is right that thy dominion of Ethiopia shall be from the river of Egypt to the setting sun, and from Shoa to the East of India, for thou wilt please the people of these lands. And the Lord God of Israel and the Tabernacle of the Law of God shall be unto thee a guide, and shall be with all that thou lookest upon. All thine enemies and foes shall be overthrown before thee, and completion and perfection shall be unto thee and unto thy seed after thee; thou shalt judge many nations and none shall judge thee. The blessing of heaven and earth shall be thy blessing.” And all the congregation of Israel said: “Amen.” Then his father Solomon the King also said unto Zadok the priest: “Make him to know and tell him concerning the judgment and decree of God which he shall observe in Ethiopia.”

¹Falashas (Ethiopian Jews – see Appendix 2)

38. ZADOK’S COMMANDS TO DAVID II

Zadok the priest said unto the young man: “Hearken unto what I shall say unto thee; and if thou wilt perform it thou shalt live to God, and if thou dost not, God will punish thee and thou shalt be vanquished by thy foes. And God shall turn away His face from thee, and thou shalt be dismayed, sad and sorrowful in thy heart, and thy sleep shall be without rest. So then, hearken unto the word of God and perform that which we command thee this day and serve no other gods. But if thou will not hear the word of God, then hearken to all the curses here mentioned which shall come upon thee: cursed shalt thou be in the field and in the city. Cursed shall be the fruit of thy land and the fruit of thy belly, the herds of thy cattle and the flocks of thy sheep. And God shall send upon thee famine and pestilence, and He shall destroy that whereto thou hast put thy hand, until at length He shall destroy thee, because thou hast not hearkened to His word. And the heavens which are above thee shall become brass, and the earth which is beneath thee shall become iron; and God shall make the rain which should fall upon thy land to be darkness only, and dust shall descend from heaven upon thee until it shall cover thee up and destroy thee. And thou shalt be smitten in battle before thine enemies. Thou shalt go forth to attack them by one road, and by seven roads shalt thou take to flight before their faces, and thou shalt be routed; thy dead body shall become food for the fowls of the heavens, and there shall be none to bury thee. And God shall punish thee with sores (leprosy), with the wasting disease, with the fever that destroyeth, and with the punishments, the plagues of Egypt. With blindness and terror of heart thou shalt grope about by day like a blind man in the darkness, and thou shalt find none to help thee in thy trouble.

Thou shalt marry a wife, and another man shall carry her away by force. Thou shalt build a house and shalt not dwell therein. Thou shalt plant a vineyard and shalt not harvest the grapes thereof. Men shall slay thy fat oxen before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat of their flesh. Men shall snatch away thy ass and shall not bring him back to thee. Thy sheep shall run to the slaves and to thine enemy, and thou shalt find none to help thee, and thy sons and daughters shall follow other people, and thou shalt see with thine own eyes how they are smitten, and shalt be able to do nothing. An enemy whom thou knowest not shall devour the food of thy land and thy labour, and thou shalt not be able to prevent him; and thou shalt become a man of suffering and calamity.

All these things shall come upon thee if thou wilt not hearken to the word of the Lord. But if thou wilt truly hearken unto the word of the Lord, the goodness of God shall find thee, and thou shalt rule the countries of the enemy, and thou shalt inherit glory everlasting from the Lord God of Israel, Who ruleth everything for He is the Lord of death and of life, and He directeth and ruleth all the world with His wisdom, His power and His mighty arm.”

39. THE BLESSING OF KINGS

“Hearken thou now to the blessing that shall come upon thee, if thou wilt do the Will of God... Thou shalt be blessed in all thy ways; blessed shalt thou be in the city and in the field and in thy house, and blessed shall be the fruit of thy land, the fountains of thy waters and the fruit that thou hast planted. Blessed shall be the flocks of thy sheep, thy granaries and thy barns. Blessed shalt thou be in thy coming and in thy going forth.

And God shall bring to thee thine enemies who have risen up against thee, and they shall be trodden small beneath thy feet. God shall send His blessing on thy houses and on everything to which thou hast put thy hand, and He shall multiply for thee good things, namely, children of thy body, produce of thy land, and births among thy flocks and herds. And in the land which He swore to give to thy fathers, God shall open for thee the storehouse of the blessings of the heavens, and He shall give thee blessed rain, and shall bless the fruit of thy labour. Thou shalt lend unto many people, but thou shalt not borrow. Thou shalt rule over many nations, but they shall not rule over thee.

And God shall set thee at the head and not at the tail, and thou shalt be at the top and not at the bottom. And thou shalt gather together of every blessing of the land for thy flocks and herds, and thou shalt take the spoil of the nations for thy army, and they shall bow down to thee and to thy sovereignty because of the greatness of thy glory. Thine honour shall rise up like the cedar and like the morning star;¹ the brilliance of thy glory shall be before all the nations of the earth, and before every tribe of thy people Israel.

For God shall be with thee in all thy ways, and He shall perform thy will in everything that thou desirest. And thou shalt inherit the countries of thine enemy, and the magnificence of thy people shall be praised because of the greatness of thine awesomeness, and because of the multitude of thy soldiers. And all those who do not perform the Will of God, will fear thee because thou dost do His Will, and dost serve Him, and therefore He will give thee great majesty in the sight of those who see thee. Their hearts shall tremble before the bridle of thy horses and the quiver of thy bow. At the glitter of thy shield they shall bow down to the face of the earth, for their hearts shall be terrified at the sight of thy dreadful majesty.

When those who are in the mountains see thee afar off they shall come down to the plain, and those who are on the seas and in the deep waters shall come forth, so that the Lord may bring them into thy hand because they have transgressed the command of God. And thou, when thou doest His Will, shall receive from Him everything that thou hast asked; for if thou lovest Him He will love thee, and if thou keepest His commandments He will grant thee the petition of thy heart, and everything that thou seekest thou shalt receive from Him.

¹Revelation 2:26-28; 22:16

40. THE TEN COMMANDMENTS

Hear ye Israel, that which God commanded you to keep; He saith: 'I am the Lord thy God Who hast brought thee out of the land of Egypt and out of the House of Bondage. There shall be no other gods besides me, and thou shalt not make any god that is graven, and no god that is like what is in the heavens above, or in the earth beneath, or in the water that is under the earth. Thou shalt not bow down to them, and thou shalt not serve them, for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God. I am He who visits the sins of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation of those who hate Me, and I perform mercy to a thousand generations of those who love Me, and keep My commandments.'

'Thou shalt not swear a false oath in the name of the Lord thy God, for the Lord will not hold innocent the man who sweareth a false oath in His Name.'

'Observe the day of the Sabbath to sanctify it, even as the Lord thy God commanded. Six days thou shalt do thy work, and on the seventh day, the Sabbath of the Lord thy God, thou shalt do no work at all, neither thyself, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy servant, nor thy ass, nor thy beast, nor the stranger that abideth with thee. For in six days God made the heavens and the earth, and the sea and all that is in them, and rested on the seventh day, and because of this God blessed the seventh day and declared it free from work.'

'Honour thy father and thy mother so that it may be good unto thee, the many days that thou shalt find in the land which the Lord thy God hath given thee.'

'Thou shalt not go with the wife of another man.'

'Thou shalt not slay a life.'

'Thou shalt not commit fornication.'

'Thou shalt not steal.'

'Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour.'

'Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, nor his house, nor his land, his manservant nor his maidservant his ox nor his cattle, nor his ass, nor any of the beasts that thy neighbour has acquired.¹

This is the word which God hath spoken, His law and regulations. And those who sin He rebuketh, so that they may not be confirmed in error, and may restrain themselves from the pollution wherewith God is not pleased. And this is the thing with which God is not pleased, and it is right that men should abstain from it.

‘No man shall uncover the shame of one with whom he hath kinship; for I am the Lord thy God. The shame of thy father and thy mother thou shalt not uncover, for it is thy mother. Thou shalt not uncover the shame of thy father’s wife, for it is the shame of thy mother. Thou shalt not uncover the shame of thy sister who was begotten by thy father or thy mother. Whether she was born unto him from outside or whether she is a kinswoman of thine, thou shalt not uncover her shame.

Thou shalt not uncover the shame, neither of thy son’s daughter or the shame of the daughter and the wife of thy brother’s son, for it is thine own shame.

Thou shalt not uncover the shame of thy brother’s wife, for it is thy brother’s shame as long as thy brother liveth. Thou shalt not uncover the shame of a woman and that of her daughter; thou shalt not cause their shame to be uncovered; it is thy house and it is sin.

Thou shalt not take to wife a maiden and her sister so as to make them jealous each of the other, and thou shalt not uncover their shame, nor the shame of the one or the other as long as the first sister is alive. Thou shalt not go to a menstruous woman, until she is purified; thou shalt not uncover her shame whilst she is still unclean. And thou shalt not go to the wife of thy neighbour to lie with her, and thou shalt not let thy seed enter her.

Thou shalt not lie with a man as with a woman, for it is pollution, and thou shalt not go to a beast nor lie with it so as to make thy seed go out upon it, that thou mayest not be polluted thereby. And a woman shall not go to a beast to lie with it, for it is pollution. And ye shall not pollute yourselves with any of these things, for with them the nations whom I have driven out before you, have polluted themselves, and with them ye shall not pollute your bodies.'

And sanctify ye your souls and your bodies to God for He is the Holy One, and He loveth those who sanctify their souls and their bodies to Him. For He is holy and to be feared, He is high, merciful and compassionate, and to Him praise is due for ever and ever. Amen."

41. THE PRIESTS AND OFFICIALS OF THE COURT OF DAVID II IN ETHIOPIA

And the city rejoiced because the King had made his son King, and had appointed him King from his own territory to that of another. But the city sorrowed also because the King had commanded that they should give their children who were called "firstborn." And those who were on the right hand should sit in the same way as their fathers sat with King Solomon, even so should they sit at the right hand of his son David II, the King of Ethiopia; and those who were on the left hand should sit as their father sat with King Solomon, even so should they sit at the left hand of his son David II, the King of Ethiopia; and their rank and names should be like those of their fathers. And each should be according to his ordinance, his greatness, his possession of authority; in this wise shall they be. As Solomon did to his nobles, so shall David do to his nobles, and as Solomon ordained for his governors, so shall David order the direction of his kingdom.

These are the names of those who were appointed to be sent away to Ethiopia:

Azariah, the son of Zadok the priest, who was the High Priest;
Elyas, the son of Arni the Archdeacon (the father of Arni was the archdeacon of Nathan the Prophet);
Adram, the son of Arderones, leader of the people;
Fankera, the son of Soba, scribe of the oxen;
Akonhel, the son of Tofel, the youth;
Samneyas, the son of Akitalam, the recorder;
Fikaros, the son of Neya, commander of the armed men, chief of the troops;
Lewandos, the son of Akire, commander of the recruits;
Fakuten, the son of Adray, commander of the sea;
Matan, the son of Benyas, chief of the house;
Adaraz, the son of Kirem, master of decorations;
Dalakem, the son of Matrem, chief of the horse-soldiers;
Adaryos, the son of Nedros, chief of the foot-soldiers;
Awsteran, the son of Yodad, bearer of "the Glory";
Astarayon, the son of Asa, messenger of the palace;

Imi, the son of Matatyas, commander of the host;
Makri, the son of Abisa, judge of the palace;
Abis, the son of Karyos, assessor of tithes and taxes;
Lik Wendeyos, the son of Nelenteyos, judge of assembly;
Karmi, the son of Hadneyas, chief of the royal workmen;
Seranyas, the son of Akazel, administrator of the King's house.

These are all those who were given to David II (Menyelek I), King of Ethiopia, the son of Solomon, King of Israel. And Solomon also gave him horses, chariots, riding camels, mules, wagons for carrying loads, gold, silver and splendid apparel, byssus,¹ purple, gems, pearls and precious stones; and he gave his son everything that would be wished for in the country of Ethiopia.

Then they made ready to set out, and though there was great joy with the nobles of the King of Ethiopia, there was sadness with the nobles of the King of Israel, because through the firstborn son of Solomon, King of Israel, that is to say, the King of Ethiopia, the firstborn sons of the nobles of Israel were given to rule over the country of Ethiopia with the son of Solomon the King. Then they assembled together and wept, together with their fathers and their mothers, their kinsfolk and their peoples and their countrymen.

And they cursed the King secretly and reviled him because he had seized their sons against their will. But unto the King they said: "Because of this thou hast done well. Thy wisdom is so good that the Kingdom of Israel, by the Will of God and by thy wisdom, extendeth to the country of Ethiopia. And God will gather the other kingdoms of the world into thy hand for thou hast a right mind towards God, and thou wishest that they shall serve the God of Israel, and that idols may be destroyed out of the world."

And they praised him and said unto him: "Now know we that God spoke concerning thee to our father Abraham when He said: 'In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed'."² And they made their faces to appear happy, and they jested before him, and they praised him exceedingly because of his wisdom. But when they said these things unto him, he understood them in his wisdom, and bore with them patiently, as God beareth with us patiently knowing well all our sins.

And the whole earth, the heavens and the ends of the world, the sea and the dry land are the kingdom of God. He judgeth. And He hath given the earth to the King to be subject unto him, that he may judge those who do evil, and those who do good he may reward them with good. For the Spirit of God resteth in the heart of the king, and His hands are in his mind, and His knowledge is in his understanding.

42. THE KING MUST NOT BE REVILED

It is not a good thing to revile the king, for he is the anointed of God. It is neither seemly nor good. If he doeth that which is good he will not suffer loss in three kingdoms; first, God shall overthrow for him his enemy. Secondly, God shall make him reign with Him and with His righteousness, and shall make him to sit on His right hand. Thirdly, God shall make him to reign upon earth with glory and joy, and shall direct his kingdom for him, and shall bring down the nations under his feet. But if he treateth God lightly, and doth not do that which is good, and doth not himself walk in the path of uprightness, God shall work as He pleaseth against him; on earth He will make his days to be few, and in eternity his place of abode shall be the habitation of Sheol with the Devil; and on earth he shall enjoy neither health nor gladness and he shall live in fear and terror, without peace and with perturbation.

It is not a good thing for any of those who are under the dominion of a king to revile him, for retribution belongeth to God. But the priests are like the prophets, for mysteries are given unto them, so that they may hold upon the Sun of righteousness, whilst the Seraphim, who were created out of fire, are only able to lay hold upon the mysteries with fire-tongs. As for the priests He named them "salt," "lamp" and also "light of the world," and "the sun that lighteneth the darkness;" Christ the Sun of righteousness being in their hearts. And a priest who hath in him understanding rebuketh the king concerning the work that he hath seen; and that which he hath not seen God will enquire into, and there is none who can call Him to account. Moreover, the people must not revile the priests for they are the children of God and the men of His house, for which reason they must rebuke men for their sins and errors.

And thou, O priest, if thou seest sin in a well-known man, do not hesitate to rebuke him; let neither sword nor exile make thee afraid. And hear how angry God was with Isaiah because he did not rebuke King Uzziah. And hearken also concerning Samuel the prophet, how he rebuked Saul¹ the king, being in no way afraid of him, and how he rent his kingdom from him by his word; and hearken also how Elijah rebuked Ahab.²

So, fear not, and rebuke and teach him that transgresseth. And Israel from of old reviled their kings and provoked their prophets to wrath, and in later times they crucified their Saviour.

43. THE CONSPIRACY OF THE SONS OF THE NOBLES WHO ARE TO GO TO ETHIOPIA

And the children of the nobles of Israel, who were commanded to depart with the son of the king, took counsel together, saying: "What shall we do? For we must leave our country and our birthplace, and our family and the people of our city. Let us sorrow on account of our Lady Zion, because they are making us to leave her. For in her they have committed us to God, and we have served her to this day. It is because of her and our departure that they have specially made us to weep." And the others answered and said unto them: "Verily she is our Lady and our hope, and our object of boasting, and we have grown up under her blessings. And how is it possible for us to forsake Zion our Mistress? For we have been given to her. And what shall we do? If we resist his command the King will kill us, and we are unable to transgress the word of our fathers or the King's command. And what shall we do concerning Zion?"

¹I Samuel, Chapter 15

²I Kings, Chapter 17

Then Azariah, the son of Zadok the priest, answered and said: "I will counsel you what we shall do. But make a covenant with me to the end of your lives; and swear to me that ye will not repeat it whether we be taken captives or whether we go forth unhindered." And they swore an oath to him in the Name of the Lord God of Israel, and by the heavenly Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God, and by what God had promised unto Abraham, and by the purity and excellence of Isaac, and by His making Jacob to arrive in and inherit a land whereto he was a stranger, and his seed after him.

When they had sworn thus to him, he answered and said unto them: "Come now, let us take with us our Lady Zion. How are we to take her? I will show you. Carry ye out my plan and if God willeth we shall be able to take our Lady with us. And if they should gain knowledge of our doing and slay us, that shall not trouble us, because we shall die for our Lady Zion." And they all rose up, and they said unto him: "We will do everything that thou hast counseled us to do; whether we die or whether we live, we are with thee for the sake of our Lady Zion. If we die it will not cause us sorrow, and if we live the Will of God be done!" And one of them, the son of Benaiah, whose name was Zechariah, said: "I cannot sit down because of the great gladness that is in my heart.

Tell me, canst thou indeed carry her off and go into the House of God instead of thy father Zadok, with the keys in thy hand? Thou knowest the hidden window which King Solomon made, but none of the priests may enter therein except thy father once each year on the Day of Atonement, in order to offer up sacrifice in the Holy of Holies on behalf of himself and on behalf of the people. Ponder, consider, and sleep not in the matter of thy wish to carry away Zion. And we will depart with her as soon as she hath been committed to our care, and we shall have joy and our fathers sorrow when she arrives with us in the country of Ethiopia."

Azariah then said unto them: "Do ye what I tell you, and we shall succeed. Give ye to me ten didrachmas,¹ and I will give them to a carpenter so that he will make haste to prepare for me good planks of wood, because of his love of money he will fasten them together very quickly of the height, width, length and size of our Lady Zion. I will give him the dimensions myself, and I will say unto him: "Prepare for me pieces of wood for a framework so that I may make a raft for we are going to travel over the sea, and in the event of the ship sinking I shall be able to get up on the raft, and we shall be saved from the sea. I will take the framework without the pieces of wood being fixed together, and I will have them put together.

Then I will set them down in the habitation of Zion, and will drape them with the draperies of Zion, and I will take Zion, and will dig a hole in the ground and set Zion there, until we journey and take it away with us, but I will not tell the matter to the king until we have travelled far."

They each gave him ten didrachmas, and this money amounted to one hundred and forty didrachmas which he gave to a carpenter who fashioned a good piece of work from the remains of the wood of the house of the sanctuary, and Azariah rejoiced and showed it to his brethren.

44. THE PLOT TO REMOVE THE TABERNACLE OF ZION FROM THE TEMPLE IN JERUSALEM

While Azariah was asleep at night the Angel of the Lord appeared unto him, and said unto him: "Take four goats, each a yearling, they shall be for your sins; and four pure sheep, yearlings also, and an ox where on no yoke hath ever been laid. And thou shalt offer up the ox as a sacrifice on the east side of Zion, and the sheep and the goats to the right and left thereof, and to the west of it, which is close to its exit . And your Lord David (Menyelek) shall speak to Solomon the King and shall say unto him: 'One thing I ask from thee father, I would offer up a sacrifice to the holy city Jerusalem, and to my Lady Zion, the holy and heavenly Tabernacle of the Law of God.' And Solomon shall say unto him: 'Do so.' Then David shall say unto him: 'Let the son of the priest offer up sacrifice on my behalf, even as he knoweth'; and he will give thee the command, and thou shalt offer up the sacrifice.

And thou shalt bring forth the Tabernacle of the Law of God after thou hath offered up the sacrifice, and I will again show thee what thou shalt do in respect of bringing it out; for this is from God. For Israel hath provoked God to wrath, and for this reason He will make the Tabernacle of the Law of God to depart from them."

When Azariah awoke from his dream he rejoiced greatly and his heart and mind were clear. He remembered everything that the Angel of the Lord had shown him in the night, and how he had sealed him and given him strength and heartened him. So he went to his brethren and when they were gathered together he told them everything that the Angel of God had shown him; how the Tabernacle of the Law of God, and the kingdom of Solomon was to be seized by them, with the exception of two "rods," and how the kingdom of Israel was to be divided. Then Azariah said: "Rejoice with me. I rejoice because it has been shown to me thus; for the grace of their priesthood and kingdom shall depart with us, and it shall be by the will of God. Thus said the Angel unto me. Now, let us go and tell David our Lord so that he may say to his father, 'I will offer up a sacrifice'."

So they went and told David the son of Solomon and he rejoiced and he sent for Benaiah, that he might send him to his father, and he came. And David sent him to his father Solomon, and he said unto the king: "There is one petition which I would make unto thee, for I thy servant am going to depart, and wish to offer up a sacrifice of propitiation for my sins in this thy holy city of Jerusalem and of Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God. And peace be with thy majesty."

45. THE OFFERING OF AZARIAH AND THE KING

And Benaiah went and told King Solomon, and the King rejoiced over it and commanded them to make ready the altar of sacrifice so that his son might make his offering. And he brought and gave unto him that which he had vowed to God; one hundred bulls, one hundred oxen, ten thousand sheep, ten thousand goats, ten of every kind of animal that may be eaten and ten of every kind of clean bird, so that he might offer libations and sacrifices to the God of Israel; and twenty silver jugs of fine white flour, each weighing twenty shekels, and forty baskets of bread.

All these things did Solomon the King give unto his son David. Again David sent a message saying: "Let Azariah the priest offer up sacrifice on my behalf;" and Solomon said unto him: "Do that which thou wishest." And Azariah rejoiced because of this and he went and brought from his father's flock an ox whereon no yoke had ever been laid, and four yearlings of the goats and four clean yearlings of the sheep.

And the King went to offer up sacrifice, and the priests made themselves ready and the people were gathered together, and the birds of the heavens rejoiced and they were all united in their great gladness that day.

Then Azariah mingled his offerings with the offerings of the King and he made an offering with his vessels, even as the Angel of God had commanded him to do. After they had offered up their sacrifices they went back to their houses and slept.

46. HOW THEY REMOVED THE TABERNACLE OF ZION

And behold, the Angel of the Lord appeared again to Azariah and he stood up above him like a pillar of fire, and he filled the house with his light. And he raised up Azariah and said unto him: "Stand up, be strong and rouse up Elmeyas and Abis and Makri, and take the pieces of wood and I will open for thee the doors of the sanctuary. And take thou the Tabernacle of the Law of God, and thou shalt carry it without trouble and discomfort. And as I have been commanded by God to be with it forever, I will be thy guide when thou shalt carry it away."

Azariah rose up quickly and woke up the three men, his brethren, and they took the pieces of wood and went into the house of God (they found all the doors open, both those that were outside and those that were inside), to the actual place where Azariah found Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God; and it was taken by them forthwith, in the twinkling of an eye, the Angel of the Lord being present and directing.

Had it not been that God willed it, Zion could not have been taken away. And the four of them carried Zion away and they brought it into the house of Azariah, then they went back into the house of God and they set up the frame of wood on the place where Zion had been, and covered it over with the covering of Zion, and they shut the doors and went back to their houses. After this they took lamps and set them in the place where Zion was hidden, and they sacrificed the sheep and burned offerings of incense, then they spread purple cloths over it and set it in a secret place for seven days and seven nights.

47. HOW SOLOMON BLESSED HIS SON DAVID II

And then the King of Ethiopia rose up to depart to his country and he came to his father that he might pray on his behalf, and he said unto him: "Bless me, father," and he made obeisance unto him. And the King raised him up, blessed him and embraced him, and said: "Blessed be the Lord my God Who blessed my father David, and Who blessed our father Abraham. May He be with thee always, and bless thy seed even as He blessed Jacob and made his seed to be as many as the stars of heaven and the sand of the sea. And as Abraham blessed Isaac my father, even so shall thy blessing be as the dew of heaven and the spaciousness of the earth, and may all animals and all birds of the heavens, the beasts of the field and the fish of the sea, be in subjection unto thee. Be thou full, perfect and gracious, pure, righteous and merciful; not oppressive, not perverse and not prone to wrath. And the enemy shall be afraid of thee and thy adversaries shall cast themselves under the sole of thy feet. And my Lady Zion, the holy and heavenly, the Tabernacle of the Law of God, shall be a guide unto thee at all times; a guide in respect of what thou should think in thy heart and should do with thy fingers." And David was blessed, and he made obeisance and departed.

48. THE FAREWELL OF DAVID II; THE GRIEF OF THE PEOPLE

The Ethiopians bade the King farewell and departed; but first of all they had set Zion by night upon a chariot along with other common merchandise and stores of every sort and kind. When all the wagons were loaded, the masters of the caravan rose up and the horn was blown and the city became excited; the youth shouted loudly and awesomeness and grace crowned and surrounded Zion. And the old men wailed, the children cried out, the widows wept and the virgins lamented because the sons of their nobles, the mighty men of Israel had risen up to depart. But the city did not weep for them alone, but because the majesty of the city had been carried off with them. And although they did not know yet that Zion had been taken from them, they felt sorrow in their hearts and they wept bitterly; and they were then as when God slew the firstborn of Egypt, for there was not a house wherein there was not wailing, from man even to the beast; the dogs howled and the asses brayed, and all those who were left there mingled their tears together.

It was as though the general of a mighty army had besieged the great city and had captured it by assault and looted it, and taken its people prisoners and slain them with the edge of the sword; even thus was that city of Zion, Jerusalem.

King Solomon was dismayed at the weeping and outcry of the city, and he looked out from the roof of the palace, the fort of the King's house, and saw the whole city weeping and following them. And as a child whom his mother has removed from her breast and left, followeth in her footsteps crying out and weeping, even so did the people cry out and weep, and they cast dust upon their heads and shed tears with their eyes.

When Solomon saw the majesty of those who had departed, he was deeply moved and he trembled and his bowels quaked while his tears fell drop by drop upon his apparel, and he said: "Woe is me! For my glory hath departed and the crown of my splendour hath fallen. My belly is burned up because this my son hath departed, and the majesty of my city and the nobles, the children of my might, are removed. From this moment our glory hath passed away, and our kingdom hath been *carried off unto a strange people who know not God, even as the prophet said, 'The people who had not sought Me have found Me.'*¹ *From this time forth the law and wisdom and understanding shall be given unto them. And my father prophesied concerning them, saying: 'Ethiopia shall bow before Him, and His enemies shall eat the dust.'*¹ And in another place he said: 'Ethiopia shall stretch out her hands to God, and He shall receive her with honour, and the kings of the earth shall praise God.'² And again he said: 'Behold the Philistines,³ and the Tyrians, and the people of Ethiopia, who were born without the Law.

The Law shall be given unto them, and they shall call unto Zion, because of a man who shall be born.'⁴ Will this man then be my son who is begotten of me?"

49. DAVID II (MENYELEK I) RECEIVES THE COVERING OF THE TABERNACLE OF ZION

Then King Solomon said unto Zadok the priest: "Go, bring the covering that is upon Zion, and take this covering which is better than that one, and lay it over the two cherubs which are below it." This covering was made of threads of the finest gold wirework twisted together and hammered out into a pattern. "And the five mice which were given to Zion, and the ten figures of their shame, the emerods which the nobles of the Philistines made for their redemption (on the fringes are figures of gold that came forth from the land of Kades, which Moses in Sinai commanded should be made in the fringe of the apparel of Aaron his brother); gather all these together in the covering of Zion and give them to my son David. For his mother said in her message by Tamrin her servant: 'Fetch us some of the fringe of the covering of Zion, so that we may worship it, we and those who are in subjection unto us and all our kingdom.' And now, give it to him and say unto him: 'Take this covering of Zion, for thy mother sent a message concerning this, and had said unto thee thyself: 'Give us some of the fringe of its covering, which we can worship, so that we may not like the heathen worship another God.'

¹Psalms 72:9

²Psalms 68:31; 72:10

³Psalms 83:7

⁴Psalms 87:2-6

And Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God, shall be unto thee a guide wheresoever thou art. But it must remain with us perpetually although we have not paid it all the honour which is its due; and you, although it be not with you, must honour it and revere it according to what is due to it and what is true. For God said unto Eli by the mouth of Samuel the Prophet, 'I wished you to remain, thou and thy father's house, to offer up incense to the Tabernacle of My Law and to dwell before Me for ever, but now I have repented. I will turn My face away from thee because thou hast treated My offerings with contempt and hath preferred thy sons to Me. And now, him that honoureth Me I will honour, and him that esteemeth Me lightly I will esteem lightly also; and I will destroy all thy seed.'¹ This He said because the Levites had esteemed Him lightly. And say unto him: "Take this covering of Zion and place it in thy sanctuary, and when thou sacrificeth let thy face be towards us, and sacrifice to Jerusalem and the holy Zion; and when thou prayest let thy face be towards Jerusalem."

And Zadok the priest went and gave David the covering of Zion, and he delivered unto him all the commands which Solomon had spoken. And David, the son of Solomon, rejoiced exceedingly and said, when the covering of the Tabernacle of the Law of God was committed to his charge: "This shall be to me My Lady." And his father said unto him: "Verily he rejoiceth over the covering of Zion and he might subjugate all of us if he were not going back to his own country of Ethiopia."

Then they loaded the wagons, the horses and the mules in order to depart, and they set out on their journey and they continued to travel on. And Michael the Archangel marched in front and he spread out his wings and made them to march through the sea as upon dry land, and upon the dry land he cut a path for them and spreading himself out like a cloud over them he hid them from the fiery heat of the sun. And no man hauled his wagon, but whether it was men, horses, mules or loaded camels, each was raised above the ground to the height of a cubit²; and all those who rode upon beasts were lifted up along with the beasts to the height of one span of a man. And every one travelled in the wagons like a ship on the sea when the wind bloweth, like a bat though the air and like an eagle when his body glideth above the wind. Thus did they travel.

50. THE GIFT OF THE CHARIOT OF ZION TO ETHIOPIA

Then they halted by Gaza, the city of the mother of the King, which Solomon the King had given to the Queen of Ethiopia when she came to him. And from there they came in one day to the border of Gebes in Egypt, the name of which is "Mesrin." And when the sons of the warriors of Israel saw that they came in one day a distance of thirteen days march, and that they were not tired, hungry or thirsty, neither man nor beast, and that they all felt that they had drunk and eaten their fill, these sons of the warriors of Israel knew and believed that this thing was from God.

Then they said unto their king: "Let us let down the wagons, for we have come to the waters of Ethiopia. This is the Takkazi¹ which floweth down from Ethiopia and watereth the Valley of Egypt;" and they let down their wagons there, and set up their tents.

Then the sons of the warriors of Israel went and drove away all the people, and they said unto David their King: "We shall now tell thee and reveal unto thee a secret matter. . . The sun descended from heaven and was given on Sinai to Israel, and it became the salvation of the race of Adam from Moses to the seed of Jesse and behold, it is now with thee by the Will of God. It is not through us that this hath been done, but by the Will of God . . . by the Will of Him that fashioned it and made it, hath this happened. And now God hath chosen thee to be the servant of the holy and heavenly Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God; and it shall be a guide to thee for ever, to thee and to thy seed after thee. For thou wilt not be able to take it back even if thou wishest, and thy father cannot seize it, for it goeth of its own free will, and it cannot be removed from its place if it doth not desire it. And behold, it is our salvation, our fortress and our place of refuge, our glory and the shelter of our safety.

¹The river Nile

When Azariah had said this, King David was perturbed and he said: "Hast thou in truth, O Lord, remembered us in Thy Mercy... we the cast-aways, the people whom Thou hast rejected, so that I may see Thy pure habitation which is in heaven, the holy and heavenly Zion? How shall we thank the Lord in return for all the good things which He hath done for us? He hath crowned us with His grace so that we may know upon earth His praise and may serve Him according to His greatness. For He is the Good One to His chosen ones, and unto Him belongeth praise for ever."

Then King David rose up and skipped about like a young sheep and like a kid of the goats that had sucked milk in abundance from his mother, even as his grandfather David rejoiced before the Tabernacle of the Law of God.¹

He smote the ground with his feet and uttered cries of joy with his mouth... and great joy and gladness were in the camp of the King of Ethiopia. They struck the ground with their feet like young bulls; they clapped their hands together and marvelled; then stretching their hands up to heaven they cast themselves down with their faces to the ground and they gave thanks unto God in their hearts.

51. HOW THE PEOPLE OF ETHIOPIA REJOICED

And King David II (Menyelek I) came and stood up before Zion and he saluted it and made obeisance unto Zion, and said: "O Lord God of Israel, to thee be praise, because Thou doest Thy Will and not the will of men. Thou makest the wise man to forget his wisdom, and Thou destroyest the counsel of the counsellor. Thou raisest the poor man from the depth and Thou settest the sole of his foot upon a strong rock. For a full cup of glory is in Thy hand for those who love Thee, and a full cup of shame for those who hate Thee. As for us, our salvation shall go forth from Zion and He shall remove sin from His people, and goodness and mercy shall be poured out in all the world. For we are the work of His hands, and who shall rebuke us if He loveth us as Israel His people?

¹II Samuel 6:14-19

And who shall reprove Him if He raiseth us to heaven and His throne? For death and life are from Him, and glory and dishonour are in His hand; He hath the power to punish or to multiply His compassion."

After this, King David pondered, and said: "Behold Zion, behold salvation, behold the one who rejoiceth, the one adorned with splendour like the sun, behold the one decorated like a bride, not with the apparel of fleeting glory, but the one decorated with the glory and praise which are from God, for thou art the habitation of the God of heaven, the Lord of armies."

Thus spake David the King, Son of Solomon, King of Israel. For the Spirit of Prophecy descended upon him because of his joy, and he knew not what he said and he was like Peter and John on the top of Mount Tabar. And they all marvelled and said: "This, the son of a prophet, is to be numbered among the prophets!"

And the people of Ethiopia took flutes and blew horns, they beat drums and played on pipes, and the river of Egypt was moved and astonished at the sound of their songs and their rejoicings; and with them were mingled shouts and outcries of gladness. Then the idols which they had made with their hands and were in the forms of men, dogs, cats and high towers, also the figures of birds of gold and silver, they all fell down and were broken in pieces. For Zion shone like the sun, and at her majesty they were dismayed. Then they arrayed Zion in her apparel and they bore gifts before her, set her upon her chariot, spread out purple beneath her and they draped her richly and sang songs around her.

Then the wagons rose up and they set out early in the morning, and the people sang songs to Zion and they were all raised up the space of a cubit, and as the people of the country of Egypt bade them farewell, they passed before them like shadows, and those people worshipped them for they saw Zion moving in the heavens like the sun, and they all ran with the chariot of Zion, some in front and some behind her.

Then they came to Al-Ahmar which is in Eritrea at the Red Sea, the same which was divided by the hand of Moses and the children of Israel marched in the depths of it as on dry land. At that time the Tabernacle of the Law of God had not been given unto Moses, and therefore the water only gathered itself together, a wall on the right hand and a wall on the left, and allowed Israel to pass with their beasts and their children and their wives. After they had crossed the sea God spoke to Moses and gave him the Tabernacle of the Covenant with the Book of the Law.

When holy Zion crossed over with those who were in attendance and who sang songs to the music of harps and flutes, the sea received them and its waves leaped up and roared as a lion roareth when he is enraged, and it thundered as the winter thunder of Damascus and Ethiopia when the lightning striketh the clouds. The sea worshipped Zion, and their wagons were raised above the waves for a space of three cubits.

And there was joy at the sea of Eritrea, and the people of Ethiopia who went forth to the sea rejoiced exceedingly, with a greater joy than did Israel when they came out of Egypt. When they arrived opposite Mount Sinai and dwelt in Kades, they remained there while the angels sang praises and the creatures of the spirit-world mingled their praises with the children of earth, with songs, psalms and tambourines, joyfully.

Again they loaded their wagons and they rose up and departed, and journeyed on to the land of Medyam, and came to the country of Belontos which is a Kingdom of Ethiopia. Then they encamped there because they had reached the border of their country with glory and joy, without tribulation on the way, in a wagon of the spirit by the night of heaven and of Michael the Archangel. And all the provinces of Ethiopia rejoiced, for Zion sent forth a light like that of the sun into the darkness wherever she went.

52. ZADOK THE PRIEST DISCOVERS THAT THE TABERNACLE OF ZION HAS DISAPPEARED

When Zadok the priest returned to Solomon the King, he found him sorrowful. And the King said unto Zadok the priest: "When the Queen came, there appeared to me by night this vision: It seemed as if I were standing in the chamber of Jerusalem and the sun came down from heaven into the land of Judah, and lighted it up with great splendour and having tarried a time it went down and lighted up the country of the Negus, Ethiopia, and it did not return to the land of Judah. And again the sun came down from heaven to the country of Judah and lighted it up more brilliantly than it did the first time, but the Israelites paid no heed to it, and they plotted to extinguish its light. But it rose below the earth in a place where it was not expected, and it shined upon the country of Rome and the country of Ethiopia, and afterwards upon all those who believed on it."

Zadok the priest answered and said unto him: "O my Lord, why didst thou not tell me before that thou hadst seen a vision of this kind? Thou makest my knees to tremble. Woe be unto us if our sons have carried off our Lady, the holy, heavenly Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God!" And the King answered and said unto him: "Our wisdom is forgotten and our understanding is buried. Verily the sun that appeared unto me long ago when I was sleeping with the Queen of Ethiopia is the symbol of the holy Zion. But tell me, yesterday when thou didst take off the splendid covering that was lying upon Zion, didst thou make certain that Zion was there?" Zadok the priest answered and said: "I did not Lord; it had three coverings over it, and I took off the outermost one, and dressed Zion in the covering which thou gave to me, and I brought the other one to thee." King Solomon then said unto Zadok: "Go quickly and look at our Lady Zion and examine her closely." Zadok the priest took the keys and went and opened the house of the sanctuary, and he examined quickly, but he found there nothing except the wooden boards which Azariah had fastened together and had made to resemble the sides of Zion.

When Zadok saw this he fell forward on his face flat upon the ground, and his spirit was poured out from him, for he was terrified and became like a dead man. When he tarried in coming out, Solomon sent Benaiah to seek him, and he found Zadok like dead. Benaiah then lifted up the head of Zadok and felt for his heart and his nose to find out whether there was any sign of life in him, and he fanned him, lifted him up, rubbed him and laid him out upon a table. Then Zadok rose up and looked at the place where Zion had been set, and he found her not, and he again fell down upon the ground, and he cast dust upon his head, rose up and went out and wailed at the doors of the house of God; and the sound of his cries was heard as far as the King's palace.

King Solomon then rose up and commanded the herald to cry out and the soldiers to blow the trumpets so that the people might go forth and pursue the men of the land of Ethiopia, and if they overtook them they were to seize his son and bring him back with the Tabernacle Zion, and slay all the other men with the sword. For with his mouth he spoke thus: "As the Lord God of Israel liveth, they are men of death and not of life; for verily they deserve death because they have robbed the house of the sanctuary of God, and have desired to pollute the habitation of His Name in a land wherein there is not His Law."

53. HOW SOLOMON ROSE UP TO SLAY THEM

Thus spoke King Solomon. And the King rose up in wrath and set out to pursue the men of Ethiopia. When the King and his nobles and his mighty men of war rose up, the elders of Israel, the widows and the virgins gathered together in the house of God and they wept bitterly for Zion, for the Tabernacle of the Law of God had been taken from them.

Then the King commanded that the soldiers should go forth on the right and on the left, on the chance that some of the fugitives might turn aside through fear of the theft. And the King himself rose up and followed the track of the men on the road to Ethiopia, and he sent out mounted horsemen so that they might go ahead of him to find out where they were, and return and bring him news of them.

The horsemen journeyed on and came to the country of Egypt where the men of Ethiopia had encamped with their king. The soldiers of King Solomon questioned the people, and the men of the country of Egypt said unto them: "Some days ago certain men of Ethiopia passed here; they travelled swiftly in wagons, like the angels, and they were swifter than the eagles of the heavens." Then the King's soldiers said unto him: "How many days ago is it since they left you?" And the men of Egypt said unto them: "This day is the ninth day since they left us." And some of the King's horsemen who returned said unto King Solomon: "Nine days have passed since they left Egypt. Some of our companions have gone to seek for them at the Sea of Eritrea, but we came back so that we might report this to thee, O King. On the third day after they went forth they arrived at the river Takkazi in the land of Egypt; and we, being sent forth by thee from Jerusalem, arrived on the day of the Sabbath. Now we came back to thee today, the fourth day of the week. Consider in thy wisdom the distance which those men have travelled.” The King was angry and said: “Seize the five of them, until we find out the truth of their words.”

King Solomon and his soldiers marched quickly and they came to Gaza where the King asked the people: “When did my son leave you?” And they answered and said unto him: “He left us three days ago, and after loading their wagons none of them travelled on the ground, but their wagons were suspended in the air; they were swifter than the eagles that are in the sky, and all their baggage travelled with them in wagons above the winds. As for us, we thought that thou, in thy wisdom had made them to travel in wagons above the winds.”

Then the King said unto them: “Was Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God, with them?” And they said unto him: “We did not see anything.”

54. SOLOMON ARRIVES IN EGYPT

When King Solomon left that place he met one of the nobles of Egypt whom King Pharaoh had sent unto him with gifts; there was an abundance of treasures with him, and he came and made obeisance to the King. And Solomon the King made haste to question him even before he had presented his gift and credentials, and said unto him: “Hast thou seen men of Ethiopia fleeing by this route?” The ambassador of Pharaoh answered and said unto the King: “O King, live forever! My Lord, King Pharaoh sent me unto thee from Alexandria, and then I came to Cairo the city of the King, and on my arrival there, these men of Ethiopia of whom thou speakest arrived there also. They reached there after a passage of three days on the Takkazi, the river of Egypt, and they were blowing flutes, and they travelled on wagons like the host of the heavenly beings. And those who saw them said: ‘These, having once been creatures of earth, have become beings of heaven.' Who then is wiser than Solomon the King of Judah? But he never travelled in this manner in a wagon of the winds. And those who were in the cities and towns were witnesses that when these men came into the land of Egypt, our gods and the gods of the King fell down and were dashed in pieces, and the towers of the idols were likewise broken into fragments. And they asked the priests of the gods, the diviners of Egypt, the reason why our gods had fallen down, and they said unto us: 'The Tabernacle of the God of Israel, which came down from heaven, is with them and will abide in their country forever.' And it was because of this, when they came into the land of Egypt our gods were broken into fragments.

And thou O King, whose wisdom hath no counterpart under the heavens, why hast thou given away the Tabernacle of the Law of the Lord thy God, which thy father kept pure for thee? For, according to what we hear, that Tabernacle used to deliver you out of the hand of your enemies, and the Spirit of Prophecy, which was therein, used to hold converse with you, and the God of heaven dwells in it in His Holy Spirit, and ye are called men of the house of God. Why have ye given your glory to another?" Solomon answered in his wisdom and said: "How was David able to carry away our Lady Zion, for she is with us?"

55. SOLOMON'S LAMENT FOR THE TABERNACLE OF ZION

Solomon entered into his tent and wept bitterly, and said: "O God, hast Thou taken away the Tabernacle of Thy Covenant from us in my days? If only Thou hadst taken away my life before this which Thou hast taken away in my days ! For Thou cannot make Thy word to be a lie, and Thou cannot break Thy Covenant which Thou didst make with our fathers, with Noah Thy servant who kept righteousness, with Abraham who did not transgress Thy commandment, and with Isaac Thy servant who kept his body pure from the pollution of sin... with Israel Thy holy one, whom Thou didst call 'Thy people Israel,' and with Moses and Aaron Thy priests, in whose days Thou didst make the Tabernacle of the Law to come down from heaven upon earth, to the children of Jacob Thine inheritance, with Thy Law and Thy Commandments in the form of the constitution of the angels. For Thou hadst already made Zion as the habitation of Thy glory upon the mountain of Thy sanctuary. And again Thou didst give it to Moses that he might serve it nobly upon the earth and might make it to dwell in the 'Tent of Witness' so that Thou Thyself mightest come there from the mountain of Thy sanctuary and make the people to hear Thy voice so that they might walk in Thy Commandments .

Now I know that Thou regardest Thine inheritance more lightly than Thy people Israel. Until this time it was with us and we did not minister unto it correctly, and for this reason Thou art angry with us and Thou hast turned Thy face from me. O Lord, look not upon our evil deeds, but consider Thou the goodness of our forefathers.

My father David, Thy servant, wished to build a house to Thy Name, for he had heard the word of Thy prophet who said: 'Which is the house for my habitation, and which is the place for Me to rest in? Is it not My hands that have made all this, saith the Lord¹ Who ruleth everything?' It is impossible for thee to build this, but he who hath gone forth from thy loins shall build a house for me.² And now, O Lord, Thy word hath not been made a lie, and I have built Thy house, Thou being my guide. And when I had finished building Thy house, I brought the Tabernacle of the Covenant into it, and I offered up sacrifices to Thy most holy Name, and Thou didst look on these kindly. And the house was full of Thy glory, the whole world being filled with Thy Godhead, and we Thy people rejoiced at the sight of Thy glory therein.

This day it is three days since that time, and Thou hast snatched away Thy light from us that Thou mayest shine upon those that are in darkness. Thou hast removed our honour that Thou mayest honour those who are unworthy; Thou hast blotted out our majesty that Thou mayest make majestic him that is not majestic; Thou hast taken away our life that Thou mayest build up him whose life is far from Thee.

Woe is me! I weep for myself. Rise up David, my father, and weep with me for our Lady Zion, for God hath neglected us and hath taken away our Lady from thy son. Woe is me! Woe is me! For the sun of righteousness hath neglected me. Woe is me! For we have neglected the command of our God, and we have become rejected ones on the earth. As priests we have not acted well, and as kings we have not done what is right in respect of justice to the orphan. Woe be unto us! What is holy hath passed from us, and we are rebuked.

²I Corinthians 22:8-9

Our joy hath turned away to our enemies, and the grace that was ours hath been removed from us. Our back is turned towards the spears of our enemies. Woe be unto us! Our children have become the spoil and captives of those whom we recently had spoiled and made captives. Our widows weep and our virgins mourn. Woe be unto us! Our old men wail and our young men lament. Our women shed tears and our city is laid waste. From this day to the end of our days we shall mourn, and our children likewise, for the glory of the daughter of Zion is removed, and the glory of the daughter of Ethiopia, hath increased.

God is angry, and who shall show compassion? God hath made unclean, and who shall purify? God hath planned, and who shall overrule His plan? God speaketh, and everything shall come to pass. God hath taken away, and there is none who shall bring back. Our name was honoured, and today it is nothing. From being men of the household of God, we have become men of the outside, and from being men of the inner chambers we have been driven out through our sins. For God loveth the pure, but the priests would have none of the pure, and have loved the impure.

The prophets rebuked us, but we would not accept admonition, and they wanted to make us hear, but we would not hear. Woe be unto us! Through our sins we are rejected and because of our apostasy we shall be punished. Sovereignty profiteth nothing without purity, and judgment profiteth nothing without justice, and riches profit nothing without the fear of God. The priests love the words of fables more than the words of the scriptures; and they love the sound of the harp more than the sound of the Psalter¹; they love the praises of men more than prayer; and they love laughter and fornication more than the trials of life; they love wine and drink more than sacrificing to God. They love idleness more than prayer; they love to possess more than to give; and they love sleeping more than praising, dozing more than watching. Woe be unto us!

O Zion, we have been negligent in respect of the Commandment of God. We have loved the words of the fablemongers more than the words of the priests. We have wished to gaze upon the face of our women rather than upon the face of God in repentance. We have loved the word of foolishness more than the words of the wise, and we have loved the words of fools more than the words of the Prophets. Of our own free will we have polluted our life. The repentance and mercy which God loveth we have not done. He gave us glory and we have thrown it away; He made us very wise, and of our own free will we have made ourselves more foolish than the beasts. We have preferred the luxuriousness of food, which becometh dung, to the food of life which endureth for ever. Our governors and the people do what God hateth, and they love not what God loveth; love for their neighbours and meekness, graciousness, mercy for the poor, patient endurance and love of the house of God.

But what God hateth is idolatry, divination, magic and enquiry of witches, theft, oppression, fornication, envy, drunkenness, false swearing and the bearing of false testimony.

All these things which God hateth we have done. And it is because of these that God hath taken away the Tabernacle of His Covenant from us and hath given it to the people who do His Will and His Law. He hath turned His face from us and hath made His face to shine upon them. He hath despised us and hath loved them; He hath shown mercy unto them and hath blotted us out. For He hath sworn an oath by Himself that He will not take away winter and summer, seed time and harvest, fruit and work, sun and moon, as long as Zion is on the earth, and that He will not in wrath destroy heaven and earth, either by flood or fire, and that He will not blot out man, beast, reptiles and creeping things, but will show mercy to the work of His hands, and will multiply His mercy on what He hath formed. But when God taketh away the Tabernacle of His Covenant He will destroy the heavens and the earth, and all His work; and this day hath God despised us and taken from us the Tabernacle of His Law.”

As Solomon was saying these things he ceased not to weep, and the tears ran down his cheeks continually.

Then the Spirit of Prophecy answered and said unto him: “Why art thou sorrowful? For this hath happened by the Will of God. And Zion hath not been given to an alien... but to thy firstborn son who shall sit upon the throne of David thy father.

For God swore unto David in truth, and he repenteth not, that of the fruit of his body He would make to sit upon his throne forever, in the Tabernacle of His Covenant, the holy Zion. And I will set him above the kings of the earth, and His throne shall be like the days of heaven and like the ordinance of the moon forever.¹ And He Who sitteth upon the throne of the Godhead in the heavens shall rule the living and the dead in the flesh forever.

And angels and men shall serve Him, and every tongue shall praise Him, and every knee shall bow to Him in the heavens and upon the earth. Comfort thyself with this word and get back to thy house, and let not thy heart be sad.”

The King was comforted by these words and he said: “The Will of God be done, and not the will of man.” And again the Angel of God appeared unto him openly, and said unto him: “As for thyself, thou shalt build the house of God, and it shall be glory and support for thee; and if thou keep His Commandment and serve not other gods thou shalt be beloved by God, even as David thy father.”

56. SOLOMON'S RETURN TO JERUSALEM

When Solomon came back to the city of Jerusalem, he wept there with the elders of Jerusalem, a great weeping in the house of God. And after this the King and Zadok the priest embraced each other, and wept bitterly in the habitation of Zion, then they remained silent for a long time. Eventually the elders rose up and spoke unto the King, saying:

¹II Samuel 7:8-17

“Be not thou sorrowful concerning this thing, Our Lord, for we know, from first to last, that without the Will of God Zion will not dwell anywhere and that nothing happens without the Will of God.

Concerning Zion in olden times, in the days of Eli the priest, before our fathers had asked for a king, the Philistines carried away the Tabernacle of the Law of God and brought it into their city, and set it in the house of their god Dagon. And Dagon was broken to pieces and destroyed, and became like dust. Their land became a desert through mice which ate up all the fruit of their land and the people suffered boils and sores.

The Philistines then gathered together their priests, magicians and stargazers, and they said unto them: ‘How can we relieve ourselves of these sores and the tribulations which have come upon us, and upon our country?’ And those magicians meditated and withdrew themselves to be alone, and they brought their magical instruments, and pondered and considered, and planned how they could relieve them from the tribulation of their city and their persons. They discovered that this punishment had come upon them and their city because of Zion.

Then they went to their kings and their governors, and they said unto them: ‘All things have befallen you through the heavenly Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God. And now, this is how ye will take her back into her city, and her country and her house. By no means send her away empty, but give her an offering so that she may forgive you your sins, and cast away your tribulations when she is returned to her city. But if ye will not send her back to her city, no good will come by forcing her to live with you, but ye shall continue to be punished until ye are destroyed.’

The king and the governors then said unto their priests: ‘What gift ought we to give her, and how shall we send her back? Find out and tell us what we must do.’ And the priests of the Philistines took counsel together again, and they said unto their king and unto their governors: ‘Make for her according to the heads of your houses, sixty images of mice in gold, since mice have destroyed our land, and sixty images of the member of a man, since your own persons have suffered from sores and boils on your members.’¹

¹I Samuel, Chapters 4, 5, 6

And the Philistines made as they commanded them one hundred and twenty offerings of gold, and gave them to Zion. And again the magicians of the Philistines said unto them: "Let them bring two she-camels¹ that brought forth their firstborn at the same time, and let them attach a chariot² to them. Keep back their young ones and shut them up in the house; then yoke the two she-camels together and set them free and let them go where they will. If they march straight for Jerusalem we shall know that God hath had compassion on our land; but if they wander about, and wish to return to the place whence they started, then we shall know that God is still wroth with us, and that he will not remove His punishment until He hath blotted out ourselves and our city."

The Philistines did as the priests commanded their governors, and they sent away Zion, and prostrated themselves before her. And those camels made their way straight to the country of Judah, and they came to the threshing floor and the house of thy people did receive them. But those who did not receive them were the men of the house of Dan, and they did not do homage to Zion for they regarded her in anger as their desecrated God.

So they cut up the pieces of wood of the wagon and made those camels to be sacrifice, but Zion returned to her place, and whilst Zion was in her house Samuel the Prophet ministered unto her, and vision and prophecy were revealed unto him, and he pleased God in all his actions, and he ruled Israel for forty-eight years.

After him our people entreated God to give them a king like the nations that were round about them. And Samuel the Prophet anointed Saul the king, and he reigned forty years; he was of the tribe of Benjamin, which was the youngest branch of the peoples of Israel. Samuel the Prophet also anointed thy father David and when the Philistines fought with Saul the king, Saul was conquered and died with Jonathan his son.

Those of Saul's sons who were left wished to carry away Zion, when they knew that their father and their brother were dead. And then when they wished to hide her and to transfer her to the valley of Gilboa in order that thy father David might not carry her off, she would not let them carry her away until thy father came and carried her away from their city, but not with offerings nor with incense and burnt offerings. For it was impossible to carry Zion away unless she wished it and God wished it.

And again, when thy father reigned over Israel, he took her from the city of Samaria and brought her here to Jerusalem, dancing on his feet before her, and clapping his hands because of joy for her; for she was taken by him so that she might come to the city of David thy father.

As for that which thou sayest concerning the going of Zion to the country of Ethiopia, if God willed it, there is no one who could prevent it; for of her own will she went, and of her own will she will return if God pleaseth. And if she does not return it will be God's good pleasure... and as for us, if God hath willed it Jerusalem shall remain to us wherein thou hast built for us a house of God.

So now, let not thine heart be sad, but comfort thyself with what we have said unto thee; and the wisdom which the Lord God of Israel hath given thee, hath sprouted from thee. For wisdom is a strange thing. As a lamp is not the sun, and as vinegar and aloes are neither profitable nor useful additions to honey, even so the words of fools are not beneficial to the wise man. And as smoke is to the eye, and an unripe fruit to the tooth, even so the words of fools are not beneficial to the wise."

57. THE ELDERS OF ISRAEL KEEP THE DEPARTURE OF ZION A SECRET

Solomon the King answered and said unto them: "Hearken ye unto me and unto what I shall say unto you: Supposing He had taken me away whilst I was carrying Zion, what is impossible to God? And supposing He were to make them to inherit our city, and destroy us; what is impossible to God? For everything is His and none can overcome His Will, and there is none who can oppose His command in heaven above or on earth below. He is the King Whose kingdom shall never, never pass away. But now let us go and kneel in the House of God."

And the elders of Israel together with their King went into the House of God, and they entered the Holy of Holies, and they made supplication and prostrated themselves, and ascribed blessing to God.

Then Solomon wept in the habitation of the heavenly Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God, and they all wept with him, and after a little while they held their peace. King Solomon then said unto them: "Cease ye, so that the uncircumcised people may not boast themselves over us, and say: 'Their glory is taken away, and God hath forsaken them.' Reveal ye not anything else to alien folk. Let us set up these boards which are here nailed together, and let us cover them over with gold, and let us decorate them after the manner of our Lady Zion, and let us lay the Book of the Law inside it.

Jerusalem, the free, that is in the heavens above us, which Jacob our father saw, is with us, and below it is the Gate of Heaven, this Jerusalem on earth. If we do the Will of God and His good pleasure, God will be with us and will deliver us out of the hand of our enemy, and out of the hand of all those who hate us... God's Will and not our will be done.

Through this He hath made us sorrowful. From now on, His wrath will cool in respect of us, and He will not abandon us to our enemies, and He will not remove His mercy far from us; He will remember the covenant with our fathers Abraham, and Isaac and Jacob. He will not make His word to be a lie, and will not break His Covenant so that our father's seed be destroyed."

And then the elders of Israel answered and said unto him: "May thy good pleasure be done, and the good pleasure of the Lord God! As for us, none of us will transgress thy word, and we will not inform any other people that Zion hath been taken away from us." And they established this covenant in the House of God the elders of Israel with King Solomon unto this day. And Solomon lived for eleven years after the taking away of Zion from him, and then his heart turned aside from the love of God, and he forgot his wisdom, through his excessive love of women.

Solomon loved greatly the daughter of Pharaoh the king of Egypt, whose name was Makshara, and he brought her into the house which he had made. In the roof thereof, there were figures of the sun, moon and stars, and it was illumined by night as brightly as by day. Its beams were made of brass and its roof of silver; and its floor was of blocks of sapphire stone and sardius, with its walls of lead and red and black stones. He used to go and dwell therein through his love for his house and for his wife Makshara, the daughter of Pharaoh, King of Egypt.

Queen Makshara possessed certain idols which her father had given her to bow down before, and because when Solomon saw her sacrificing to them and worshipping them, he did not rebuke her or forsake her, God was wroth with him and made him to forget his wisdom. But she multiplied her sacrifices and her worship, also her folly according to the stupidity of the Egyptians... and all the people of her house worshipped the statues and learned the foolish service of idols. Enjoying the pleasure of their ignorance, they worshipped with the daughter of Pharaoh, and the children of Israel joined themselves unto that woman and her handmaidens in the worship of idols.

Solomon himself found pleasure hearing their folly. And when she saw that he loved her and held his peace, and asked many questions about the gods of the Egyptians, she made herself exceedingly agreeable to him, and she spoke to him with honeyed words, with the tender speech of women and the sweet smile that goes with the doing of an evil deed, with the turning of the face and the assumption of a look of good intent, and with the nodding of the head.

With actions of this kind she caused his heart to turn away from his God, and she enticed him to the evil of her work, wishing to drag him down into the folly of the foolish service of idols. And as the deep sea draweth down into its depths the man who cannot swim, until the water overwhelms him and destroys his life, even so did that woman wish to submerge Solomon the King.

MUSLIM DOME OF THE ROCK MOSQUE

(Muslim Shrine), Jerusalem

The third most holy site of the Muslim faith, built over the exact spot where Solomon's temple stood on Temple Mount (Mount Moriah) during the rule of the Omayyad Caliphs (660-750 AD). Of the 36 mosques now in Jerusalem, the Dome of the Rock Mosque is at the centre of an historic-religious controversy with the Jewish faith. Built over the spot where the Prophet Mohammed was presumably caught up to heaven, it is the only location where the Temple of God can be erected again.

THE WESTERN WALL or 'WAILING WALL'

Last remaining vestige of the Herodian Temple in Jerusalem (Second Temple). Destroyed in 70 AD by the Roman legions under General Titus, the Second Temple was inferior to the First (Solomonic) Temple because of the absence of the Ark of the Covenant. Today it is a centre of Jewish worship and lamentation in remembrance of Israel's glorious past, and a rallying point for those who look forward to the rebuilding of the Holy Temple and the re-establishment of Israel's biblical grandeur.

PART IV

The Fall of Israel

When the chief priests therefore and officers saw him, they cried out, saying Crucify him, crucify him.

John 19.6

58. HOW THE DAUGHTER OF PHARAOH SEDUCED SOLOMON

Then the daughter of Pharaoh appeared before Solomon and said unto him: "It is good to worship the gods like my father and all the kings of Egypt who were before my father did." Solomon answered and said unto her: "They call gods the things which have been made by the hands of the worker in metal, by the carpenter, the potter, the painter, the sculptor... these are not gods, but the work of the hand of man, in gold, silver, stone, lead, iron and clay. . . and ye call 'our gods' the things that are not gods. But we worship none else than the Holy God of Israel and our Lady, the holy and heavenly Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God, whom He hath given us to worship, we and our seed after us."

And she answered and said unto him: "Thy son hath carried away Zion, thy son whom thou hast begotten, who springeth from an alien people into which God hath not commanded you to marry, from an Ethiopian woman, who is not of thy colour, not akin to thy country, and who is, moreover, black."

And Solomon answered and said unto her: "Art thou not thyself of that race concerning which God hath not commanded us that we should take wives from? And thy race is her race, for ye are all the children of Ham.¹ And God, having destroyed of the seed of Ham seven kings, hath made us to inherit this city, that we and our seed after us may dwell therein for ever. As concerning Zion, the will of God hath been performed, and He hath given her unto them so that they may worship her. As for me, I will neither worship nor sacrifice to thine idols, and I will not perform thy wish."

One day she beautified and scented herself for him, and she behaved herself haughtily towards him and treated him disdainfully. And he said unto her: "What shall I do? Thou hast made thy face evil towards me, and not as it was before, and thy beautiful form is not as enticing as usual. Ask me, and I will give thee whatsoever thou wishest, and I will perform it for thee, so that thou mayest make thy face gracious towards me as former," but she held her peace and answered him not a word.

¹Genesis 5:32, 9:20-27

And he repeated to her the words that he would do whatsoever she wished. And then she said unto him: "Swear to me by the God of Israel."

He swore to her that he would give her whatsoever she asked for, and that he would do for her everything that she told him. And she tied a scarlet thread on the middle of the door of the temple of her gods, and she brought three locusts and set them in the house of her gods. And she said unto Solomon: "Come to me without breaking the scarlet thread, bend thyself and kill these locusts before me and pull out their heads." And he did so. And she said unto him: "I will henceforward do thy will, for thou hast sacrificed to my gods and hast worshipped them." He had done thus because of his oath so that he might not break his oath which she had made him to swear, even though he knew that it was a sin to enter into the house of her gods.

God had commanded the children of Israel, saying: "Ye shall not marry strange women, that ye may not be corrupted by them through their gods, and through the wickedness of their works and the sweetness of their voices; for they make so the hearts of simple young men by the sweetness of their gentle voices, and by the beauty of their forms they destroy the wisdom of the foolish man." Who was wiser than Solomon? Yet he was seduced by a woman. Who was more righteous than David? Yet he was seduced by a woman. Who was handsomer than Amnon? Yet he was seduced by Tamar the daughter of David his father.¹ And Adam was the first creation of God, yet he was seduced by Eve his wife; and through that seduction death came for every created being.

59. THE SIN OF SOLOMON

Solomon sinned an exceedingly great sin through the worship of idols, and from being a wise man he became a fool, and his sin is written down in the Books of the Prophets. . . but God had mercy on Solomon for this error which is written down as his sin, and his name is numbered with Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and David his father in the book of life in heaven. For God is a forgiver of those who have sinned. Which was the greater of the two, the sin of his father David or the sin of his son Solomon? David caused Uriah to be slain in battle by means of a plan of deceit so that he might take his wife Bathsheba, who became the mother of Solomon; but he repented and God had compassion on him.

¹II Samuel 3:2; I Chronicles 3:1

60. CONCERNING THE PROPHECY OF CHRIST

According to the interpretation of prophecy, the name Solomon signifieth in the secret speech “Christ.” Solomon built the house of God, and Christ raised up His body and made it into the Church. And when He said unto the Jews: “Throw down this house, and in three days I will build it up again.”¹ He was speaking to them of the house of His Body.

And as Solomon multiplied wives from alien peoples because of their beauty and winsomeness, and desires arose in him because of his love for them, so Christ gathered together from alien peoples those who had not the Law, but who believed on Him. And there was no uncircumcised man to him, no pagan, no slave, no Jew, no servant and no free man;² but he gathered them all into His heavenly kingdom by His Flesh and Blood.

In the Song of Songs, Solomon himself sang and said: “There are sixty mighty men round about the bed of Solomon, all of them trained in war and holding swords, each man with his sword upon his thigh.”³ The number sixty indicateth the number of righteous Patriarchs, the Prophets, Apostles, Martyrs, Believers and Saints who have resisted the war of Satan.

The word “sword” is, being interpreted, the word of the Scriptures. The word of the Lord cutteth like a straight, sharp sword, and in like manner the Scriptures cut from men’s hearts the danger caused by deceitful fables and imaginings.

Again Solomon sang, saying: “King Solomon hath made a chariot for himself,”⁴ and these words are to be interpreted that Christ did put on

¹John 2: 19

²Galatians 3:28

³Songs of Solomon 3:7-8

⁴Songs of Solomon 3:9

our body. The name Solomon in the language of the Hebrews is, being interpreted, “Christ.” And the foolish Jews imagine that the words of David: “The Lord said unto me, ‘Thou art my son and this day I have begotten thee’,”¹ were spoken concerning Solomon his son.

“O God, give Thy judgment to the King, and Thy righteousness to the son of the King, so that he may judge Thy people with righteousness and Thy needy ones with justice. And he shall live and they shall give him of the gold of Arabia, and shall pray for him continually, and shall follow him with good words, and he shall be a support for the whole earth on the tops of the mountains, and his fruit shall be greater than the cedar, and he shall flourish in the city like the grass of the earth, and his name shall be before the sun.² I have brought thee forth from the belly before the Morning Star.³ God hath sworn, and He will not repent, thou art His priest for ever, after the appointment of Melchizedek.”⁴

Concerning this prophecy and others like it, which David prophesied concerning Christ, the foolish Jews who are blind of heart, say that what David said was spoken concerning his son Solomon; this do the Jews say, and they make Christ to be Solomon because of the similarity of name and the wisdom, and because He was the Son of David in the flesh. And although those who came after David and Solomon, namely Elijah and Elisha, knew this, they ascribed Solomon’s sin to him in the Book of Kings in order that they might put to shame the Jews, who are binded in heart and are the enemies of righteousness.

Solomon the King, the son of David the King and Prophet, was himself also King and Prophet, and he prophesied many similarities concerning Christ and concerning the Church, and he wrote four books of prophecy, and is numbered with Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and David his father in the Kingdom of the heavens.

61. THE DEATH-LAMENT OF SOLOMON

Solomon was sixty years old when a sickness attacked him. And his days were not as the days of David his father, but they were twenty years shorter than his, because he was under the sway of women and

¹Psalm 2:7

²Psalm 72:1-5

³Rev. 2:28; 22:16; II Peter 1:19

⁴Psalm 110:4

worshipped idols. And the Angel of Death came and smote him in the foot, and he wept and said: "O Lord God of Israel, I am conquered by the terrestrial law, for there is no one free from blemish before Thee, O Lord, and there is no one righteous and wise before Thee, O Lord. For Thou dost scrutinize and try the heart. Nothing is hidden from Thee. Thou lookest upon the hidden things as if they were revealed and Thou searchest out the heart. Have mercy upon me Lord. And if Thou hast mercy upon the righteous who have not transgressed Thy commandments, what is there wonderful in Thy mercy? But if Thou shouldst show mercy upon me, a sinner, Thy mercy would be a marvellous and gracious thing. And although I have sinned, remember Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob my fathers who did not transgress Thy commandments. Have mercy upon me, Lord, for the sake of David Thy servant.

O Master of the world, and of kings and governors, O Thou who makest fools to be wise, and the wise to be fools, have mercy upon me, Lord." And as he spoke these words tears streamed down his face.

Then the Angel of God went down to him and said unto him: "Hearken thou unto what I shall say unto thee, for the sake of which God hath sent me. From being a wise man thou hast turned thyself into a fool, and from being a rich man thou hast turned thyself into a poor man, and from being a king thou hast turned thyself into a man of no account, through transgressing the commandment of God. The beginning of thy evil was the taking of many wives by thee, for through this thou didst transgress His Law and the ordinance of God which Moses wrote and gave to you, to Israel, that ye should not marry wives from alien peoples but only from your nation and the house of your fathers, that your seed might be pure and holy and that God might dwell with you.

But thou didst hold lightly the Law of God, thinking that thou wast wiser than God, and that thou wouldst get many male children. Ah, but the foolishness of God is wiser than the wisdom of men, and He hath only given thee three sons; the one who carried off thy glory into an alien land, and made the habitation of God to be in Ethiopia; the one who is lame of foot, who shall sit upon thy throne for the people of Israel, he, the son of thy wife Tarbana of the house of Judah; and the one who is the son of a Greek woman, a handmaiden, who in the last days shall destroy Rehoboam and all thy people Israel... and this land shall be his because he believeth in Him that shall come, the Saviour.

Then the tribe of Rehoboam,¹ and those who are left of Israel shall crucify Him that shall come, the Redeemer, and the memory of you shall be blotted out from the earth. For they shall think out a plan which they shall not be able to establish, and He will be wroth with them and blot out the memorial of them.

And as for thee, Joseph the son of Jacob shall be a symbol of thee. For his brethren sold him into the land of Egypt from Syria, the country of Laban, and on his going down into the land of Egypt there arose a famine in all the world. And through his going down he called his people and delivered them from famine and gave them an habitation in the land of Egypt, the name thereof is Goshen. For he himself was king under Pharaoh, King of Egypt.

Similarly, the Saviour Who shall come from thy seed shall set thee free by His coming, and shall bring thee out of Sheol,² where until the Saviour cometh thou shalt suffer pain, together with thy fathers; and He will bring thee forth. For from thy seed shall come forth a Saviour Who shall deliver thee, thee, and those who were before thee, and those who shall come after thee, from Adam to His coming in the tribe of Judah, and He shall make thee to go forth from Sheol as Joseph delivered his people from the famine, so also shall the Saviour bring out of Sheol, you who are His people. And as the Egyptians had made the kinsmen of Joseph slaves, so also have the devils made you slaves through the error of worshipping idols.

And as Moses brought his people out of the slavery of Egypt, so shall the Saviour bring you out of the servitude of Sheol. And as Moses wrought ten miracles and plagues before Pharaoh the King, so the Saviour Who shall come from thy seed shall work ten miracles for life before thy people. And as Moses, after he had wrought the miracles, smote the sea and made the people to pass over as on dry land, so the Saviour Who shall come shall overthrow the walls of Sheol and bring thee out. And as Moses drowned Pharaoh and the Egyptians in the Sea of Eritrea, so shall the Saviour drown Satan and his devils in Sheol; for the sea is to be interpreted as Sheol (doom), and Pharaoh as Satan, and his hosts of Egyptians as devils.

¹The tribe of Judah

²The unknown region; Hades; Hell

Then as Moses fed them with manna in the desert without toil, so shall the Saviour feed you with the food of Paradise forever. And as Moses made them to dwell in the desert for forty years without their apparel becoming worn out, or the soles of their feet becoming torn, so the Saviour shall make you to dwell without toil after the Resurrection. And as Joshua brought them into the Land of Promise, so shall the Saviour bring you into the Garden of Delight.

And as Joshua slew the seven kings of Canaan, so shall the Saviour destroy sinners and shut them up in the fortress of Sheol.”

62. THE PEARL AND THE SAVIOUR

“And behold, there shall be unto thee a sign that the Saviour shall come from thy seed, and that He shall deliver thee with thy fathers and thy seed after thee by His coming.

*Your salvation was created in the belly of Adam in the form of a pearl before Eve.*¹ And when He created Eve out of the rib He brought her to Adam, and said unto them: ‘Multiply you from the belly of Adam.’ The Pearl did not go into Cain or Abel, but into the third that went forth from the belly of Adam, and it entered into the belly of Seth. Then passing from him, that Pearl went into those who were the firstborn, and came to Abraham. And it did not go from Abraham into his firstborn Ishmael, but it tarried and went into Isaac, the pure. And it did not go into his firstborn, the arrogant Esau, but it went into Jacob the lowly one. And it did not enter from him into his firstborn, the erring Reuben, but into Judah, the innocent one... and it did not go forth from Judah until four sinners had been born, but it came to Perez, the patient one.

Then from him this Pearl went into the firstborn until it came into the belly of Jesse, the father of thy father, and then it waited until six men of wrath had been born, and after that it came to the seventh, David, thy innocent and humble father; for God hateth the arrogant and proud, and loveth the innocent and humble.

The Pearl then waited in the loins of thy father until five erring fools had been born, then it came into thy loins because of thy wisdom and understanding. And then the Pearl waited and it did not go into thy firstborn, for those good men of his country neither denied Him nor crucified Him, like Israel thy people... but when they saw Him Who wrought miracles and Who was to be born from the Pearl, they believed on Him when they heard the report of Him.

And the Pearl did not go forth into thy youngest son Adramis... for those good men neither crucified Him nor denied Him when they saw the workings of miracles and wonders by him that was to be born from the Pearl, and afterwards they believed in Him through His disciples.

Now the Pearl, which is to be thy salvation, went forth from thy belly and entered into the belly of thy son Rehoboam, because of the iniquity of Israel thy people, who in their denial and in their wickedness crucified Him. But if He had not been crucified He could not have been your salvation... for He was crucified without sin, and He rose up again without corruption. And for the sake of this He went down to you into Sheol, and tore down its walls, that He might deliver you and bring you out and show mercy upon all of you.

Ye in whose bellies the Pearl shall be carried, shall be saved with your wives and none of you shall be destroyed, from your father Adam unto him that shall come... and from Eve thy mother, the wife of Adam, to Noah and his wife Tarmiza, to Terah and his wife Aminya, unto Abraham and his wife Sarah, to Isaac and his wife Rebecca and to Jacob and his wife and to Yahuda and his bride Tamar, and thy father and his wife Bathsheba and to thyself and Tarbana thy wife, and to Rehoboam thy son and his wife Amisa, and to Jochim thy kinsman, who is to come, and his wife Hanna."

"None of you who shall have carried the Pearl shall be destroyed, whether it be your men or your women... those who shall have carried the Pearl will not be destroyed. For the Pearl shall be carried by the men who shall be righteous, and the women who have carried the Pearl shall not be destroyed, for they shall become pure through that Pearl, for it is holy and pure, and by it they shall be made holy and pure...because for its sake and for the sake of Zion He hath created the whole world.

Zion hath taken up her abode with thy firstborn Menyelek, and she shall be the salvation of the people of Ethiopia for ever; and the Pearl shall be carried in the belly of Rehoboam thy son, and shall be the Saviour of all the world. And when the appointed time hath come this Pearl shall be born of thy seed, for it is exceedingly pure, seven times purer than the sun. And the Redeemer shall come from the seat of His Godhead, and shall dwell upon her, and shall put on her flesh.

I am Gabriel the Angel, the protector of those who shall carry the Pearl from the body of Adam even to the belly of Hanna, so that I may keep from servitude and pollution you wherein the Pearl shall dwell. And Michael hath been commanded to direct and keep Zion wheresoever she goeth, and Uriel shall direct and keep the wood of the thicket¹ which shall be the Cross of the Saviour. And when thy people in their envy have crucified Him, they shall rush upon His Cross because of the multitude of miracles that shall take place through it, and they shall be put to shame when they see its wonders.

In later times a descendant of thy son Adramis shall take the wood of the Cross, the third means of salvation that shall be sent upon the earth. The Angel Michael is with Zion... with Menyelek thy firstborn, who hath taken the throne of David thy father; and I am with the pure Pearl for Him that shall reign for ever, with Rehoboam thy second son. . . and the Angel Uriel is with thy younger son Adramis. This have I told thee, and thou shalt not make thy heart to be sad because of thine own salvation and that of thy son."

When Solomon had heard these words his strength came back to him on his bed, and he prostrated himself before the Angel of God, and said: "I give thanks unto the Lord, O thou radiant being of the spirit, because thou hast made me to hear words which filleth me with gladness, and because He doth not cut off my soul from the inheritance of my father because of my sin, and my soul shall be with the soul of David my father, and with the soul of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob my fathers. As for my children they shall have upon earth three mighty angels to protect them.

Who is like unto God, the Merciful, Who showeth mercy to His handiwork and glorifieth it, Who forgiveth the sins of the sinners and Who doth not blot out the memorial of the penitent? His whole Person is forgiveness and mercy, and to Him belongeth praise."

63. THE CONVERSATION OF SOLOMON WITH THE ANGEL

Then Solomon turned and looked at the Angel, stretched out both his hands, and said: "My Lord, is the coming of the Saviour of which thou speaketh near or far off?" And the Angel answered and said unto him: "He will come three and thirty generations from thy seed, and will deliver you. But Israel will hate their Saviour and will be envious of Him because He will work signs and miracles before them. And they will crucify Him, and will kill Him, but He shall rise up again and deliver them, for He is merciful to the penitent and good to those who are His chosen ones. Behold, I tell you plainly that He will not leave in Sheol His people Israel by whom the Pearl hath been carried."

When the Angel of the Lord had spoken these words unto Solomon, he said unto him: "Peace be unto thee." And Solomon answered and said unto him: "My Lord, I beseech thee, I would ask thee one question; be not unheeding of my cry." And the Angel said unto him: "Speak, ask me thy question, and I will make thee to know what I have heard and seen." And Solomon said unto him: "I am grieved because of Israel, His people, whom He hath chosen as His firstborn from among all the ancient tribes of His inheritance; tell me, will they be blotted out after the coming of the Saviour?" And the Angel of God answered him again and said unto him: "Yea, I have told thee that they will crucify the Saviour. And when they have poured out His blood on the wood of the Cross they shall be scattered all over the world." And Solomon said: "I weep for my people. Woe to my people who from first to last have always provoked their Creator to wrath. I and those who have been before me are unworthy to have mercy shown unto us because of the evil of our works, for we are a faithless generation. Woe unto those who shall pour out innocent blood and slander a righteous man, and divide his spoil, and who neither believe in His word nor walk in His commandments!

Their judgment is waiting and their error abideth. Great is their punishment for their work is sin and they shall be destroyed by that which they themselves have imagined."

After this, Solomon turned to his son Rehoboam, and said unto him: "O my son, withhold thyself from evil and do the things that are good, so that thou mayest have many days upon earth. And do not bow down to strange gods, and do not worship them, but fear and honour God only, so that thou mayest conquer thy foes and thy adversaries, and mayest inherit the habitation of thy father in the heavens, and eternal life."

And he said unto him: "Write my name in the roll of the book and lay it in the box." Then he said unto Zadok the priest: "Anoint my son and make him king. As my father David, my Lord, made me king whilst he was alive; even so do I make my son Rehoboam king. And his seed shall be the salvation of myself and of my fathers for ever, according to what the Angel of the Lord spoke unto me."

64. THE REIGN OF REHOBAM

Then Zadok the priest took Rehoboam and made him king, and he anointed him and performed for him whatsoever the Law demanded. And Rehoboam laid a tablet of wood upon the Tabernacle with the name of his father Solomon written upon it, and then they set him upon the king's mule, and said unto him: "All Hail! Long live the royal father!" and the city resounded with cries, and the trumpet was blown. And before Rehoboam could return to his father, Solomon died.

And they laid Solomon in the tomb of his father David, and they mourned for him with great mourning, for there was not found his like in wisdom in those days.

When seven days had passed Rehoboam made the mourning for his father to cease. And the people of Israel gathered themselves together to Rehoboam, and they said unto him: "Lighten for us our labour, for thy father made it very heavy in the hewing of wood, in the dressing of stone, and in making wagons for bringing down cedar wood." And Rehoboam took counsel with the councillors and the elders of the house of the king, and they said unto him: "Answer them graciously, for at this time thou art like a young animal and thy loins are not yet strong. Speak unto them graciously and say unto them: 'I will do for you everything ye wish.' And when thy hand hath gotten power over them, thou can do with thy people what thou wishest."

Rehoboam then drove out the elders and brought in the foolish young men who had been brought up with him, and he took counsel with them, and told them of the message which the House of Israel had sent to him, and what the elders of the house of the king had counselled him to do. And those foolish young men said unto him: "An aged man giveth the counsel of an aged man, the elder giveth the counsel of an elder, but a young man like thyself giveth the counsel of youth. As for these men who are stricken in years, their loins are as tender as those of a young animal that cannot walk. Concerning this matter of which thou speakest... who can dispute the command of our Lord the King!"

Then one of them leaped up into the air before Rehoboam, and another drew his sword while another brandished his spear, and another seized his bow and quiver. Then when they had made an end of their playing they counselled him saying: "O our Lord, may we be with thee, and thou with us! Thy father in his wisdom gave us the sons of the mighty men of Israel who are learned in the art of war, to grow up with thee so that thy kingdom might be strong after him. O, our Lord, show not a timid face to those men, lest they think that thou art weak and not able to make war against them and against thine enemies. For if they see in us an attitude of weakness in word and in deed, we shall be held in contempt by them, and they will not give us gifts, presents, nor slaves or tribute, and thy kingdom will be destroyed.

O King, address them with bold words and speak unto them haughtily, saying: 'In respect of my father ye say in wood and in stone, but I will make you to serve me with chains of iron and with scorpion-whips. For my little finger shall be stronger than the thickest part of my father's body, and my counsel is greater than the counsel of my father who begot me. None shall diminish for you the labour and the forced service, nay, it shall be increased for you in every particular. And if you will not do my command, I will make your cattle my plunder, and your children shall be captives, and my knife of slaughter shall consume you. And I will seize your cities and your fields, your plantations and your wells, your gardens and your fruits... and I will bind your honourable ones in chains of iron, and your riches shall provide food for my servants... your women shall be for the adornment of the house of my nobles. Behold, I will not alter this my decision and will not diminish it. . . and I will carry it out quickly and will write it down for ever. For the whole of this land was given to David my grandfather for his kingdom, and to my father Solomon after him. And God hath given it to me after my fathers... and I will make you to serve me as ye served them; and now take counsel and obey me'."

Thus did Rehoboam speak also unto the elders of Israel. And the people all rose up together in their full number, and they said: "Get back to your house, O Israel! Have we none else whom we can make king save in the house of Judah and in the house of Benjamin? We will reject their houses and their men, and we will make our king and governor the man whom we wish for and in whom our soul delighteth." And they took up their weapons of war and fled in one body, and came to the city of Samaria of Beth Efrata, where they took counsel. And the house of Israel cast lots among themselves so that they might make king the man whom they chose.

The lot fell on the house of Ephraim, and they chose a man from the house of his father, and made Jeroboam king. And thus was the kingdom separated from Rehoboam the son of Solomon and there were left to it only the house of Benjamin and the house of Judah his father.

He who reigned on the throne of David his father was Jesus Christ, His kinsman in the flesh by a virgin, Who sat upon the throne of His Godhead; and upon earth He granted to reign upon His throne the King of Ethiopia, Solomon's firstborn.

65. MARY THE DAUGHTER OF DAVID

Joseph was the son of David and Mary was also the daughter of David. Therefore was Mary promised in marriage to Joseph her kinsman, as it is said in the gospel: "O Joseph, son of David, fear thou not to take to wife Mary thy bride, for that which is to be born of her is of the Holy Spirit, the Word of God."¹

And there was born of her, God the Word, Light of Light, Son of the Father, Who came and delivered His creation from the hand of Satan and from Sheol: and from death He hath delivered all of us who have believed in Him; He hath drawn us to His father and hath raised us up into heaven His throne, to become His heirs; for He is a lover of mankind, and unto Him praise belongeth forever.

66. THE KING OF ROME

The kingdom of Rome was the portion and dominion of Japhet, the son of Noah. They planned and they made twelve great cities, and Darius built the greatest cities of their kingdom: Antioch, Tyre, Parthia and Rome, and those who reigned dwelt there; and King Constantine built Constantinople after his own name... the sign of the Cross having appeared to him during the battle in the form of stars cut in heaven, he was delivered out of the hands of his enemy; and from that time onwards the Kings of Rome made their habitation there.

Darius had many descendants; and from Darius to the days of Solomon were eighteen generations. And of his seed was born a man whose name was Zanbares, who in his wisdom, made a drawing of the astrolabe,² and placed stars therein, and a balance for the sun. And he visioned what would happen in those days; that the kingdom would not remain to the children of Japhet but would depart to the seed of David, of the tribe of Shem. And when he thus saw, he sent a message to David the King, saying: "Take my daughter for thy son." And David the King took her, and gave her to Solomon his son, and Solomon begot a son by her and called his name Adramis.

²Instrument for observing the positions of the celestial body now superseded by the sextant.

Zanbares died before this and Baltasor, who was of his kinsmen, became king. He lacked male offspring to reign after him upon his throne, and he was jealous lest the children of his father should reign after him. And he sent a written message to Solomon the King, saying, "Hail to the greatness of thy kingdom, and to thy honourable wisdom! Do give me thy son whom I will make king over the city of Rome. For I have not been able to father male children, but only three daughters. I will give him whichever of my daughters he pleaseth, and I will give him my throne, and he shall be king, he and his seed after him in the city of Rome forever."

When King Solomon had read this letter, he meditated, saying: "If I keep back my son he will send to the King of the East, who will give him his son, and that which I have planned will be made void; therefore I will give him my son." And he took counsel with his counsellors of the house of Israel, and he said unto them: "We have already given our son and our children to the country of Ethiopia, and Israel hath a kingdom there. And now, so that we may have a third kingdom, the country of Rome, I will send Adramis, my youngest son.

Hold it not against me as an evil thing, that formerly I took away your sons, for it is a pleasing thing to God that the men of Ethiopia have learned His Name, and have become His people. In like manner the men of Rome, if we give them our children will become the people of God. The people of Israel have taken the kingdom of Ethiopia and the kingdom of Rome. Give ye your youngest sons as before ye gave the eldest and let those of middle age stay in our city."

Then the men of Israel rose up and took counsel, and returned, and said unto him: "We will speak this matter unto the King, and he shall do his will." And he said unto them: "Make me hear what ye would say." And they said unto him: "Thou hast already taken the eldest son from our houses, and now take the youngest of the children." And he was pleased with this counsel, and he did for them as they wished.

And he brought forward his son Adramis, who did take some of the nobles of the lower grades of the house of Israel, and they gave him a priest of the tribe of the Levites whose name was Akimihel, and they set Adramis upon the king's mule, and cried out to him: "Hail! Long live the royal father!" And all the people said: "It is right and proper."

And they anointed him with the holy oil of kingship, and commanded him to keep all the laws of the kingdom, and they made him to swear that he would worship no other god except the God of Israel. And they blessed him as they had blessed David his brother, and admonished Adramis even as they had admonished David, and they accompanied him on his way as far as the sea coast.

And Solomon the King wrote and sent a letter saying: "Peace be to Baltasor, the King of Rome! Take my son Adramis, and give him thy daughter and make him king in the city of Rome. Thou didst wish for a king of the seed of David my father, and I have done thy will. Also I have sent unto thee his nobles, fourteen on his right hand and fourteen on his left, who shall keep the Law with him and be subject unto thee according to thy will." And they arrived there with the ambassadors of the King of Rome, together with much splendour and all the equipment that was required for the country of Rome.

And they came to the city of Rome, to Baltasor the King, and they repeated all that Solomon had sent them to say, and delivered over to him his son. And Baltasor rejoiced exceedingly, and gave him his eldest daughter, whose name was Adlonya; and he made a great marriage feast according to the greatness of his kingdom, and established him over all his city of Rome. And he blessed him, for he was noble in stature, and his wisdom was marvellous, and he was exceedingly mighty in his strength.

One day Baltasor wished to test his knowledge in the trying of cases. A man, the owner of a vineyard, came to him and appealed to him, saying: "My Lord, Arsani, the son of Yodad, hath laid waste my vineyard with his sheep. And behold, I have seized his sheep and they are in my house; what decision wilt thou come to in respect of me?" And the owner of the sheep came to the King and made an appeal to him, saying: "Give me back my sheep, for he hath carried them off because they went into his vineyard." And the King said unto them: "Go ye and argue your case before your King Adramis, and whatsoever he shall say unto you, that do." And they came and argued their case before him.

Then Adramis asked him, saying: "How much of the vineyard have the sheep eaten? The leaves, or the tendrils or the young grapes, or the shoots by the roots?" And the owner of the vineyard answered and said unto him: "They have eaten the tendrils and the branches that had grapes upon them, and there is nothing left of the vines except the twigs by the roots." Adramis then asked the owner of the sheep: "Is this true?" And the owner of the sheep answered and said unto him: "My lord, they ate only the tendrils with leaves on them."

Adramis then answered and said: "This man saith that they ate the grapes; is this true?" And the owner of the sheep answered and said: "No my lord, but they ate the blossoms before they had formed into grapes."

67. THE FIRST JUDGMENT OF ADRAMIS, KING OF ROME

Adramis then said unto them: "Hearken ye to the judgment which I will declare unto you. If the sheep have destroyed all the shoots from the root of the vine, then they all belong to thee. And if they have eaten the leaves of the branches, and the blossoms of the grapes, take the sheep, shear their wool, and take also the young sheep which have not yet brought forth young ones. But the sheep which have already brought forth young ones for the first time, leave to the owner of the sheep."

All those who heard the judgment which he pronounced, marvelled, and Baltasor said: "Verily, this judgment is a judgment of the people of the God of Israel. Henceforth judge him that hath a case at law, wage war with him that would wage war, rule him that would be ruled, keep alive him that should be kept alive, and pass the judgment that ought to be passed according as men would be judged, and take this city to thyself and to thy seed after thee."

And all the men of the city of Rome were well pleased, and they made Adramis king over them, and they rejoiced in him with a great joy; for it happened thus by the Will of God.

After this, a fever seized Baltasor, and he sent Adramis to the war, and into everything that he wished, whilst he himself remained in the city; after this Baltasor died, and Adramis directed the kingdom. And the city of Rome became the possession of Adramis and of his generations after him, for by the Will of God the kingdoms of the world were given to the seed of Shem, and slavery to the seed of Ham, and the handicraft is of the seed to Japhet.¹

68. THE KING OF MEDYAM

The king of Medyam was of the seed of Shem. For of the seed of Isaac was Esau, who went forth from his mother's womb with Jacob clinging to the sole of his foot; and Jacob carried away the right of the firstborn from Esau for the sake of a bowl of porridge.

And the name of Esau's kingdom was called, according to his name of contempt, "Edom", for the meaning of Edom is "lentils;" and because of this the seed of Esau were called "Edomites." For through the greed of his belly he forsook and lost the right of the firstborn of the seed of Shem.

And unless the soul be restrained by temperance, it will bring down into a net the whole lust of the belly which is of the body. For the body is greedy, but temperance restraineth the soul, and therefore Paul said: "That which the soul doth not wish the body wisheth; and that which the body doth not wish the soul wisheth, and so each contends against the other."² If a man willeth a thing and his soul joined itself with his desire he becometh like Christ.

The Apostles say that Christ is the Head of every man who travelleth upon the straight road. And our Lord said unto His disciples: "Walk in the Spirit and perform ye not the lusts of your bodies." And when they heard this they forsook all the lust of the flesh, and they said unto our Lord: "Behold now, we have forsaken everything and followed Thee; what is our reward?" And our Saviour said unto them: "Ye have made your bodies like unto those of the angels, and ye shall do mighty deeds even as I do. And behold, I have given you authority to raise the dead, and I have given you power to heal the sick and ye shall trample upon all the power of the enemy. And at My second coming ye shall judge and put to shame the Twelve Tribes of Israel, because they have not believed on Me, and have treated My glory with contempt. As for those who believe in Me, ye shall magnify them and shall make them to rejoice with you in My kingdom.”

69. THE KING OF BABYLON

It came to pass in days of old that there lived in the kingdom of Manasseh, King of Israel, a certain man whose name was Karmin, and he was a fearer of God, and he gave many alms and offerings to the poor of Israel. And when he made offerings to the House of God, he did so with sincerity, and his tithe he gave double; and he was good in all his ways, and there was no evil whatsoever before him. But Satan, the enemy of all good, became envious of him, for he saw that his course in life was good.

And that man Karmin was exceedingly rich in camels, horses, flocks of sheep, herds of cattle, gold and silver and fine apparel, and he used to feed the mule of the king in Armatem, a city of Israel. His native place was the country of Judah, his father's portion, but because of his love for wealth, he departed into Armatem to dwell there, and Israel allowed him to settle there because of his riches; for he was exceedingly rich and had many possessions, and the governors of Judah were afraid of him.

70. CONCERNING LYING WITNESSES

And there was a certain depraved man of the seed of Benjamin, whose name was Benyas, who used to lead the mule of the King of Israel, and Karmin used to feed him, together with the mule of King Manasseh. And among the neighbours of Karmin there were certain men who were envious of him because of his pastures and wells, and because of the multitude of his flocks and herds and servants... for the region where he had settled was the inheritance of their fathers, and for this reason they wished to drive him away from their country.

So they kept watch upon Benyas, the leader of the King's mule, with evil intent, and they slandered and abused Karmin, and said unto Benyas: “This Karmin hath blasphemed the King of Israel, the anointed of God, saying: 'This king is not the son of a free woman, but the son of an old woman servant who was bought for two measures of grain to work at mill and brickmaking.' Do thou take this case against him to the king and accuse him, for we will be thy witnesses before the king, and we will not let thee be put to shame." And they made a covenant together, and they swore to him that they would bear false witness against Karmin, by whose tongue such words were never uttered, and into whose mind such thoughts had never entered.

So Benyas went to his Lord, the King, and told him all this matter. And the King said unto him: "Is there any man who hath heard this with thee?" And Benyas answered and said unto him: "Yes my Lord, there are some who have heard... two of the nobles of Israel who belong to Armatem." And the King said unto him: "Go now and bring them here secretly so that we may find out whether they agree with thy words; and if they do, we will cut off the head of Karmin."

Benyas then departed and brought Zaryos and Karmelos, of the tribe of Manasseh... for it had been agreed between them that they would not put him to shame before the King, in the matter of their lying testimony.

And these two men agreed together and planned when they were on their way, saying: "When we have spoken to the King, if he shall ask us afterwards separately so that he may find out the truth of our words: 'Where did you hear these words?' we will each of us answer and say: 'When we were drinking wine with him.' And when he shall say to us: 'What day was this?' we will say: 'Five days after the new moon.' And when he saith unto us: 'What time of the day?' we will say unto him: 'At the ninth hour, where he was sitting with us, and we were drinking wine together.' And when he shall ask us saying: 'What did ye drink out of and where were you sitting?' we will say unto him: 'Out of cups of gold, and our seats were in the hall of his house where the cushions were placed'."

And they agreed together on this evil plot while they were on the way to the King.

When they arrived in the presence of the King, Benyas brought them forward, and the King questioned them... and they repeated to him all their lying counsel. And he asked them as they had surmised on the road... the occasion, the day and the hour of their drinking, and their sitting in the hall and they told him.

And when the King had enquired into all this matter, and dismissed them, he called the captain of his host who stood before him, and said unto him: "Go at dawn of day tomorrow and surround the house of Karmin and let not any of his people escape thee, neither man nor woman, and slay them all with the sword. As for Karmin, cut off this head, and bring hither all his possessions, his goods, all his flocks and herds and his gold and silver."

And those liars rejoiced and returned to their district, and they went in to the house of Karmin and held converse with him with words of peace, and they paid him compliments, and they spoke kindly before his face, evil being in their hearts. Then was fulfilled on them the prophecy of David, who said: "Those who speak words of peace with their neighbour and have evil in their hearts, reward them according to the evil of their works and according to the evil of their thoughts."¹

And they drank themselves drunk in the house of Karmin, and they fell asleep there with him; but when they had fallen asleep, behold, the Angel of God was sent to Karmin, and he awoke him and said unto him: "Leave all thy possessions and save thyself, for soldiers have been commanded by Manasseh the King to cut off thy head. Take as much of thy riches as thou canst carry, and flee into another country, for this Manasseh is a slayer of the prophets and a seeker after the blood of innocent men."

Then Karmin rose up immediately and sought out his treasure in gold and took it, and he awoke his wife and his two sons, also his chosen servants, and loaded them with possessions of great value, and went forth by night.

He sent off his wife and his sons with two servants to Jerusalem, and he himself departed with two of his servants to a remote country, a distance of three months journey; and he arrived in Babylon. And so he came to

¹Psalms 28:3,4

Balaon the King of Babylon, and gave him gifts, and related unto him what had happened to him. And Balaon sympathized with Karmin, and gave him a habitation near the house of his merchant, who had departed to a far country for a period of three years.

And those men, Zaryos and Karmelos, who had made lying testimony against Karmin, were killed drunk in bed in Karmin's house.

And the wife of the merchant loved Karmin, and she was seduced by him, and became with child. The husband of the woman had left on his journey when she was with child, and she delivered and gave the child to a nurse who brought it up. Then, in the second year she went astray and became pregnant with child by Karmin, for the person of Karmin was exceedingly good in Israel. And the woman wished to throw the child whom she had conceived into the river when he was born and to wait for her husband, the merchant, as if she had not gone astray, and had not done anything wrong, even as the wicked woman, who, having wronged her husband and washed herself, sitteth down like a woman who hath done nothing, and she sweareth an oath falsely.

And at that time the wife of Balaon, the King of Babylon, also conceived and brought forth something which was like an eagle... like a bird, but altogether without wings. And she called a handmaiden who was a favourite, and sent the thing away in a wicker-basket and commanded her to cast it into the river, without letting anyone know about it.

And the time came for the wife of the merchant to give birth, and she brought forth a man-child, comely in form and worthy of compassion. And without suckling it she called to her favourite handmaiden, and put it into a box and commanded her to throw him into the river without anyone knowing about it, for she was afraid of her husband.

That same night two women were delivered of child, the merchant's wife and the wife of the King, and at daybreak the two women sent their handmaidens to cast their children into the river.

By the Will of God these two handmaidens met each other before they had thrown the children into the river, and they talked, and the handmaiden of the Queen asked the handmaiden of the merchant, saying: "What is in thy box?" And she showed her the beautiful child. And she further said unto her: "Why hast thou brought him here?" And the merchant's handmaiden said unto her: "Because the wife of my lord hath gone astray with a certain Israelite, and she conceived and brought forth this child, and she hath commanded me to throw him into the river." And the Queen's handmaiden said unto her: "Why does she not bring up a child who is so beautiful?" and the merchant's handmaiden said unto her: "Her husband left her with child and she brought forth a child, and is rearing him; how then can she rear this other child who is of a strange and alien seed?"

Then the merchant's handmaiden asked the Queen's handmaiden, saying: "What hast thou in thy basket?" And the Queen's handmaiden said unto her: "My lady brought forth a child that hath not the appearance of a man but that of a wingless eagle, and she hath commanded me to throw it into the river. So now, give me this child of thine that I may give it to my mistress, and do thou take this bird and cast it into the river." And they did so.

And the handmaiden of the Queen took the child of Karmin to her mistress, and the Queen rejoiced, and it was reported to the King that the Queen had borne a son. And the Queen gave the boy to the nurses, and he grew up in the palace of the King, and she called his name Nebuchadnezzar... which being interpreted means, "Saved by the feather of a bird."

So then, the King of Babylon is of the seed of Shem, and he came and overthrew Jerusalem by the Will of God, and he carried away captive the Children of Israel... and he made them to wander in Babylon with the grandchildren of Manasseh.

The King of Babylon was so very rich that he set up a pillar of gold on the plain of Babylon sixty cubits high, and he was very arrogant, and he used to say: "I make the sun to shine in the heavens;" and he worshipped idols. But God abased and humbled him so that he might know Him, and He set his portion with the beasts of the field. And when he knew the name of the Lord, after seven years, He had compassion upon him, and brought him back in repentance. And the kingdom of Babylon¹ was his, and it belonged to those who were of his seed forever.

71. THE KING OF PERSIA

The King of Persia is likewise of the seed of Shem. Judah had two sons, and he had given Tamar to his eldest son, but he died. Judah then sent his younger son to her, that he might bring forth seed and inheritors to his brother by his brother's wife, but he did that which God hated, for he did not wish to raise up seed to his brother as his father Judah had commanded him; so when he lay with Tamar he made his seed to go upon the ground, so that it might not germinate in her womb and be called the seed of his brother. Rather, he wished to raise up children by his own wife in his own name. And when God saw his evil act He turned His face away from him and slew him.

Then Judah, the father-in-law of Tamar, brought her back and set her in the house of her father, and said unto her people: "Keep carefully this Israelite woman, and let her not defile herself with an alien... for I have a small son, and if God will let him grow up, I will give him to her."

One day, while Tamar was living as a widow in her father's house, behold Judah, her father-in-law came to the place where his sheep were. And when Tamar heard that her father-in-law had come there, she cast away from her the apparel of widowhood and dressed herself in splendid garments, and she veiled herself after the manner of an harlot...and she followed him and sat down.

Judah then sent a message to her, saying: "I wish to be with thee." And she said unto him: "What wilt thou give me for my hire?" And he said unto her: "I will send to thee in the morning early, a lamb." She then said unto him: "Give me a token until thou givest me the lamb." Judah then gave her his staff, his ring, and the close-fitting cap that was under his outer garment.

¹Modern-day Iraq

After he had slept with her, she took the things and departed unto her house. When he sent the lamb unto her early in the morning, and his servants enquired saying: "Where is the house of the harlot?" It was said unto them: "There is no harlot in our town." So they returned into their city and told him that there was no harlot in that town. And Judah said: "Leave it... the Will of God be done."

When Tamar conceived and they told her father-in-law this, he went and took the elders of Israel to the father of Tamar, and said unto him: "Bring to me thy daughter Tamar who hath conceived, that we may stone her with stones even as Moses commanded, for she hath brought reproach upon the house of Israel."

When it was reported to Tamar, that her father-in-law spoke thus, she brought out the staff, the ring and the cap, and gave them to her father, and said unto the elders of Israel: "The owner of these things hath seduced me; let them stone me with him... with stones."

When Judah saw his possessions he recognized them, and he said: "Tamar is more righteous than I."¹ Then he left and came to his house. And Tamar brought forth twins, two nations... Perez and Zara. Persia² was founded in the name of Perez, and he ruled over it and his seed after him, and they were called Persians. Behold, it is proved that the King of Persia is of the seed of Shem.

72. CONCERNING THE KING OF MOAB

The King of Moab is also of the seed of Shem, for when God made Abraham to depart from his father's country into the land of Haran, He made Lot to pass over into the land of Sodom and Gomorrah, then He sent His Angels, Michael and Gabriel, to bring out Lot and to burn up the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah; and they destroyed them and brought out Lot with his children.

The wrath of God had come down on the city of Sodom as a rain of fire from heaven, which burned up mountains and hills, stones and earth, and lightnings and peals of thunder came down mingled with the crashing sound of the wrath of God, and a cloud of fire made the heat to emit smoke.

¹Genesis 38:13-26

²Modern-day Iran

When all this uproar was being heard, the Angels said unto Lot: "Turn not around after ye have gone forth from the city, turn not round that ye die not." But when Akmaba the wife of Lot heard this she did turn around so that she might see the city of her father and her mother, and she became a pillar of salt... and she remaineth thus to this day, to this very day.

As for Lot, God made him to dwell in the mountains of Ararat, and there he planted a new vineyard, but his daughters made their father to drink wine, and they plotted a wicked plot, and they said: "Why shall the possession of our father be wasted? Our mother has been destroyed on the road, and there is no one here to marry us." And they made their father drunk, and his elder daughter lay with him whilst his mind was clouded with wine, and Lot the righteous man did not know when his daughter lay with him and when she rose up from him, for his mind was clouded with strong drink, therefore the act of lying with his daughter was not reckoned against Lot as sin, for he did it unknowingly.

And his elder daughter brought forth a child, and she called him "Moab," which being interpreted means, "From my father, on my knee." Moab then was the father of the Moabites and the Agarenes. Behold now, it is clear that the King of Moab is of the seed of Shem.¹

73. THE KING OF AMALEK, A DESCENDANT OF LOT

And it came to pass that when the elder daughter of Lot had brought forth her son, she said unto the younger daughter: "Come, let us make our father drink wine, so that thou also may company with him and get offspring." Again they prepared wine, and they spoke to him the words of deceit, and said, unto him: "Drink wine, O father... so that thy heart may be comforted." And he, the simple man, drank and became drunk, and again when he had drunk and his mind was clouded with wine, the younger daughter came and lay with him, and he did not know of her Living with him, or her rising up from him. And she also conceived and gave birth to a son, and she called him, “Ammon”, and he is the father of the Amalekites. Behold now, it is clear that the King of Amalek is also of the seed of Shem.¹

¹Genesis 19:30-38

74. THE KING OF THE PHILISTINES

And behold, how the seed of Samson reigned over the Philistines. Samson was of the seed of Dan, one of the twelve sons of Jacob, and he was the son of a handmaiden of Jacob.

The Angel of the Lord had appeared to the mother of Samson and said unto her: “Keep thyself from all pollution and company with no other man except thy husband... for he who shall be borne of thee shall be a Nazarite, holy to the Lord, and he shall be the deliverer of Israel from the hand of the Philistines.”² And then she brought forth Samson.

And again the Angel appeared unto her and said unto her: “Thou shalt not let a razor go upon his head, and he shall neither eat flesh nor drink wine, and he shall marry no strange woman but only a woman of his own people, and from the house of his father.”³ And how God gave him strength ye have heard from the Book of Judges.⁴ But Samson transgressed the commandment of God and married a daughter of the uncircumcised Philistines.

Because of this God was wroth, and He delivered him into the hands of men of the uncircumcised Philistines, and they blinded his eyes, and they made him act as a clown in the house of their king.

When Samson pulled the roof down upon them, he had killed seven hundred thousand of them with the iron, with the stone and with his staff, and with the jaw of an ass. For their number was as that of the locusts, until he released Israel from the service of the Philistines.

¹Genesis 19:30-38

²Judges 13: 2-5

³Judges 13:9-14

⁴Judges 15, 16

Delilah had conceived by Samson, and whilst she was with child Samson died with the Philistines, and Delilah brought forth a son and she called his name "Menahem", which means being interpreted, "Seed of the strong man."

Delilah was the sister of Maksaba, the wife of the King of the Philistines, and Samson slew the King of the Philistines in his palace with his people and his household, and died with him. Then Delilah went to her sister Maksaba, the Queen of the Philistines.

Both women were beautiful and they had no children, but both had conceived... and the husbands of both were dead. The two women loved each other exceedingly, with their love for each other not as the love of sisters, but that of the mother for the child, and of the child for the mother; even so was their love.

The rulership over those who were left of the slaughter made by Samson in the palace of the King was in the hands of Maksaba, for none of the mighty men of war of the kingdom of the Philistines were left, and therefore Maksaba ruled over those that were left.

And they spoke to her morning and evening, saying: "We have no other king except thyself, and except that one that shall go forth from thy belly. If our god Dagon will do a favour unto us, that which is in thy belly shall be a son, who shall reverence our god Dagon and shall reign over us. And if it be a daughter we will make her to reign over us, so that thy name and the name of Kwolason our lord, shall be your memorial over us."

Maksaba brought forth a man-child and all the men of the Philistines rejoiced, and they did homage to her and sang, saying: "Dagon and Bel have honoured and loved Maksaba, and the seed of Kwolason is again with us."

Delilah also bore a son, and the two women brought up the children in great state and dignity; and when the children were five years old they ate and played together before them, and the mothers made garments of costly material for them, and set daggers above their loins, and chains of gold on their necks. And the people seated the son of Maksaba on the throne of his father, and made him king over the Philistines.

75. HOW THE SON OF SAMSON SLEW THE SON OF THE KING OF THE PHILISTINES

Akamhel, the son of Samson, spoke unto his mother Delilah, saying: "Why am I not reigning and sitting upon this throne?" And his mother said unto him: "Cease my son. This throne did not belong to thy father, and this city was not thy father's city; when the God of thy father let thee grow up thou shalt go to thy father's throne." And her son said unto her: "I will neither forsake thee my mother, nor Maksaba my aunt, and I will be king here."

One day the two youths were drunk after their meal was ended, and the doors were shut. The two women were sitting together about to eat flesh; the two youths were playing before them, and they ate with them, and a maidservant held the dish between them. Then Akamhel, the son of Delilah, took from the dish a piece of flesh which would fill both his hands, and put it to his mouth, and Tebreles the son of Maksaba, the Queen of the Philistines, snatched away that part of the flesh that was outside his mouth. And Akamhel drew his sword and cut off this head, and it fell into the dish before he could swallow what he had seized; and his body fell upon the pavement of the house, and his hands and feet twitched convulsively, and he died.

Fear and dismay laid hold upon their two mothers, and they spoke not a word to anyone because they were afraid, but they swallowed the food which was in their mouths, and they looked at each other, not knowing what to do.

Then a handmaiden rose up and took the head of Tebreles out of the dish, and put it back on its neck and covered it with her garment... And Delilah rose up and seized the sword of the dead son of her sister, and went to kill her own son Akamhel, but he saved himself by hiding behind a pillar.

Then her sister rose up and seized her, saying: "Why should we be destroyed through their quarrel? This youth is spring of a bad root and cannot bear good fruit; come my sister, let him not destroy thee also."

So she took the sword from her hand, and fetched rich purple clothing which kings wear, and she gave it to him, and she spoke kind words unto him, saying: "Take the apparel, my son, and thou thyself sit upon the throne of their kingdom of the Philistines."

Akamhel raged like a savage bear, for he wanted to slay both women until they decided to leave the house... and they went out, and when he had made them to leave the house he took the purple apparel, and went out. The women then came back and made the dead body ready for burial, and they buried it secretly.

When the time for the evening meal had come, the young men and their maidservants searched for their king and found him not, and they asked about him, and his mother said unto them: "Your king is sick, and this man will sit in place of him." And they took him and set him on the throne, and they prepared a feast and rejoiced.

And from that time onward the son of Samson reigned over them, and there was none who transgressed his orders. He had committed this act of murder fifteen winters after he was born, and the kingdom of the Philistines became his and his seed's after him. So then, it is proven that the kingdom of the Philistines belongeth to the seed of Shem.

76. ABRAHAM'S JOURNEY INTO EGYPT

When God had given unto Abraham glory and riches, he lacked a son. And Sarah and Abraham talked together on their bed, and he said unto her: "Thou art barren." And she said unto him: "It is not I who am barren but thyself." And they continued to discuss the matter and to dispute about it.

And there came a famine in the land of Canaan, and Abraham heard that there was food in the land of Egypt, the country of Pharaoh. So, as Abraham had spent all his possessions in charity to the poor during the days of the famine, and not having provided for the morrow, when the famine waxed strong in the land of Canaan, he lacked food to eat. And he said: "I give thanks unto God that what he hath given unto me I have expended on my servants. But as for thee Sarah, come, let us go into the land of Egypt in order to save ourselves from death by famine. "And she said unto him: "Thy will be done O my Lord, and if thou die I will die with thee, and if thou live I will live with thee; it is not for me to oppose thy word." And they rose up and set out on the journey to Egypt.

When they drew nigh to Egypt, Abraham said unto Sarah: "One thing I must ask of thee; and Sarah said: "Speak, my Lord." And he said unto her: "I have heard that the habits of the Egyptians are lawless, and that they live in idolatry and fornication. So, when they have seen thee they will plot evil against me, and slay me because of the charm of thy beautiful form; for there is among them no one that can be compared unto thee.

And now, in order to save my life, do say, if they happen to ask thee questions about me, 'I am his sister,' so that my soul be saved from death by the hand of the strangers." And Sarah said: "Thy will be done. The word which thou tellest me I will speak, and what thou asketh of me I will do." And they wept and worshipped God, and they came into the great city of the King of Egypt.

When the Egyptians saw Abraham and Sarah they marvelled at the beauty of their appearance, for they imagined that they had been brought forth by the same mother. And they said unto Abraham: "What is this woman to thee?" And Abraham said unto them: "She is my sister." Therefore the people made a report to Pharaoh that a couple of lovely form had arrived, one a woman and the other a young man, and that there was no one beautiful like unto them in all the land.

Pharaoh rejoiced, and he sent a message to Abraham, saying: "Give me thy sister that I may marry her to myself." And Abraham pondered in his mind, saying: "If I keep her back he will kill me and take her;" so he said: "Do so, provided that thou make me well comfortable." Pharaoh then gave him one thousand silver pieces and took Sarah to make her his wife; and he brought her into his palace, and set her upon his bed and Pharaoh the King of Egypt prepared to company with her.

But behold the Angel of the Lord appeared unto him by night carrying a sword of fire, and he drew close to him, and he lighted up the whole chamber with his fiery flame, and he wanted to slay Pharaoh.

Pharaoh fled from one wall of the chamber to the other, and from one corner of the chamber to the other; wherever he went the Angel followed him. Then Pharaoh stretched out his hands and said unto the Angel: "O Lord, forgive me this my sin." And the Angel said unto him: "Why dost thou attack the wife of another man?" And Pharaoh said unto him: "O Lord, slay thou not innocent blood, for he said unto me 'She is my sister,' and therefore I took her to myself innocently. What shall I do to deliver myself from thy hands?" And the Angel said unto him: "Give Abraham's wife back to him, and give him a gift, and send him away to his own country."

Then Pharaoh called Abraham and gave unto him his wife Sarah, together with a handmaiden whose name was Hagar, and he gave unto him gold and silver, and costly garments, and sent him away in peace.¹

So, Abraham and his wife returned to their country in peace. And Sarah said unto Abraham: "I know that I am barren. Take thou the handmaiden whom Pharaoh gave unto me; it may be that God will give thee seed in her. As for me, my person is old and withered, and the flower of my body hath dried up."

And she gave Hagar unto him. And Abraham took Hagar and she conceived by him, and she brought forth a son and called his name Ishmael, which means, "God hath heard me."²

Afterwards God gave Abraham seed from his wife Sarah and he fathered Isaac, but Sarah became jealous of Ishmael the son of the handmaiden, because he would reach manhood before her son, and she said in her heart: "It may be that he will slay my son and inherit his father's house."

Abraham then offered up offerings to God and said: "Lord, what shall I do in respect of Ishmael my son, my firstborn? I wish that he may live for me before Thee, but Sarah my wife is jealous because Thou hast given me seed in her old age." Ishmael was fourteen years old before Isaac was born.

²Genesis 16:3-16

And God said unto Abraham: "What Sarah said is true; cast out the handmaiden with her son Ishmael. Let Ishmael live before Me, and I will make him a great nation, and he shall father twelve nations and shall reign over them; but I will establish My covenant with Isaac My servant, the son of Sarah, and in him I will bless all the nations of the earth, and in the heavens also I will make him king."¹

For as God swore, He gave all the kingdoms of the world to the seed of Shem, also an exalted throne and dominion, even as his father Noah, by the word of God, blessed his son Shem, saying: "Be lord to thy brethren and reign over them." And this that he said had reference to the Redeemer, the King of us all, Jesus Christ the King of heaven and earth, Who magnified kings, and who when He pleaseth brings down their power; for unto Him belong power and dominion over all created things for ever and ever.

77. THE KING OF ETHIOPIA RETURNS TO HIS COUNTRY

And the King of Ethiopia returned to his country with joy and gladness; and marching along with their songs, their pipes and their chariots, like an army of heavenly beings, the Ethiopians arrived from Jerusalem at the city of Wakerom in a single day... and they sent messengers to announce their arrival to Makeda the Queen of Ethiopia, and to report to her how they had found every good thing, and how her son had become King, and how they had brought the heavenly Zion.

And she caused all this glorious news to be spread abroad, and she made a herald to go round about in all the country that was her dominion, ordering the people to meet her son, and especially the heavenly Zion, the Tabernacle of the God of Israel. And they blew horns before her, and all the people of Ethiopia rejoiced, from the least to the greatest... and the soldiers rose up with her to meet their King.

And she came to the city of the government, which is the chief city of the kingdom of Ethiopia; which in later times became the chief city of the Christians of Ethiopia... and in it she caused to be prepared numerous perfumes from India, to be used there. And her son came by the Azyaba road to Wakerom, then came forth to Masas, ascended to Bur and arrived at the city of the government, the capital city of Ethiopia, which the Queen herself had built and called "Dabra Makeda", after her own name.

David II the King came with great pomp unto his mother's city, and then it was that she saw in the heights the heavenly Zion sending forth light like the sun. And when the Queen saw this, she gave thanks unto the God of Israel, and praised Him. And she bowed low and revered Zion, and threw up her head and gazed into the heavens and thanked her Creator... then she clapped her hands together and sent forth shouts of laughter from her mouth, and danced on the ground with her feet; and she adorned her whole body with joy and gladness.

Pavillions and tents were placed at the foot of Dabra Makeda on the flat plain by the side of good waters... and they slaughtered thirty-two thousand stalled oxen and bulls. And they set Zion upon the fortress of Dabra Makeda, and made ready for her three hundred guards who wielded swords to watch over the Tabernacle of Zion, together with her own men and her nobles, the mighty men of Israel. And her own guards were three hundred men who bore swords, and in addition to these her son David had seven hundred guards.

They rejoiced exceedingly with great glory and pleasure and they were arrayed in fine and costly apparel, for the kingdom was directed by her... from the Sea of Aleba to the Sea of Oseka, and everyone obeyed her command.

Queen Makeda had such great honour and riches, that none before her ever had the like, and none after her shall ever have the like. In those days Solomon was King in Jerusalem, and Makeda was Queen in Ethiopia. Unto both of them were given wisdom, glory, riches, graciousness and understanding, and beauty of voice, eloquence of speech and intelligence. Gold and silver were held as cheaply as brass, and rich fabrics wherein gold was woven were as common as linen garments... and the cattle and the horses were innumerable.

78. HOW QUEEN MAKEDA MADE HER SON KING OF ETHIOPIA

On the third day of the celebrations Makeda delivered over to her son seventeen thousand chosen horses, which were to watch the army of the enemy, and one thousand chosen mules, apparel of honour, gold and silver measured by the omer:¹ and she delivered over to her son everything that was his by law, and the throne of her kingdom.

And the Queen said unto her nobles: "Speak ye now, and swear by the heavenly Zion that ye will not make women queens or set them upon the throne of the kingdom of Ethiopia, and that no one except the male seed of David, the son of Solomon the King, shall ever reign over Ethiopia, and that ye will never make women queens." And all the nobles of the king's house swore, also the governors, the councillors and the administrators.

And she made Almeyas and Azariah the chief of the priests and the chief of the deacons, and the sons of the mighty men of Israel performed the Law, together with their King David in the Tabernacle of Witness... and the kingdom was made anew.

Then the hearts of the people shone at the sight of Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God... and the people of Ethiopia cast aside their idols, and they worshipped their Creator, the God Who had made them. And the men of Ethiopia loved the righteousness and justice that God loveth.

They forsook their former fornications and chose purity in the camp that was in the sight of the heavenly Zion. They forsook the pleasure of the gods who were devils, and chose the service and praise of God.

The daughters of Jerusalem suffered disgrace, and the daughters of Ethiopia were held in honour; the daughter of Judah was sad, but the daughter of Ethiopia rejoiced.

The people of Ethiopia were chosen from among idols and graven images, and the people of Israel were rejected. The daughters of Zion were rejected, and the daughters of Ethiopia were honoured... for God accepted the peoples who had been cast away, and rejected Israel, for Zion was taken away from them and she came into the country of Ethiopia... for wherever God is pleased for her to dwell, there is her habitation.

¹Hebrew measure; about half a gallon dry measure.

And Makeda, the Queen of Ethiopia, gave the kingdom to her son David II, the son of Solomon, the King of Israel, and she said unto him: "Take the kingdom, I have given it unto thee. I have made King him whom God hath made King, and I have chosen him whom God hath chosen as the keeper of His Tabernacle".

Then the king rose up and girded his apparel, and he bowed low before his mother, and said unto her: "Thou art the Queen, O my Lady, and I will serve thee in everything which thou commandest me, whether it be to death or whether it be to life. Wheresoever thou sendest me I will go, and whatsoever thou commandest me to do, that I will do. For thou art the head and I am the foot, and thou art the Queen and I am thy slave; everything shall be performed according to thy order and none shall transgress thy commandment.

And behold, we have brought with us the whole Law of the kingdom and the commandment of God, which Zadok the High Priest declared unto us when he anointed me with the oil of sovereignty in the house of the sanctuary of God... the horn of oil, which is the unguent of priesthood and royalty, being in his hand. And he did unto us that which was written in the Law... and we were anointed... Azariah to the priesthood and I to the kingdom; then Almeyas, the mouth of God and keeper of the Law and of Zion... the ear of the King in every path of righteousness.

They also told us and made us to understand that we bear death and life, and that we are like a man who hath fire in his left hand and water in his right, and who can put his hand into whichever he pleaseth. For punishment and life are written therein.

And so, Almeyas and Azariah brought forth that writing which was written before God and before the King of Israel, and they read it before Makeda and before the great men of Israel. And when they heard these words, all those who were round about bowed down and made obeisance, and they glorified God, He who had made them hear these words and had given them this commandment, so that they might perform the justice and judgment of God.

The Queen then said unto her son: "My son, God hath given unto thee righteousness... walk thou therein and withdraw not thyself from it for ye are the guardians of the Law of God and the guides of His commandments... ye are the men of the House of God and the guardians of Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God."

79. WHAT YE SHALL EAT: THE CLEAN AND THE UNCLEAN

This is what ye shall eat: the ox, the sheep, the goat, the buffalo and the antelope, the gazelle, and every creature with a cleft hoof eat ye, and also the creatures that chew the cud. But ye shall not eat the camel, the rabbit and the coney, for they chew the cud but their hoofs are not cleft. The wolf and the pig ye shall not eat, for their hoofs are clean but they do not chew the cud... Ye shall not eat what is unclean.

Whatsoever is in the waters with fins and scales, eat ye; but whatsoever is unclean therein, eat ye not. Among birds everything that is clean eat ye, but ye shall not eat the following: the eagle, the vulture, the raven, the ostrich and the owl, nor the seagull, the hawk, the heron, the swan nor the ibis nor the pelican, the hornbill, the water-hen and the bat; these are unclean. Ye shall not eat the locust nor the grasshopper nor anything of its kind for they are unclean and ye shall not touch their dead bodies, and whosoever touches them shall be unclean until the evening.

These things we have declared unto you in order that ye may keep and perform the Law of God so that ye may be blessed in this country, which God hath given unto you because of the heavenly Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God... it is because of Zion that ye have been chosen and our fathers rejected.

As for thee my Queen, thy wisdom is great and it surpasses the wisdom of men. There is none that can be compared with thee in respect of thy intelligence, and the understanding of thy heart is deeper than that of men, except my lord Solomon.

But thy wisdom so far exceedeth that of Solomon that thou hast been able to draw the mighty men of Israel and the Tabernacle of the Law of God with thy skill and thine understanding. Thou hast overthrown the house of their idols and destroyed their images and cleaned what was unclean among thy people, for thou hast driven away from them that which God hateth.

And as concerning thy name, God Himself hath prepared it, for He hath called thee Makeda which interpreted means 'Not thus' ... 'Not thus' to worship the sun, but it is right to worship God. 'Not thus' to practise the working of magic, but to lean upon the Holy One of Israel. 'Not thus' to offer up sacrifices to idols of stone and wood, but it is right to offer up sacrifices unto God."

And it came to pass by the Will of God, that Zion hath come into this country of Ethiopia to be a guide to our king David II (Menyelek), the lover of God, the guardian of her Tabernacle, and the director of the habitation of his glory."

80. HOW THE KINGDOM OF BAYNA-LEHKEM (DAVID II, MENYELEK I) WAS ESTABLISHED IN ETHIOPIA

Then Azariah said: "Bring hither the jubilee trumpets and let us go to Zion, and there we will make new the kingdom of our lord, David." And he took the oil of sovereignty and filled the horn and he anointed David with the unguent, with the oil of sovereignty.

And they blew horns and pipes and trumpets, and beat drums, and sounded all kinds of musical instruments, and there was singing, dancing, games and displays with horses and all the men and women of the country of Ethiopia were present, small and great, and the pygmies, six thousand in number, also virgin women whom Azariah had chosen as the women of Zion whom David the King had destined to serve at the table and the banquets in the royal fortress whenever he went up there clad in raiment of fine gold.

So, in this manner was renewed the kingdom of David II (Menyelek I) the son of Solomon the King of Israel, in the capital city Dabra Makeda, in the House of Zion, when the Law was established for the first time by the King of Ethiopia.

Thus the eastern boundary of the kingdom of the King of Ethiopia is the beginning of the city of Gaza in the land of Judah and Jerusalem, and its boundary is the Lake of Jericho passing by the coast of its sea to Leba and Saba, bound by Bisis and Asnet.

Its other boundary is the Sea of the Black and Naked Men, going up to Mount Kebereneyon into the Sea of Darkness, that is, the place where the sun setteth, extending to Feneel and Lasifala, and its borders are the lands near the Garden of Paradise where there is plenty food and abundance of cattle; this boundary extendeth as far as Zawel and passeth on to the Sea of India with its boundary as far as the Sea of Tarsis. In its remote part lieth the Sea of Medyam, until it cometh to the country of Gaza.

So then, this is the extent of all the dominion of the King of Ethiopia and it belongeth to him and to his seed, for ever.

81. HOW THE MEN OF ROME DESTROYED THE FAITH

After waiting for three months, Zion came into the country of Ethiopia at the beginning of the first month in the language of the Hebrews. Then they wrote down the Law and the names, and deposited it as a memorial for later days, so that what was right should be done for the Tabernacle of Zion, that the glory of the Kings of Rome might be well known.

For the Kings of Ethiopia and the Kings of Rome were brethren and held the Christian faith, and believed in the preaching of the gospel up to the time of Constantine the Great and Helena the Queen, who brought forth the wood of the cross... and the kings of Rome continued to believe for one hundred and thirty years.

Then Satan, who hath been the enemy of man from of old, rose up and seduced the people of the country of Rome, and they corrupted the Faith of Christ, and they introduced heresies in the Church of God by the mouth of Nestorius and Arius, into whose hearts he cast the same jealousy as he had cast into the heart of Cain to slay his brother Abel.

In like manner did their father the Devil, the enemy of righteousness and the hater of good, cast jealousy even as David said: "They speak violence in the heights of heaven, and set their mouth in the heavens, and their tongue wags on the earth."¹

Those same men who know not whence they came, and know not whither they are going, insult their Creator with their tongues and blaspheme His glory, while He is God the Word.

He came down from the throne of His Godhead and put on the body of Adam... and in that body He was crucified so that He might redeem Adam from his iniquity... then He went up into the heavens and sat upon the throne of His Godhead in that body which He had taken. And He shall come again in glory to judge the living and the dead, and shall reward every man according to his work.

82. THE FIRST WAR OF THE KING OF ETHIOPIA

After three months David II and his soldiers rose up to wage war from the city of the government, with Queen Makeda his mother and the Tabernacle Zion, his Lady.

And the Levites carried the Tabernacle of the Law while the other mighty men of war of Israel marched before it and behind it, and on the left side and on the right side of it. As in the times of old when God on Mount Sinai made Zion to come down in holiness to Moses and Aaron, even so did Azariah and Almeyas bear along the Tabernacle of the Law, singing psalms and songs of the spirit like the heavenly hosts, for God had given them beautiful voices and marvellous songs, as He was well pleased to be praised by them.

Then they came from the city of the government and encamped at Maya Abaw, and on the following morning they laid waste the district of Zawa, since enmity existed between them from olden time; and they blotted out the people and slew them with the edge of the sword.

¹Psalm 73:6-9

After this they passed on from that place and encamped at Gerra, and here also they laid waste the city of vipers that had the faces of men and the tails of asses attached to their loins.

The Queen then returned and encamped in the city of Zion and they remained there three months, then their chariots moved on and came to the city of the government. Then in one day they came to the city of Saba, and they laid waste the district of Noba, then they encamped round about Saba and they laid it waste as far as the border of Egypt.

The majesty of the King of Ethiopia was so great that the King of Medyam and the King of Egypt caused gifts to be brought unto him. Then, when they encamped in Abat they waged war on the country of India, and the King of India brought gifts and did homage to the King of Ethiopia.

King David II waged war wherever he pleaseth, and no man conquered him, but whosoever attacked him was conquered, for Zion himself made the strength of the enemy to be exhausted. But King David II with his armies and all those who obeyed his word, ran by the chariots without pain, hunger or thirst, without sweat and exhaustion, and travelling in one day a distance that took three months to traverse.

And they lacked nothing whatsoever of the things which they asked God through the Tabernacle of the Law of God to give them, for He dwelt with her and His Angel directed her; for she was His habitation.

When the King wished something to be done, everything that he wished for and thought about in his heart and indicated with his finger, was performed at his word, and everyone feared him, but he feared no one, for the hand of God was with him and it protected him by day and by night.

He did God's will and God worked for him and protected him from all evil.

83. HOW THE AUTHORITY OF BAYNA-LEHKEM WAS UNIVERSALLY ACCEPTED

By the KEBRA NAGAST we know and have learned that most certainly the King of Ethiopia is honourable... that he is the King of Zion, the firstborn of the seed of Shem... that the habitation of God is in Zion, and that He breaketh the might and power of all his enemies and foes... and that after him the King of Rome was the anointed of the Lord because of the wood of the Cross.

Concerning the Kingdom of Israel, truly the Pearl was born of them, and of the Pearl was born the Sun of Righteousness Who hid Himself in the woman's body... for otherwise He could not have been seen by mortal eyes; and having put on our body He became like unto us, and He walked about with men.

He performed signs and wonders in their midst... He raised their dead, He opened the ears of their deaf and He cleansed the lepers; He satisfied the hungry with food, and He performed many of the miracles, some of which are written down and some of which are not.

When the wicked children of Israel saw all this they thought that He was a man, and they were envious of Him because of what they saw and heard, and they crucified Him upon the wood of the Cross and they killed Him. But He rose from the dead on the third day and went up into heaven in glory, and sat on the throne of the Godhead.

There He received from God a Kingdom incorruptible for ever and ever over the beings of spirit and the beings of earth, and over every created being, so that every tongue shall adore His Name, and every knee shall bow to Him; and He shall judge the living and the dead and reward every man according to his work.

Therefore when the Jews shall see Him they shall be put to open shame, and be condemned to the fire which is everlasting. But we who believe shall be upon our thrones and we shall rejoice with our teachers the Apostles, provided that we have walked in the way of Christ and in His commandments.

After the Jews had Crucified the Saviour of the world, they were scattered abroad, and their kingdom was destroyed, and they were subdued and rooted out for ever and ever.

Then all the saints who were gathered together said: "In all truth the King of Ethiopia is more exalted and more honourable than any other king upon the earth, because of the glory and the greatness of the heavenly Zion."

And God loveth the people of Ethiopia, for without knowing about His Law, they destroyed their idols; but those unto whom the Law of God had been given (the Jews), made idols and worshipped the false gods which God hateth.

When in later times He was born of the flesh to redeem Adam, He manifested signs and wonders before them, but they did not believe in Him nor in His teaching... whereas the people of Ethiopia believed in one trustworthy disciple, and for this reason God greatly loves the people of Ethiopia. He loves them with an undying and an everlasting love.

The seed of Abraham hath exalted the seed of Shem... they are all kings upon the earth, but the chosen ones of the Lord are the people of Ethiopia, for there rests the habitation of God, the heavenly Zion, the Tabernacle of His Law and of His Covenant, which He hath made into a mercy-seat through His love for the children of men; also for the rains and the waters from the skies, for the planted things and the fruits, for the peoples and the countries, the kings and nobles, for men and beasts, and for birds and creeping things."

Verily, salvation hath been given unto all of us who have believed in our Lady Mary, the likeness of the heavenly Zion, for the Lord dwelt in the womb of the Virgin, and was brought forth by her without carnal union. And the Ten Words of the Law were written by the Finger of God and placed in Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God.

And now we will declare from the Law of Moses the prophecies of the Prophets our Fathers, the holy men of olden times, and the prophecies concerning Christ our Redeemer, so that the generations of posterity may hear the narrative of the story, and we will also relate unto them the interpretation of the scripture.

We will begin then with the beginning of the book, and will make you to understand in the spirit, as David saith, through the Holy Spirit: 'In the beginning the book was written because of me.'¹

And one answered and said: "What is the beginning of the Book?" And they answered and said unto him: "It is the Law which was written concerning Christ, the Son of God, 'In the beginning God made the heavens and the earth;'² and they existed from olden time. Then the earth was formless and there were mixed together darkness, winds, water, mist and dust; all of these were mixed together, and the Spirit of God hovered above the waters.

This means that by the Word of God the heavens and the earth were created, and these words mean that the Spirit of God dwelt over all creation."

The Seed Of The Woman

And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the Commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ.

Revelation 12:17

84. THE PROPHECY ABOUT CHRIST

Moses proclaimed in the Law and said: “A prophet like myself shall rise up for you from your brethren, and hearken ye unto him, and every soul that will not hearken unto that prophet ye shall root out from among the people.”¹

This he said concerning Christ the Son of God; and he also prophesied concerning His crucifixion, saying: “When the serpents afflicted the children of Israel they cried out to Moses, and Moses cried out to God to deliver them from the serpents.”

Then God said unto him: “Make an image of a serpent in brass and suspend it in a place where it can be seen as a sign, and let every one whom a serpent hath bitten look upon that image of brass, and he shall live.” Thus when they failed to look at it they died, and those who looked on it and believed lived.²

In like manner it was with Christ; those who paid no heed to Him and did not believe in Him perished in hell, and those who believed and hearkened unto Him, inherited the land of everlasting life, where there will never be pain or suffering.

And now we will make known unto you how they paid no heed to Christ, the Word of God.

The children of Israel spoke against Moses, saying: “Is it that God hath spoken to Moses only? How is it that we also do not hear the Word of God that we may believe on Him?”³

And God, Who knoweth the hearts of men, heard the murmuring of the children of Israel, and said unto Moses: “Thou asketh forgiveness for thy people, and yet they murmur against you, saying, why does not God speak with us also? So now, if they believe in Me, let them come to Me with thee. And, tell them to purify themselves and to wash their garments, and let the great men of Israel go up to hear what commands I will give them. Let them hear My Voice and perform the Commandments which I shall give them.”

¹Compare Deuteronomy 18:15

³Numbers 12:2

Then Moses told the Children of Israel what he had been commanded, and the people bowed low before God, and they purified themselves on the third day. And the seventy elders of Israel¹ went up into Mount Sinai and they were distant from each other the space of a flight of an arrow, while they stood still, each facing his neighbour. Thus there were many of them, yet they were not able to ascend into the cloud with Moses, and fear and trembling seized upon them, and the shadow of death enveloped them... then they heard the sound of the horn and pipes and felt the darkness and winds.

When Moses went into the cloud and held converse with God, all the great men of Israel heard the Voice of God and they were afraid and quaked with terror, and because of the overwhelming fear that was in their hearts, they were unable to stand up.

But when Moses came forth they said unto him: "We will not hear this Word of God so that we may not die of terror. And behold, we know that God speaks with thee, so then if there be anything that He would say unto us, do thou listen and declare it unto us. Be unto us a mouth in respect of God, and we will be unto Him His own people."

Do ye not see that they denied Christ saying: "We will not listen to that Voice so that we may not die in terror"? For Christ is the Word of God, and therefore when they said: "We will not listen to that Voice," they meant: "We do not believe in Christ."

Again Moses spoke unto God and said: "Show me Thy Face."² And God said unto Moses: "No one can look upon My Face and live, but only as in a mirror. Turn thy face to the west and thou shalt see on the rock the reflection of My Face." When Moses saw the shadow of the Face of God, his own face shone with a brightness which was seven times brighter than the sun, and the light was so strong that the Children of Israel could not look upon his face except through a veil.

Moses saw that they did not desire to look upon the Face of God, for they said unto him: "Make unto us a veil so that we may see thy face."³

¹Numbers 11:16-24; Exodus 33:18-23

²Exodus 33:18-23

³Exodus 34:33

Having said these words, it is evident that they hate the hearing of His Word and the sight of His Face.

Moreover, when Abraham took his son Isaac up into Mount Carmel, God sent down from heaven a ram for the redemption of Isaac. And Isaac was not slaughtered. Abraham is to be interpreted as God the Father, and Isaac is to be interpreted as a symbol of Christ the Son.

And when He came down from heaven for the salvation of Adam and his sons, the Godhead which had come down from heaven was not slain, only His body was slain, the Godhead suffering in no wise and remaining unchanged. So then, the mortal become living in the resurrection with the Godhead.

Now it is clearly manifest that Christ the Son of God hath redeemed us... He hath magnified us men... and we must honour especially, both upon the earth and in heaven, this our Lady Mary the Virgin, the Mother of God, the Second Zion.

Hearken ye now to this explanation concerning the first man, who is our father Adam. Eve was created from a bone in his side, without carnal embrace or union, and she became his companion. But having heard the word of deception, from being the help meet of Adam she became a murderess by making him to transgress the command.

But in his mercy God the Father created the Pearl in the body of Adam; He cleansed Eve's body and sanctified it and made it into a dwelling for Adam's salvation. Thus Mary was born without blemish, for He made her pure without pollution, and she redeemed his debt without carnal union and embrace.

She brought forth in heavenly flesh a King, and He was born of her, and he renewed His life in the purity of His body. He slew death with His pure body, and he rose without corruption raising us up with him to immortality, to the throne of divinity, and he hath raised us up to Him, and we have exchanged life in our mortal bodies and found a life which is immortal. Through the transgression of Eve we died and were buried, and by the purity of Mary we received honour, and are exalted to the heights.

Ezekiel also prophesied concerning Mary, saying: "I saw a door in the east which was sealed with a great and marvellous seal, and there was none who went into it except the Lord of hosts; He went into it and came forth therefrom."¹

Hear ye now this explanation. When he saith: "I saw a door," it was the door of the gate of heaven, the entrance of the saints into the kingdom of the heavens. And when he saith: "It was in the east," he refers to her purity and her beauty. Men call her the "gate of salvation," and also "the East" unto whom the saints look to with joy and gladness.

The "closeness" of which he speaks refers to her virginity and her body; and when he said that she was sealed with "a great and wonderful seal" this showeth plainly that she was sealed by God, the Great and Wonderful, through the Holy Ghost.

Moreover, when he said: "None goeth through it except the Lord of host, He goeth in and cometh out," he means the Creator of the heavens and the earth, of angels, men and lords. The Lord of Hosts is the fruit of the Godhead, Who put on our body from her, Christ. He went into and came forth from her without polluting her.

Moses also prophesied concerning Mary, saying: "I saw a bramble bush on Mount Sinai which the devouring fire consumed not,"² and the meaning of this fire is the Godhead of the Son of God; and the bramble bush, which burned without the leaves thereof being consumed, is Mary.

85. THE MURMURING OF ISRAEL

Once again the Children of Israel murmured concerning the ministration of the priest before the Lord, saying: "Are we not Israel, of the seed of Abraham? Why cannot we also offer up sacrifice like them in the Tent of Witness by the Tabernacle of the Law of God, the holy Zion, with censers and incense and the holy instrument? Why should Moses and his brother Aaron and their children alone do this? Are we not people whom God hath chosen as much as them?" And when Moses heard this he said unto them: "Do ye whatsoever ye will."

¹Ezekiel 43:1

Then the elders of Israel went and made seventy censers with which they would perfume Zion and praise God, and they took incense and coals in the censers, and went into the Holy of Holies to offer up incense, but immediately after placing the incense into the censers, at the first swing of them fire came forth from the censers and they themselves were burnt up completely and melted away.

As wax melteth before the face of the fire, even so did they melt away; and as grass withereth away when flame approaches it even so were they consumed together with their instruments, and there was nothing left of them except their censers. And God said: "Sanctify to Me these censers for My Tent, and they shall be used for My offerings, for they were consecrated by the death of those men."¹

The censer is Mary. . . and Christ, the Son of God, the Godhead, is the coals, and the odour of the incense is the perfume of the righteousness of Christ, and through Him also the perfume of His Apostles, Prophets and Martyrs who have rejected the world and inherited the Kingdom of Heaven. The chains of the censers are the ladder which Jacob saw, to which the angels clung as they went up and came down; and upon the perfume of the incense the prayers of the pure in heart go up to the throne of God. When the flame had burned up the sinners, the people who were kinsmen of those who had been destroyed reviled Moses and Aaron, and said unto them: "Ye have made our elders to perish"; and they took up stones to stone Moses and Aaron.²

But God was exceedingly angry with Israel and He scorned as a filthy rag the counsel of Dathan and Abiram, the sons of Korah. Then the Word of God made a sign to the earth and the earth opened her mouth and swallowed them up, together with all their companions, their wives, their children and their beasts. They went down into Sheol (hell) alive, and the earth shut herself up over them. . . As for the people who had been associated with them and had heard the revilings upon Moses, God sent upon them a plague, and they died forthwith.

²Compare Exodus 17:4 and Numbers 16:41

Moses and Aaron came with incense and censers, and they wept before God, and entreated Him for forgiveness for the people, saying: "Remember, O Lord, Abraham Thy friend and Isaac Thy servant, and Israel Thy Holy one... for we are their seed and the children of Thy people. Cool Thy wrath in respect of us, and make haste to hear us. . . Destroy us not and remove Thy punishment from upon Thy people." And God the Merciful saw the sincerity of Moses, and had compassion upon them.

Then God spoke unto Moses, and said unto him: "Speak thou to this people and say unto them: 'Sanctify ye yourselves, and bring ye for each of the houses of your father a rod,' then write ye upon it so that ye may know their rods, thou and thy brother Aaron. Of your houses let Aaron write upon his rod, but upon thine own rod make no mark, for it shall be a perfect miracle for the children of thy people, and a vindication from the wicked and a sign of life for all those who believe."

86. THE ROD OF MOSES AND THE ROD OF AARON

Moses spoke these words unto them, and they brought a rod into each of the houses of their fathers which they had chosen for purity, and so there were twelve rods. And Moses wrote upon their rods the names of their fathers: on the rod of Aaron was written the name of Levi, on the rod of Adonyas was written the name of Reuben, and on the rod of every man of all the houses of Israel was written in like manner the name of his father.

And God said unto Moses: "Carry the rods of Zion to the Tent of Witness, and shut them up therein until the morning, then take them out before the men and give unto each of them his rod, according to the houses of their fathers whose names are written on the rods, and the man on whose rod a mark shall be found. . . it is he whom I have chosen to be priest to Me."

Moses told the people these words and they did according as God had commanded them. Then when the morning had come, Moses took the rods, and all the elders of Israel and Aaron also came. And Moses came before them and he lifted up the rods and brought them before all the people, and the rod of Aaron was found with the fruit and flower of an almond which emitted a fragrant perfume. And Moses said unto them: "Look ye now. This is the rod which the Lord your God hath chosen. . . fear ye Him and worship Him;" and all the people bowed down before God.

This rod is Mary. And the rod which, without water, burst into bloom indicates also Mary, from whom was born without the seed of man, the Word of God. And when he said: "I have chosen, I will make manifest a miracle, and he shall be priest to Me;" it means that God chose Mary out of all the congregation of Israel, even as David her father prophesied saying: "The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the habitations of Jacob,"¹ and he further said: "Marvellous is His speech concerning thee, O city of God."²

Thus, when he said: "More than all the habitations of Israel" and "her gates" he refers to the silence of her mouth, the purity of her lips and the praise which goeth forth from her mouth, like honey which floweth from her lips, and the purity of her virginity which was without spot or blemish or impurity before she brought forth; and after she had brought forth she was pure and holy, and so shall it be even as it was, unto all eternity.

And in the heavens she goeth about with the angels, a pure thing. . . and she is the rod of Aaron. Thus she liveth in Zion with the pot which is filled with manna, and with the two tables of stone that were written with the Finger of God. But the heavenly, spiritual Zion is above them, the holy Zion, the making and constitution of which are wonderful, and of which God Himself is her Maker and Fashioner, a true habitation of His glory.

And God again spoke unto Moses saying: "Make a Tabernacle of wood which is indestructible by worms and rot, and cover it over with plates of fine gold, every part thereof."³ The gold is the fineness of the Godhead that came down from heaven... and in like manner is plated with gold the Tabernacle, the abode of the heavenly Zion.

³Exodus 25:10 "an ark of shittim wood"

The Tabernacle is to be interpreted as Mary, and the wood which is indestructible is to be interpreted as Christ our Redeemer; and again the pot of gold inside the Tabernacle,¹ is to be interpreted as Mary, and the manna which is in the pot is to be interpreted as the body of Christ which came down from heaven, and the Word of God which is written upon the two tables is to be interpreted as Christ, the Son of God. The spiritual Zion then, is to be interpreted as the light of the Godhead.

The spiritual Pearl which is contained in the Tabernacle is like a brilliant gem of great price, and he who has acquired it holds it tightly in his hand, and while the gem is in his hand its owner goeth into the Tabernacle, and he is a priest therein. He who possesseth the Pearl is to be interpreted as the Word of God, Christ, and the spiritual Pearl which is grasped is to be interpreted as Mary, the Mother of the Light, through whom "Christos", the "Unmixed", assumed a body.

In her He made a temple for Himself of her pure body, and from her was born the Light of all Lights Who was born of His own free will and was not made by another, but He made a Temple for Himself through an incomprehensible wisdom which transcends the mind of man.

When God brought Israel out of Egypt, they thirsted for water in Kades and they murmured and wept before Moses, and Moses went to God with their laments. And God said unto him: "Take thy rod and strike this rock."² And Moses struck the rock in length and breadth in the form of the Cross and water flowed forth in twelve streams. And they drank their fill of the water, the people and their beasts, and when they had drunk, that rock followed after them.

The rock is to be interpreted as Christ, the streams of water as the Apostles, that which they drank as the teaching of the gospel, and the rod as the wood of the Cross. And that rock is firm: "He who buildeth upon a rock shall not be moved by the demons."³ And again He said "I am the door."⁴

¹Exodus 16:33 "take a pot and put an omer of manna therein"

²Exodus 17:6

³Matthew 7:24-25

⁴John 10:7-9

“Thou art the rock,” He said unto Peter. “And upon thee I will build the Christian people.”¹ And again he said: “I am the Shepherd of the sheep² and he said unto him thrice: “Feed my sheep.”³ And again He said: “I am the stem of the vine... Ye are its branches and its clusters of fruit.”⁴

The rod of Moses by means of which he performed the miracle is to be interpreted as the wood of the Cross, with which he delivered Adam and his children from the punishments of devils.

As Moses smote the water of the river and turned it into blood and slew their fish, in like manner Christ slew death with His Cross and brought them out of Sheol. And as Moses smote the air with his rod and the whole land of Egypt became dark for three days and three nights⁵ with darkness which could be felt, so that the Egyptians could not rise from their beds, so Christ, being crucified upon the Cross, brightened the darkness of the hearts of men and rose up from the dead on the third day.

And as the rod of Moses changed itself and transformed itself by the Word of God,⁶ being dry yet possessing life, and possessing life yet becoming a dry thing, even so Christ with the wood of the Cross made life for the people who believe on Him, and with the Sign of the Cross made them to drive away devils.

Verily, demons and Christians became changed. The spiritual beings became reprobates and through transgressing the commandment of their Lord they became exiled ones by the might of His Cross. But we have become spiritual beings through receiving His Body and Blood, in place of those spiritual beings who were exiled, and we are now souls worthy of praise who have believed in His Cross and His Resurrection.

Therefore, as Moses smote the mountains by stretching out his hands with his rod, and brought forth punishments by the command of God, even so Christ drove out the demons from men by the might of His Cross. When God said unto Moses: “Smite with the rod,” He meant: “Make the Sign of the Cross of Christ,” and when God said unto Moses:

¹Matthew 16:18

⁴John 15:5,16

²John 10:11,14

⁵Exodus 10:21-22

³John 21:17

⁶Exodus 7:10

“Stretch out thy hand,”¹ He meant that by the spreading out of His hand Christ hath redeemed us from the servitude of the enemy and hath given us life by the stretching out of His hand upon the wood of the Cross.

When Amalek fought with Israel, Moses went up into the mountain, and Aaron was with him. They went up to pray because Amalek was prevailing. And God commanded Moses and said unto him: “Stretch out thy hand until Israel gets power over Amalek.”²

The hands of Moses were held out until sunset, but they became heavy and he being weary dropped his hands, and then Israel ceased to prevail and their enemies overcame them. But when Moses kept his hands out straight Amalek was overcome... and Israel put to flight and vanquished their enemy Amalek.

When Aaron and Hur saw this they piled up stones on the right and on the left of Moses, and they made the hand of Moses to rest on the stones which they had built up, and Aaron on his right and Hur on his left held Moses with their shoulders, so that his hands might not drop from their stretched out position.

²Exodus 17:11-12

The war of Amalek against Israel is the war of believers against demons, and before Christ was crucified the demons had conquered the believers. But when he stretched out his hands on the wood of the Cross because of the sin of Adam and his children, and his palm was pierced with nails, those who were sealed with the Sign of the Cross of Christ conquered the demons.

The stretching out of the hands of Moses symbolizes the Cross of Christ; and that Aaron and Hur piled up stones indicates the wood of the Cross and the nails. Also, Aaron represents the thief on the right and Hur the thief on the left. Then Amalek represents the demons, and the king of Amalek symbolizes Satan. As concerning that the Amalekites were conquered, this signifies that we have conquered demons and Satan by the Resurrection of Christ and by His Cross.

When Israel went out of bondage in Egypt, they came to bitter water which they could not drink, and they lamented because of the bitterness of the water. And God said unto Moses: "Lift up thy rod and cast it into the water,¹ and sign it with the sign of the Cross right and left." Had God said unto him: "Let it become sweet," then the water would have become sweet. But He made manifest that by the Sign of the Cross of Jesus Christ every polluted thing becometh good and pleasant.

So now, I will declare unto thee from the prophets concerning His Crucifixion. David said: "They have pierced my hands and my feet."²

And again He said: "They made Me drink vinegar for my thirst."³ The Breath of Life that had breathed upon Adam drank vinegar, and the Hand that had made the earth was pierced with a nail. He who for the sake of Adam abased Himself, was born and took the form of a servant.

87. PARABLE OF THE TWO SLAVES (THE DEVIL AND ADAM)

A certain king had two slaves; one was arrogant and strong, and the other was humble and weak. And the arrogant overcame the humble one and smote him and all but killed him, and robbed him, and the king upon his throne saw them. And the king descended and seized the arrogant slave, beat him and crushed him, bound him in fetters and cast him into a place of darkness.

¹Compare Exodus 15:25

²Psalms 22:16

³Psalms 69:21

Then he raised up his humble and weak slave, embraced him and brushed away the dust from him, washed him and poured oil and wine on his wounds and set him upon his horse and brought him into his city; and he set him upon his throne and seated him on his right hand.

The king is in truth Christ, th arrogant servant is Satan, and the humble servant is Adam. When Christ saw how the arrogant servant overcame the humble one and cast him upon the ground, He came down from His throne and raised up Adam His servant, and bound Satan in fetters and in the terror of Sheol.

Then He seated the body of Adam upon the throne of his Godhead, and magnified him and exalted him, and honoured him; and he was praised by all the beings whom He had created, the angels and the archangels, thousands and tens of thousands of spiritual beings. For He brought down low the arrogant one and rose up the humble.

He reduced the arrogant to shame and exalted to honour the humble. He rejected the arrogant and loved the humble, and He scorned the haughty and had pity on the lowly... He cast down the arrogant from this high place, and lifted up the poor out of the dust. He snatched away the mighty one from his honour, and raised up the poor from corruption, for with Him are honour and disgrace. Whom He wisheth to honour He honoureth, and whom He wisheth to disgrace He disgraceth.

88. HOW THE ANGELS REBELLED AGAINST GOD WHEN HE CREATED ADAM

There were certain angels with whom God was wroth (He the Knower of hearts knew them), for they reviled Adam, saying: "God hath shown love to him and hath set us to minister unto him... likewise the beasts and creeping things, the fish of the sea, the birds of the air and all fruits... the trees of the field, the heavens and the earth also. He hath appointed the heavens to give him rain and the earth to give him fruits.

The sun and the moon also hath He given him, the sun to give him light by day and the moon to give him light by night. He hath fashioned him with His own fingers and He hath created him in His own image; He kissed him and breathed into him spirit of life, and He said unto him, 'My son, My firstborn, My beloved.' And He set him in a garden to eat and enjoy himself without sickness or suffering and without toil and labour, but He hath commanded him not to eat from one tree. And being given all these things by God, Adam transgressed and ate of that tree. . . and he became hated and rejected, and God drove him out of the garden; since that time Adam, abandoned his hope, for he transgressed the commandment of his Creator."

Then God answered the angels who reviled Adam and He said unto them: "Why do ye revile Adam in this manner? For he is flesh and blood, ashes and dust." And the angels answered and said unto him: "May we declare before Thee the sin of Adam?" And God said unto them: "Declare ye his sin and I will hearken unto you, and I Myself will answer you in respect of Adam My servant." For God loved His son, Adam.

And God said: "I created him out of the dust, and I will not cast away that which I have fashioned. I brought him out of non-existence, and I will not make My handiwork a laughing stock for his enemies." And those angels responded, saying: "Praise be unto Thee, O Lord. For Thou, the Knower of hearts, knowest that we have reviled Adam because he transgressed Thy commandment, that he was not to eat of one tree after Thou hast made him lord over everything which Thou hast created, and hath set him over every work of Thy hands.

If Thou had not told him, and if Thou had not commanded him not to eat of one tree, there would have been no offence on his part; and if he had eaten because of a lack of food there would have been no offence on his part.

But thy word made him to know, and Thou hadst said: 'As surely as thou eatest of this tree thou shalt die.'¹ Yet he after hearing this became bold and ate. Thou didst not let him lack sweet fruits to eat from the Garden, and Thou didst not let him lack one to comfort him... a companion like unto himself. So then, these things we say and make known unto Thee, and we have declared unto Thee how he hath transgressed Thy commandment."

Then the Merciful One, the Lover of Mankind, answered them on behalf of Adam, and said unto them: "You have I created out of fire and air with the one intent that ye should praise Me. Him have I created of twice as many elements as you; of dust and water, and of wind and fire; and he became a being of flesh and blood. And in him are ten thoughts or intentions; five good and five evil. If his heart incites him to good, then he walks with good intent; but if the devil seduces him, he walketh with him on an evil path.

As for you, ye have no other object in your minds but praise of Me, with the exception of that arrogant one who produced evil and became an evil being, and was driven forth from your assembly. And now... why do ye magnify yourselves over Adam? If ye were as he is, and I had created you of water and dust also, ye would have been flesh and blood and ye would have transgressed My commandment more than he hath done, and denied My word."

And the angels said unto Him: "Praise be unto Thee O Lord! Far be it from us! We will not transgress Thy commandment, and we will not oppose Thy word, for we are spiritual beings for life and he is a creature of dust, doomed to folly. So now try us well, and put us to the test so that Thou mayest know whether we are able to keep Thy word."

When the angels had exalted themselves in this manner, God, the Lover of Mankind, said unto them: "If ye go astray in transgressing My word, the wrong will be upon your own heads, then hell, fire and sulphur, fervent heat and whirlwind shall be your habitation until the Great Day... And ye shall be kept in chains which can neither be loosened nor broken for ever. But if ye keep truly My word and do My commandment, ye shall sit at My right hand and at My left hand... for everyone who hath conquered is mighty, and he who is conquered shall be overpowered.

Satan hath no power whatsoever, for he hath only what he maketh to germinate in the mind. He cannot grasp firmly nor perform anything, he cannot beat and he cannot drag away, he cannot seize and he cannot fight; he can only make thoughts to develop silently in the mind. Then him who is caught by the evil mind, he prepareth for destruction; but if a man hath conquered the evil mind he findeth grace and hath a reward which is everlasting.

And now, according to what ye wish there shall be upon you the mind of a man and the body of a man. But take good heed to yourselves that ye transgress not My word and break not My commandment; and defile not yourselves with eating, drinking, fornication, or with any other evil thing whatsoever; and transgress ye not My word.”

Immediately there were given unto them by His word, flesh and blood, and a heart like the children of men. And those angels were pleased to leave the heights of heaven... and they came down to earth, to the folly of the dancing of the children of Cain with all their man-made idols which they had made in the folly of their fornication, and to their singing which they accompanied with the tambourine, flutes, pipes, and much shouting and loud cries of joy and noisy songs.

The daughters of men were there and they enjoyed the orgies without shame, for they scented themselves for the men who pleased them, and they lost the balance of their minds. The men did not restrain themselves for a moment, but they took from among the women those whom they desired, and they committed unspeakable abominations with them.¹

God was wroth with them, so He bound them in the terror of Sheol until the day of redemption; as the Apostle said: “He treated His angels with severity. He spared them not, but made them to dwell in a state of judgment, and they were chained until the Great Day.”²

Thus the Word of God conquered; He had fashioned Adam in His likeness and image, and those who had reviled and made a laughing stock of Adam were conquered.

²II Peter 2:4

The daughters of Cain with whom the angels had sinned conceived, but they were unable to bring forth their children and they died. Of the children which were in their wombs, some died and some did come forth by splitting open the bellies of their mothers.

They came forth by their navels, and when they were grown up they became giants whose height reached into the clouds; but for their sake and the sake of sinners the wrath of God became quiet, and He said: "My Spirit shall only rest on them for one hundred and twenty years, then I will destroy them with the waters of the flood... them and all sinners who have not believed the Word of God."

To those who believed the word of their fathers and did His will, no injury came from the waters of the flood, but He delivered them, saying: "If thou believest My word thou canst save thyself from the flood." And Noah said: "O Lord, I believe Thy word, make me to know by what means I can be saved." And God said unto him: "Thou canst be saved from the water by wood." Then Noah said: "How, O Lord?"

And God said unto him: "Make thyself a four-sided ark and build it with the work of the carpenter, and make for it three storeys inside, and go into it with all thy house."¹

Noah believed the word of God, made the ark and was saved. God could have given unto Noah wings like the eagle and transported him to the country of the living with all his household, until His anger with the sinners who had not believed the word of God had cooled; or He could have lifted him up into the air, or He could have commanded the water of the flood which was like a wall, not to approach the one mountain where He could make Noah to dwell with his sons, and not to submerge the beasts and cattle which he wanted.

But know ye this, God was well pleased that by means of wood which had been sanctified, the salvation of His creation should take place...that is, through the ark and the wood of the Cross.

¹Genesis 6:14

God said unto Noah: "Make that whereby thou shalt be saved," that is to say, the Tabernacle of the Church; and when He said unto him: "Make it four-sided," He showed that the Sign of the Cross was fourfold.

The four corners of the ark are the horns of the altar... and He commanded Moses to make the ark (the Ark of the Covenant) out of indestructible wood. He said: "I will sanctify thee from filth, from impurity, fornication, vindictiveness and falsehood, together with thy brother and thy house. Now, sacrifice unto Me a clean sacrifice with cleanness, and I will accept thee after thou hast sanctified thyself and thy house; command all the people to sanctify themselves, for My holy things must be offered by holy ones.

And this thou shalt seek, the Tabernacle of My Covenant which I have created for My praise. Then, if ye come to Me with purity of heart, with love and peace, without mockery and reviling, and if ye will make right your hearts in respect of Me and your neighbour, I will hear your prayers, and I will listen to your petitions about everything which ye submit to Me, and I will come and be with you, and I will walk among you and I will dwell in your hearts, and ye shall be unto Me My people, and I will be your God in truth."

89. CONCERNING HIM THAT EXISTETH IN EVERYTHING

Again God said unto Moses: "Make for Me an open space before the courtyard of the Tabernacle; no man who is impure sexually and unclean shall come there, and no one who is not pure. For I am there, and not only there, but in every place where My name is invoked in purity.

I was with Daniel in the lion's den and I was with Jonah in the belly of the great fish. I stand under the deepest deep so that the mountains may not sink down upon the waters; and I am under the waters so that they may not sink down upon the fire and sulphur; I stand under the fire and sulphur so that they may not sink down upon the winds and the void.

I stand under the deepest darkness and under the abysses, and every created thing supports itself on Me, and everything which I have created cometh to me as a place of refuge.

I am above the earth and I am at the ends of the world... I am Master of everything. I am in the air, My place of abode, and I am above the chariot of the Cherubim, and I am praised everlastingly by all the angels and by holy men. I am above the heights of the heaven and I fill everything. I am above the Seven Heavens.

I see everything and I test everything, and there is no other god besides Me, neither in the heaven above nor in the earth beneath; there is none like unto Me, saith God. My hand hath laid the foundations of the earth and My right hand hath made strong the heavens; I and My Son and My Holy Spirit."

90. THE REJECTION OF THE WORD

Let us weep for them... for the wickedness of the iniquitous Jews. Woe be unto the Jews and unto pagans who have wandered from the truth and have refused to submit to the love of God, with which in His goodness He hath loved man. For after Adam was rejected through his sin, He saved him by the greatness of His mercy, being crucified on the wood of the Cross, His hands pierced with nails.

With His palms stretched out in humility and His head bowed to one side, He to whom suffering was unfitting, for our sakes suffered in the everlasting majesty of His Godhead. He died that He might destroy death; He suffered exhaustion that He might give strength to the weakened man of dust; being thirsty he drank vinegar and He was crowned with a crown of thorns.

He feared not and was not ashamed by the cunning, the hatred and the spitting of the polluted Jews. From them He suffered beatings and was punched with fists... He was pierced and transfixed with nails, He was mocked and reviled though He is God and the King of Death, He, the Bestower of Glory Who endured patiently all disgrace.

Wearied and miserable they made Him sad when they rejected Him and hated Him; yet strong and glorious, they saddened Him when they brought false charges against Him.

For He Himself knew His Godhead, He knew His glory and He knew Himself. And there was none who knew Him for He was the Creator of everything. If they had known Him they would not have crucified the Lord of Glory.

He had said in His Mercy: “Forgive them Father, for they know not what they do.”¹ They thought their Creator was a created being, and so they slew the Man-God who did not belong to mortal creatures. He was not something that had been made by hands, but He Himself was the Maker and the Creator, Light of Lights, God of gods, Son of the Father, Jesus Christ.

Isaiah, the man of keen words among the prophets, said: “He was a humble man, and His appearance was rejected, like a root He hid Himself in parched ground, He came in the flesh as a being of the earth though He was the Sustainer and Saviour of the universe.”²

Concerning the Jews, those enemies of the truth, He said: “I have called for them and they have not answered Me, I have loved them and they have hated Me.”³ And David had said: “They returned unto me evil for good, and they hated me in return for my love for them.”⁴ Again the prophet Isaiah said: “With their lips they profess love for me, but in their hearts they keep afar from me, and their worshipping of me is an empty thing.”⁵

Thus God rewarded the Jews according to their wickedness and He treated the Gentiles according to their humility, for He is merciful and compassionate to those who call upon Him, who take refuge in Him, and who purify themselves from all uncleanness, also loving those who weep and repent.

Stephen had spoken unto the Jews whilst he was standing up to martyrdom and the Jews were killing him with stones; and he said unto them as he showed them their folly in not having kept the commandments of God: “Ye have not kept the Law according to the ordinance of the angels, as ye received it." When they heard this they went mad with anger and gnashed their teeth.¹

91. THE HORNS OF THE ALTAR

The Tabernacle symbolizes the horns of the altar where the holy priests offer up sacrifice, whereon they place the table, the similitude of the grave wherein Christ was buried in Golgotha.

On the table the offering is a symbol of the firstborn, the body of Immanuel, the "pure," the "unmixed" body which our Saviour took from Mary and of which He said unto His apostles: "Eat ye My Body;² whosoever eateth not of My Body hath no portion with Me and no everlasting life.

But he who hath eaten My Body, even though he be dead, shall live for ever, for he is associated with My Body and My Blood and he hath become My heir, and he shall say to My Father: 'Our Father which art in heaven,' and the Father shall answer him, saying: 'Thou art my Son'."

92. THE ARK OF NOAH AND THE TALK OF THE WICKED

God saved Noah in the Ark and God held converse with Abraham in the wood of Manbar,³ the wood that cannot be destroyed, and He saved Isaac by means of the ram which was caught in the thicket⁴ and He made Jacob wealthy by means of three rods of wood which he laid in running water,⁵ and through the top of his staff Jacob was also blessed.⁶ And he said unto Moses, "Make a tabernacle of wood which cannot be destroyed, make it in the similitude of Zion the Tabernacle of the Covenant." And when David took it from the city of Samaria, he placed the Tabernacle of the Law in a new abode and he rejoiced before it.⁷

¹Acts 7:53, 54

³Compare Genesis 18:1 (Manbar or Mamre)

⁵Genesis 30:37-43

⁷II Samuel 6:3

²Matthew 26:26

⁴Genesis 22:13

⁶Genesis 47:31; Hebrew 11:21

From the beginning God had made the Tabernacle the means of salvation and many signs and wonders were performed through it, for God had ordained salvation through the wood of His Cross, in the Tabernacle of His Law, from the beginning to the end.

Salvation came unto Adam through the wood, as Adam's first transgression also came through the fruit of the wood. Those who come into His habitation and are accepted in the holy Tabernacle, and who pray unto Him with all their hearts, He will hear and will save in the day of their tribulation and He will fulfill their desire, for He hath made the holy Tabernacle to be a similitude of His throne.

The similitude and the fruit thereof are the Mother of the Redeemer, Mary. It is right that we should worship her, as in her name is blessed the Tabernacle of the Law of God. And it is right that we should worship Michael and Gabriel. When it was said unto Him: "Behold them, Thy father and Thy mother outside seeking Thee," Christ the Lover of Mankind answered and stretching out His hand towards those whom He was teaching, said: "Behold them, My father, My mother and My brother. Whosoever hath heard My word and hath done the Will of My Father, that same is My father and My mother and My sister."¹

O Thou blind-hearted Jew, canst thou not see His Mercy and His love for humanity when He spake thus? He neither separated nor made a distinction, but He said unto them: "My brother"; for He loveth those who love Him and keep His commandments.

And now, we will declare unto you what is written concerning the pride of Pharaoh. Moses did as God commanded him and turned his rod into a serpent, and Pharaoh commanded the magicians and the sorcerers to do the same with their rods. And they made their rods into three serpents which by means of magic wriggled before Moses and Aaron, and before Pharaoh and the nobles of Egypt.

But the rod of Moses swallowed up the rods of the magicians, for those deceivers had worked magic for the sight of the eyes of men, not knowing that that which happens through the Word of God overcomes every king of magic that can be performed.

¹Compare Matt. 12:49; Mark 3:34

93. THE BELIEF OF ABRAHAM

Abraham and David and all the prophets, one after the other, prophesied concerning the coming of the Son of God... and they were justified by faith. Abraham had said: "Wilt Thou in my days, O Lord, cast Thy word upon the ground?" And God said unto him: "By no means. His time hath not yet come, but I will show thee a similitude of His coming. Get thee over the Jordan, dip thyself in the water as thou goest over, and arrive at the city of Salem where thou shalt meet Melchizedek, and I will command him to show thee the sign and similitude of Him."

Abraham did this and he found Melchizedek and he gave him the mystery of the bread and wine,¹ that same which is celebrated in our Passover as a memorial of the sacrifice of our Lord Jesus Christ.

This was the desire and the joy of Abraham as he went round the altar which Melchizedek had made, carrying branch and palm on the day of the Sabbath. See how he rejoiced in his belief, and see how he was justified by his belief, O blind Jew, who though having eyes seest not, and having ears hearest not, even as the prophet Isaiah saith concerning you: "Their eyes are blind and their hearts are covered with darkness, so that they may not understand and God may not show compassion unto them."²

94. PROPHECIES CONCERNING THE COMING OF CHRIST

Isaiah the prophet prophesied concerning His coming, saying: "A son is born unto us. A child is given unto us. Dominion is written upon His shoulder. He is God, strong in rulership, King, great Counsellor is His Name."³

The meaning of this is manifest: the Son of God is born, whose sovereignty was written down before the world was, and He is wiser than anyone else.

¹Genesis 14:18

²Compare Isaiah 6:10; 44:18

³Isaiah 9:6

Again Isaiah prophesied and said: "Behold My servant Whom I have chosen, on Whom is the delight of My soul, and the nations shall put their confidence in Him."¹ By these words we understand that Christ is the Spirit of God, the Word of the Father Who put on our flesh and was born for us; and the people of Rome and Ethiopia and all other nations have believed in Him.

And unto the people of Israel He spake and prophesied saying: "Many shall follow after Thee with their loins girded up and their backs bound with chains, and they shall pray to Thee and worship Thee, for Thou art God, and we have not recognized Thee."²

This he said because Israel had made itself blind and crucified Him, and refused to walk in His righteousness. Thus when Isaiah prophesied saying: "God shall come, and the heathen shall put their trust in Him and shall know Him"³ he meant that Christ shall come and the Jews shall reject Him, but the heathen shall believe in Him.

Again he prophesied and said: "Be strong, ye weak hands and tired knees, and rejoice ye hearts that are cast down, for God hath come and shall blot out our debt and save us. He shall open the eyes of the blind and He shall make the ears of the deaf to hear; the feet that are lame shall run and the tongue of the dumb shall speak."⁴

These words are spoken in respect of those who sin by worshipping idols, and those who are dead in error and whose hearts are darkened, and of you who do not know that God created you.

Rejoice ye this day for He hath come who will redeem the sin of Adam, and make Adam's debt His own. He was crucified being sinless and He hath killed death by means of His own death. This is the meaning of this prophecy.

Of Him, David' the Prophet prophesied and said: "God shall come in visible form, and our God will not keep silence."⁵

¹Isaiah 42:1

²Compare Jeremiah 30:6-9

Also Jeremiah prophesied and said: "God shall come down upon the earth, and shall walk about with men like us."¹

Then Ezekiel the prophet prophesied and said: "I your God will come, and I will walk about among them, and they shall know Me that I am their God."²

Again David prophesied and said: "Blessed is He who cometh in the name of God; we have blessed you in the name of the Lord."³

Solomon his son prophesied and said: "Verily God shall be with men, and He shall walk about upon the earth."⁴

And his father David hath prophesied, saying: "He shall come down like the dew upon wool, and like the drop which waters the earth, and righteousness shall spring into being in his days."⁵

And again Solomon, David's son, prophesied and said: "A Saviour shall be born out of Zion, and He shall remove all sin from Jacob..."⁶

Thus Micah the Prophet prophesied and said: "The Word of God shall appear in Jerusalem, and the Law shall go forth from Zion."⁷

And Zechariah the Prophet prophesied and said: "Rejoice, O daughter of Zion. Behold, I am alive, and I will dwell in thee, saith God, the Holy one of Israel."⁸

Thus prophesied David the Prophet, saying: "And He shall live, and they shall give Him of the gold of Arabia, and they shall pray for Him continually, and He shall be the strength of all the earth upon the tops of the mountains."⁹

Again Isaiah the Prophet prophesied, saying: "Behold, the virgin shall conceive and shall bring forth a Son, and she shall call His name Emmanuel."¹⁰

Of Him David the Prophet prophesied, saying: "I brought thee forth from the womb before the star of the morning."¹ And again he said: "God said unto me: 'Thou art my Son, and I have this day brought thee forth'."² And again he said: "God looked down from heaven upon the children of men, and from the temple of His sanctuary."³

Moses the Prophet prophesied and said: "And all the children of God shall say, 'He is strong, for He will avenge the blood of his sons'."⁴

Thus David prophesied and said: "And there will I make the horn of David to rise up, and I will prepare a lamp for my anointed, and I will clothe his enemies with shame, and in him shall my holiness flourish."⁵ Again David said: "A people whom I do not know shall serve me; at the first hearing of my word they shall answer me."⁶ And to the Jews he said: "The children of the stranger have become old and have travelled proudly on their path. God liveth, and blessed is my God."⁷

When he saith unto thee: "God liveth," he speaketh of His Godhead; and when he saith unto thee: "And blessed is my God," he speaketh concerning his putting on the flesh of Adam. And again he speaketh concerning His putting on the flesh in Isaiah the Prophet, saying: "Who is this glorious One who cometh from Edom. Adonai, Who came down from heaven and put on the things of Bozrah, glorious in majesty?"⁸

When he saith "glorious" he refereth to His sweet odour; and when he saith "Adonai" he meaneth the Word of the Father Who was before the world was, the Son of God; and when he saith: "He put on the things of Bozrah, the glorious in majesty," he indicateth clearly the body of Adam.

Concerning Christians, David the Prophet prophesied, saying: "Declare ye to the nations that God is King and that He hath made firm the world so that it shall never be moved."⁹ And concerning His coming to the nations, he said: "Before the face of God shall He come, He shall come

Thus Isaiah the Prophet prophesied and said: “The Lord of hosts shall destroy the evil of the nations, and He shall bring to nothing the nobles and the mighty ones of the earth.”² Continuing his prophecy he said: “He shall come and shall build His house, and He shall deliver His people.”³

Then he added these words, saying: “And at that time there shall spring from the root of Jesse, One Who shall reign over the nations, and the nations shall put their trust in Him and the place where He shall abide shall be glorious for ever.”⁴

Again David prophesied, and said: “Sing ye unto God Who abides in Zion, and declare ye to the nations His work.”⁵

Thus Solomon his son prophesied concerning our Saviour Emmanuel, the Sun of Righteousness, saying: “He brought me forth before the hills and established me before the world was, before He made the earth and the heavens. Before the floods of waters came forth and the beauty of the flowers appeared... and even before the winds blew, God created His work for his glory, and I existed along with My Father.”⁶

And David his father again prophesied and said: “His name was before the sun, and before the moon, from generation to generation.”⁷

Thus his son Solomon prophesied and said: “When He made strong the firmament above the clouds, and when He set in position the boundaries of the heavens... and when He set the sea in its appointed place, and before He founded His throne above the winds, and when He made strong the foundations of the earth... I existed along with Him.”⁸

Then Ezekiel the Prophet prophesied and said: “The face of My God is in the East, and His light is brighter than the sun, and the nations put their trust in His Name.”⁹

For I have given water in the desert, and made streams of water to flow in the wilderness, so that I may give to My people and to My chosen ones, that they may declare My glory and perform My commandment."¹

Solomon prophesied and said of Him: "Who hath gone up into heaven and come down? And Who hath gathered together the winds in his bosom, and collected the waters in his hand, and the heavens on the palm of his hand? What is his name and what is the name of his son?"²

Thus Malachi the Prophet prophesied and said unto the Jews: "I have no pleasure in you, saith God Who ruleth all things. And I have no pleasure in your offerings, and I will accept no gift from your hands. For from the rising of the sun to its setting shall My Name be praised among all peoples, and in all countries incense shall be offered up to My great Name, saith Almighty God."³

Then Micah the Prophet prophesied saying: "A new covenant shall appear upon the mountain of God, and it shall be prepared upon the tops of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills, and the people shall say: 'Come ye, let us go up into the mountain of God.' And many nations shall go there and they shall declare unto us His way, and we will walk therein."⁴

David he Prophet again prophesied and said: "Hearken unto Me O My people, and I will speak unto thee Israel, and will bring testimony to thee... I am God, thy God."⁵

Thus Moses the Prophet prophesied and said concerning the Godhead: "Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God is One."¹ And this is to be explained thus; Father, and Son, and Holy Spirit are One God, Whose kingdom is one, Whose dominion is one, and as One shall men worship Them in the heavens and upon the earth, and in the depths of the seas. Unto Him be praise for ever and ever!

95. CHRIST'S GLORIOUS ENTRANCE INTO JERUSALEM

The prophets have prophesied concerning His glorious entrance into Jerusalem. Isaiah the Prophet said: "Shine thou, shine thou Jerusalem, thy light hath come and the glory of God hath risen upon thee."²

And the Prophet Zechariah prophesied saying: "Rejoice, rejoice daughter of Zion, and let Jerusalem shout for joy."³

And David prophesied and said: "Out of the mouth of children and babes Thou hast ordained strength because of the enemy, so that Thou mightest overthrow the enemy and the avenger."⁴

His son Solomon also prophesied and said: "The children are taught by God, and the peoples rejoice within thee."⁵

Again David his father prophesied and said: "Blow ye the horn in Zion on the day of the next moon, on the appointed day of our festival, for it is an ordinance for Israel."⁶

Then Ezra the Scribe prophesied and said: "Get ye out, make ye a festival in gladness and say unto the daughter of Zion, 'Rejoice thou, behold thy King hath come'."⁷

Isaiah, the Prophet prophesied and said: "Rejoice thou Jerusalem, rejoice thou. Behold, thy King hath come riding upon an ass. His reward is with Him, and His work is before His face."⁸

⁸Isaiah 52:11

Thus David the Prophet prophesied and said: “Blessed is He who cometh in the name of the Lord.”¹

Jacob the son of Isaac also prophesied and said: “Judah, thy brethren have praised thee, thy hand is upon the back of thine enemies and the children of thy mother shall worship thee. And the dominion shall not diminish from Judah, and the government shall not depart from his children, until he shall find Him Who hath been waited for, and Who is the Hope of the Nations.”²

And he also prophesied and said: “His teeth are white as snow and His eyes are glad as with wine, and He shall wash His garments in wine and His tunic in the blood of clusters of grapes.”³ Again he prophesied and said: “Judah is a lion’s cub; thou hast lain down and thou hast slept; no one shall wake him except him that hunteth until he findeth him; rise up from thy strong place.”⁴

And Jacob blessed his son Judah, and said unto him: “There is a King who shall go forth from thee and shall wash His garments in wine, and glorious is the place of rest of the Beloved.” By “Beloved” Christ is meant, and by “Messiah” Christ is meant, and Jesus meaneth “Saviour of the people.” The prophets mention Christ under a secret name which interpreted means “the Beloved.”

96. THE CRUCIFIXION

The Prophets also prophesied concerning the Crucifixion of Christ.

Moses, the servant of God, prophesied and said: “Ye shall see your salvation crucified upon the wood, and shall not believe.”

David prophesied and said: “Many dogs have seized Me, and they drove nails through My hands and My feet; and they counted all my bones; and though they knew Me they despised Me, and they divided My garments among themselves and they cast lots for My apparel.”⁵

²Genesis 49:8-10

³Genesis 49:11-12

⁴Genesis 49:9

⁵Psalm 22:16

Isaiah prophesied concerning the Incarnation and Crucifixion of Christ, and said: "Who believeth our word, and unto whom is the arm of the Lord revealed? And we spake as a child before Him; and He is like a root in parched ground, He hath no beauty and no form; and His form is more rejected and abased than that of any man. He is a broken man and a man of suffering; for He hath turned away His face, and they treat Him with contempt and esteem Him as nothing."¹

Then he added these words, saying: "He hath taken our disease and carried our sickness, and by His wounds we are healed; and we saw Him suffering and wounded... and He opened not His mouth in His pain, and He came to be slaughtered; like a lamb before His shearer He opened not His mouth in His suffering until they took away His life and they knew not of His birth; through the sin of My people have I come even unto death."²

Jeremiah the Prophet prophesied and said: "And they took the price of the honourable one, thirty pieces of silver, he whom they had honoured among the Children of Israel. And God said unto me: 'Cast it into the melting pot, and test it and see if it be pure;' and they gave it to the potter's field. As God hath commanded me I will speak."³

Isaiah the Prophet prophesied and said: "They counted Him with the sinners, and brought Him to death."⁴

David the Prophet prophesied and said: "Those who hate me wrongfully are many, and they have rewarded Me with evil for good."⁵

Zechariah the Prophet prophesied and said: "And they shall look upon Him Whom they have crucified and pierced."⁶

And there are still many passages which have been written and many prophecies which might be mentioned concerning His coming, His Crucifixion, His death, His Resurrection and His second coming in glory.

97. THE RESURRECTION

David prophesied concerning His Resurrection and said: “I will arise, saith the Lord, and I will make salvation and manifest it openly.”²

Again he saith: “Rise up, O Lord, and judge the earth, for thou shalt inherit among the nations.”³ He also prophesied and said: “Rise up, O Lord, help us and deliver us for Thy Name’s sake.”⁴ And, “Let God arise and let His enemies be scattered, and let His enemies flee from before His face.”⁵

Isaiah the Prophet prophesied and said: “He will remove sickness from His soul, for he hath not committed sin, and falsehood hath not been found in his mouth. And to him that hath served righteously and good, will he show light and he will justify him; and he shall do away with the sins of many, for he hath not committed sin and falsehood is not found in his mouth.”⁶

Again David the Prophet prophesied and said: “For my soul shall not be left in hell.”⁷

And Solomon his son prophesied and said: “The Sun of Righteousness shall arise and shall travel towards the right, and shall return into His place.”⁸

98. THE ASCENSION OF CHRIST AND HIS SECOND COMING

All the prophets prophesied concerning His ascension and His second coming to judge the living and the dead.

David said concerning His Resurrection: "He hath gone up into the heights. Thou hast made captivity captive, and hast given grace unto the children of men."¹ And he also said: "Having gone forth, I will come back and I will return from the vastness of the sea."² And: "Sing ye unto God Who hath gone up into the heavens which are opposite the morning."³

Amos the Prophet also prophesied and said: "The Messiah, He Who made the time of the morning, hath come and is exalted from earth into the heights; and His name is God Who ruleth all things."⁴

Thus prophesied David the Prophet, saying: "Thou art exalted O Lord by Thy might, and we will praise and sing to Thy strength."⁵

Zechariah the Prophet prophesied and said: "His foot standeth on the Mount of Olives to the east of Jerusalem. And He rideth upon the Cherubim, and He flieth upon the wings of the wind."⁶

David said: "Open ye the gates of the princes and let the doors which were from the creation be opened, and the King of glory shall come! Who is the King of glory? God, the mighty and strong One, God, the mighty One in battle. The Lord God of Hosts is this King."⁷

Zechariah the Prophet prophesied and said: "On that day the Lord my God shall come, and all His saints with Him."⁸ Again David the prophet prophesied and said: "God spake once, and this according to what I have heard: compassion belongeth to God. And Thine, O Lord, is the power, for Thou shalt reward every man according to his work."⁹

⁶Zechariah 14:4; Psalm 18:10

⁷Psalm 24:7-8

⁹Psalm 62:11-12

Then Daniel the Visionary prophesied and said: "I saw in my vision by night, and behold, there came one like unto the Son of man to the Ancient of Days, and there were given unto Him dominion, glory and sovereignty, and all the nations and peoples and countries shall serve Him, and His dominion shall have no end for ever and ever."¹

And so, all the Prophets prophesied, and nothing hath happened without the prophecy of the Prophets. And they have declared everything that hath happened, and what shall happen, what hath been done and what shall be done, also that which belongeth to the times of old and that which belongeth to the latter days up to His second coming. All this they have done, not only by what they have prophesied and declared, but along with their prophecies they have given manifestations of Him in their bodies.²

When there was a famine in the land of Canaan and our father Abraham went down to Egypt, he came back with much riches and honour, and without blemish. In like manner our Redeemer went down and delivered the Church, the Assembly of the Nations, and He went up again, having gotten honour and praise.

99. THE PROPHETS AS FORERUNNERS OF CHRIST

Isaac rendered obedience unto his father, saying: "Bind Me;" and he was offered up as sacrifice, though he did not die, being redeemed by the ram which came down from heaven. In like manner the Son of God was obedient to His Father even unto death. And He was bound with His love for mankind, and He was nailed to the Cross and was pierced, and the Son of God became our ransom, but His Godhead suffered not.

Isaac's son Jacob departed to the land of Laban, the country of his mother's brother... he went with his staff only, and there he got much cattle, and acquired beasts both clean and unclean, and he fathered twelve sons, and he revealed baptism, and returned to his own country where he received a blessing from Isaac his father.

²'Stigmata': Marks resembling the wounds on the crucified body of Christ, believed to have been supernaturally impressed upon the bodies of certain saints.

In like manner our Lord Jesus Christ came down from heaven, the Word of God by Itself; and the staff of Jacob with which he pastured His sheep is our Lady Mary our salvation.

The staff represents the wood of the Cross, whereby, being crucified upon it, He redeemed his flock and took possession of us from among the Jews, the heathen and the Gentiles. And He chose for Himself twelve apostles who made the people in all the world and in every country to believe in Him, and He went up to heaven to His Father.

Thus Moses departed to the country of Midian, and there he held converse with God, Who made him to learn and to believe in the resurrection from the dead of his fathers Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Then, by means of His rod, God gave unto him the power to perform miracles and he fathered two sons.

By this it is shown clearly that we shall be saved by the Godhead... for as the mouth of God proclaimed... "I am the God of Abraham" (meaning the Father),"and the God of Isaac" (meaning the Son), "and the God of Jacob" (meaning of the Holy Spirit), thus indicating the Trinity clearly and plainly: "I am not the God of the dead, but the God of the living,"¹ for they all are alive with God... and by this the resurrection of the dead is to be understood.

Jonah was swallowed up and cast into the belly of the great fish, and our Redeemer went down into the bowels of the earth, and rose again on the third day. Daniel was cast into the pit of the lions, and the king and his nobles sealed it with their seals, but he came out without the lions devouring him.

Similarly our Lord was cast into the grave, and the Jews sealed it with their seals, imagining that they were sealing up the rising of the sun so that it should not shine. O ye foolish, wicked, blasphemous, blind and weak-minded men; would ye claim that the Spirit of Life should not appear and come forth? And the Jews were put to an open shame, and He went forth to shine upon us who have believed in Him.¹

Joseph was sold into slavery by the hand of his brethren, and our Lord was sold by the hand of Judas. And Joseph, where he was sold, delivered his brethren from the famine, and Christ hath delivered us who believed in Him, and He hath made us His heirs and His brethren. And as Joseph gave an inheritance unto his brethren in the land of Goshen, so shall Christ give unto His righteous ones a habitation and an everlasting inheritance.

Moreover, in order that ye may know and understand, and be certain about the resurrection of the dead, I will give you a sign, which ye shall understand by the guidance of His word.

When Abraham had come unto the land of his inheritance, he bought first of all a tomb into which would be gathered together the dead bodies of his family, his children and his wife, so that he might join them in the resurrection; and there he buried his wife Sarah and he himself was buried there. For Abraham was a Prophet, and he knew that he would be raised up with his people. And Isaac and Rebekah his wife were also buried there.

And it remained their possession from the time when Jacob went down to the land of Egypt with seventy-seven souls (because of the famine and because Joseph his son was there), until their number became six hundred thousand marching men who were equipped for war, without reckoning women and children.

Jacob died in Egypt at a good old age, and he hath said unto Joseph his son: "I command thee by the life of my father and by my God, Who is the renewer of my life, that thou bury me not in this country, but in the tomb of my fathers, so that my death may be with them and my life subsequently also be with them."²

¹Revelation 2:9; 3:9; John 15:22-25

²Genesis 47:29

And Joseph his son carried Israel (Jacob) and buried him by the grave of his fathers, for he revered the oath which Jacob had made him to swear.

When Jacob fell sick in Egypt, he called his brethren and his children, and made them to swear that they would not leave his bones in the land of Egypt, and said: "When God maketh you to return take ye my bones with you and mingle them in the grave of my fathers."¹

100. THE CHARIOT AND THE VANQUISHER OF THE ENEMY

The Patriarchs then said unto Gregory, the Worker of Wonders: "Behold now, we know well, and thou hast made us to understand that the Kings of Ethiopia have become glorious and great because of Zion. And the Kings of Rome also have become great because of the nails of the Cross that Queen Helena made into a bridle, and which hath become the vanquisher of the enemy.

Now, tell us also how long shall the vanquisher of the enemy remain with the King of Rome... and the chariot carrying Zion with the King of Ethiopia. Tell us, for God hath revealed unto thee what hath been, and what shall be, vision and prophecy, like Moses and Elijah."

And Gregory answered and said unto them: "I will reveal unto you concerning the King of Rome, how he shall transgress the Covenant and trample the faith, provoking God to wrath.

This faith which we have ordered and laid down shall a king sitting in Rome transgress, and there shall be associated with him a certain Archbishop, and they shall change and pervert the word of God and cast it aside in the desire of their hearts, and they shall teach what they wish, and they shall change the Scriptures to suit their own nature, even as the Apostle saith: 'They have behaved themselves like the people of Sodom and Gomorrah.'² And our Lord said unto His disciples in the

²Matthew 10:15

Gospel, 'Guard ye yourselves against those who shall come unto you wearing the skin of sheep, and who are inwardly wolves that tear.'¹

But when they have destroyed the faith, the vanquisher of the enemy shall be taken away from them, and none of these who have changed our faith shall sit upon the throne of Peter the Apostle; and the bowels of their Archbishops shall be emptied out if they have taken their seat upon it with their perverted faith. For the Angel of God, Uriel, hath been commanded to protect the throne of Peter in Rome. God Himself shall take away the vanquisher of the enemy from the king who shall not guard the faith, and the Persians shall make war upon him and shall defeat him.

And the King of Persia, whose name is Irenaeus, shall conquer him, and the king shall carry him away together with his horse, and by the Will of Almighty God the horse upon which is the vanquisher of the enemy shall be stirred up, and in a frenzy it shall go into the sea and perish there. But the nails of the bridle (the vanquisher of the enemy), shall shine there in the sea until Christ shall come again in great glory upon a cloud of heaven, with all His power and all His might.

This is what God showed me when I was in the pit. And now, concerning the King of Ethiopia and Zion the Bride of heaven, and her chariot upon which she moves, I will declare unto you that which my God hath revealed unto me and hath made me to understand. Ethiopia shall continue in the Christian faith until the coming of our Lord, and she shall in no way turn aside from the word of the Gospel, and it shall be so even as we have ordered until the end of the world."

Then one of the Patriarchs said unto Gregory, the Worker of Wonders and Miracles: "When Samalyal cometh, he who is the false Christ (the Antichrist), will the faith of the people of Ethiopia be destroyed by his attack?" And Gregory answered and said: "Surely not. David prophesied saying: 'Ethiopia shall make her hands come to God'."² And this that he saith meaneth that the Ethiopians will neither pervert nor change this our faith, nor the faith of those who were before us.

101. THE RETURN OF ZION

*And the Tabernacle of the Law of God, the Holy Zion, shall remain in Ethiopia until that day when our Lord shall dwell on Mount Zion... and Zion shall come and shall appear unto all, prepared with three seals, even as Moses gave them unto her, and as it is written in the Old Law and in the New: "At the testimony of two or three witnesses everything shall stand."*¹

And then, at that time, saith Isaiah the Prophet: "The dead shall be raised up and those who are in the graves shall live, for the dew which cometh from Thee is their life."² And when the dead are raised up, His mercy with which He waters the earth, shall cease; then they shall stand up before Him with the works which they have done.

Enoch and Elias shall come, being alive, so that they may testify, and Moses and Aaron from the dead shall move around with everyone. And they shall open up Holy Zion, and they shall be seen by the Jews, the crucifiers, and they shall punish them and condemn them because of all they have done in perverting the Word of God.

And the Jews shall see what He wrote for them with His hand... the Words of His Commandments, and the manna with which He fed them in the wilderness without labour on their part, and the spiritual Zion which came down for their salvation, and the rod of Aaron which blossomed after the manner of Mary.

102. THE JUDGMENT OF ISRAEL

Then He shall say unto them: "Why did ye deny Me, and treated Me cruelly and crucified Me, seeing that I did all this for you, and that by My coming down from heaven I delivered you from the slavery of Satan, and that I came for your sake? Look ye and see how ye pierced Me with nails and thrust the spear through Me."

¹Deuteronomy 19:15; Matthew 18:16; John 8:17

²Isaiah 26:19

And the twelve Apostles shall be risen up and they shall pass judgment upon them, and shall say unto them: "We would have made you hear, but ye would not hear the prophecy of the Prophets and the preaching of us the Apostles."

Then the Jews shall weep and repent when it shall be useless to do so, and they shall pass into everlasting punishment... and with the Devil their father who had directed them, and his demons who had led them astray, and with the wicked they shall be shut in.

And those who have believed and who have been baptized in His Holy Name, and have received His Body and His Blood, shall become His servants with their whole heart, for "there is no one who can hate his body altogether." The Body of Christ crieth out in our bodies, and He hath compassion because of His brethren.

If there are some who have sinned, they shall be judged in the fire according to the quantity of their sins; he whose burden of sin is light his punishment shall be light; and he whose burden of sins is heavy, exceedingly great shall his punishment be. One day with God is a period of ten thousand years; some there shall be who shall be punished for a day, and some for half a day; and some shall be tested and shall be absolved from their transgressions.

103. THE CHARIOT OF ETHIOPIA

Again the Patriarchs said unto Gregory, the Worker of Wonders and Miracles: "Behold now, thou hast told us concerning the vanquisher of the enemy of Rome, now tell us of the chariot of Ethiopia and whether it shall remain there up to the coming of Christ, as thou hast told us concerning Zion and the faith of the people of Ethiopia."

Then Gregory answered and said unto them: "It shall surely remain there. And again hearken ye unto me and I will declare this unto you; a few Jews shall lift up their heads against our faith in Nagran and in Armenia in the days after this; but this God will allow by His Will so that He may destroy them, for Armenia is a territory of Rome and Nagran is a territory of Ethiopia."

104. THE KING OF ROME AND THE KING OF ETHIOPIA

The King of Rome, the King of Ethiopia and the Archbishop of Alexandria were informed that they were to rise up to fight, to make war upon the enemies of God, the Jews, and they should destroy them.

The King of Rome, Enya, and the King of Ethiopia, Phinehas, were to lay waste their lands and build churches there, and they were to cut to pieces all Jews at the end of this Cycle in twelve cycles of the moon. Then the kingdom of the Jews shall be made an end of, and the Kingdom of Christ shall be constituted until the advent of the False Messiah.

Afterward two other kings, Justinus the King of Rome and Kaleb the King of Ethiopia, met together in Jerusalem where their Archbishop was to make offerings, and they were to establish the Faith in love, and give each other gifts and the salutation of peace, then they were to divide between them the rulership of the earth, from the centre of Jerusalem, as we have already stated.¹

Also for love's sake and in brotherhood they were to have jointly the royal title of King of Ethiopia. They were both to be mingled with David and Solomon their fathers. The one whom they chose to be named King of Rome was also to be called "King of Ethiopia," and the King of Ethiopia likewise was to bear the name of "King of Rome," and they were to have part in the inheritance whereby they should be named with David and Solomon their fathers.

And thus after they had become united in a common bond and had established the right faith, they were to determine that the Jews were no longer to live, and each of them was to leave his son there in Jerusalem; and the King of Ethiopia was to leave there his firstborn son whose name was Israel, and was to return to his own country in joy.

Then, when he came to his royal house, he was to give abundant thanks unto God and offer up his body as an offering of praise to his God. And

¹See Part I, Chapter 18

God shall accept him gladly, for he shall not defile his body after he hath returned, but he shall go into spiritual seclusion in purity of heart.

He shall then make king his youngest son, whose name is Gabra Maskal, and he shall shut himself up in a monastery. When this hath been told to the king of Nagran, the son of Kaleb, he shall come in order to reign over Zion, and Gabra Maskal shall make his armies to rise up in arms, and he shall journey in a chariot and they shall meet together at the narrow end of the Sea of Liba, and shall fight together.

On that same night the two of them shall pray from sunset until the dawn of day, when the battle shall be raging strong upon them. And when they have cried out to Him with tears, God will consider the prayer of both of them, and the penitent prayers of their father, and will say: "This one is the elder and he hath stood up to perform the will of his father, and that one, the younger, hath loved his father and hath prayed to God for him."

Then God will say to Gabra Maskal: "Choose thou between the chariot and Zion," and He will cause him to take Zion, and he shall reign openly upon the throne of his father. And God will make Israel (the eldest son of the King of Ethiopia) to choose the chariot, and he shall reign secretly and he shall not be visible, and He will send him to all those who have transgressed the commandment of God.

No one shall build houses and none shall suffer fatigue in labouring nor suffer thirst on the journey, and they shall live in tents. And their days shall be double those of ordinary men, and they shall use bows and arrows and shall shoot at and pierce him that God hateth.

Thus hath God made for the King of Ethiopia more glory, grace and majesty than for all the other things of the earth because of the greatness of Zion, the Tabernacle of the Law of God, the heavenly Zion.

May God make us to perform His spiritual good pleasure, and deliver us from His wrath, and make us to share His kingdom.

Then they answered and said unto him: "Verily, thou hast spoken well, for thus was it revealed unto thee by the help of the Holy Spirit. Thou hast told us everything which hath taken place, and thou art in agreement with the book of Domitius of Rome.

Thou hast prophesied also what shall happen to the two cities, the brides of Christ, Rome and Ethiopia, the great cities of God, and to the churches in Nestasya, Arkadya, Marena and Armenia, where pure sacrifices and offerings shall be offered up at all times.”

May God show us His grace. Christ is our King, and in Christ is our life for ever and ever. Amen.

ETHIOPIA (ABYSSINIA) A Brief Historical Synopsis

- Area: 1,221,900 square kilometres.
- Population: 27,000,000 (approx.)
- Capital: Addis Ababa ("new flower")
- Languages: Almost 100 distinct languages plus several dialects: Principal languages are Amharic, Tigrinya, Gurage. Geez, the language of the ancient Aksumite empire survives as a literary and liturgical language and is now called Ethiopic.
- Economy: Based almost exclusively on agriculture.

Ethiopia has had a continuous existence as a nation for over two thousand years, and during most of this time its contact with the rest of the world has been minimal. Known in antiquity as Punt or the "Land of God," Ethiopia has been able to preserve a rich and unique culture, mainly because of its geographic isolation, and the fact that it was the sole black African country to maintain its independence against foreign encroachments.

Christianity has been, and still is, the dominant religion, and was introduced in the 4th century, making Ethiopia the oldest Christian nation on earth. Islam was introduced in the 7th century.

Jewish influence penetrated Ethiopia during the era of the Aksum Kingdom and left an important mark on the nation's religious customs. A remnant of these converts persists to this day in the "Falashas" of Northern Ethiopia whose preservation of, and adherence to, Old Testament Jewish traditions is undeniable, for they observe the Sabbath, practise circumcision, have synagogue services, follow certain dietary laws of Judaism, observe many laws of ritual cleanliness, offer sacrifices on Nisan 14 in the Jewish religious year, and observe the major Jewish festivals. They were first discovered by Joseph Halevy in 1867 and number around 20,000 living mostly in the regions north of Lake Tana, generally remaining aloof from other Ethiopians. They call themselves Beta Israel (House of Israel), though they know no Hebrew and are of local ethnic stock.

Attempts by the Portuguese who were seeking the legendary Christian Kingdom of the monarch Prester (Priest) John and by the notorious Jesuits, to convert the country to Roman Catholicism, led to serious conflicts culminating in the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1633.

The Solomonic Restoration

Late in the 13th century, the Zagwe usurpers of the throne were swept away, and Yekuno Amlak (ruled 1270-1285) restored the Solomonic dynasty of Kings, legitimate heirs of the Aksumite line as defined by the traditions of the KEBRA NAGAST.

Theodore II (ruled 1855-1868): As a consequence of the two-year delay by Queen Victoria of England in replying to a letter that the emperor had sent, several British officials were imprisoned at Magdala. In July 1867 a British military force, led by Robert Napier was dispatched to Ethiopia to secure the release of the Englishmen. After courageous resistance, the last mountain fortress was captured in April 1868, and Emperor Theodore committed suicide to avoid capture.

In 1889 Menyelek II ascended the throne, and in March 1896 he inflicted a crushing defeat on the invading Italian forces. Menyelek died in December 1913, and his successor, the Muslim adherent Lij Yasu was forcefully dethroned, and Menyelek's daughter Empress Zauditu was crowned, with Ras Tafari, son of Menyelek's cousin Ras Makonnen as Regent and heir to the throne.

In 1928 Ras Tafari was crowned Negus (King) and two years later on November 2, 1930, following the death of Empress Zauditu, he was crowned Emperor of Ethiopia and took the name Haile Selassie I (Power of the Holy Trinity) and the inherited Solomonic titles, "King of Kings, Lord of Lords, Elect of God, Conquering Lion of the tribe of Judah," he being the 225th rebirth of Solomon and direct descendant of the union of King Solomon with the Queen of Sheba.

Much credit is given to this last ruler of the Solomonic line of Kings for the modernization of the imperial realm, the issuing of a Constitution, the active role of Ethiopia in world affairs within a policy of peaceful neutrality, and the general improvement of living conditions for the people.

The rapacious invasion and occupation of Ethiopia by fascist Italian forces in 1935 evidenced the impotence of the League of Nations to protect its weaker members. Ethiopia resisted for seven months until Addis Ababa fell on May 5, 1936. But certain regions of Ethiopia were never conquered. This unprovoked attack which was blessed by the Roman Pontiff as a "Catholic Crusade," was particularly cruel in its execution. The Italians murdered Archbishop Petros (the Coptic abuna) and massacred the monks of the great monastery of Debre Libanos, and after an attempted coup, decimated the population of Addis Ababa during a three-day frenzied orgy of murder and pillage in February 1937. With British and French help, Ethiopia was delivered from the Italian invasion, and Emperor Haile Selassie returned to its liberated capital on May 5, 1941. A renewal of relations with the papacy, broken off since 1632, was approved in June 1969 culminating in a visit by the Emperor to the Vatican on November 9, 1970.

In 1974 the abolition of the monarchy in Ethiopia was proclaimed by the tyrannical Moscow-backed Marxist-Communist Derg government, after the overthrow of the Emperor and the Ethiopian Royal Solomonic Dynasty, and the imprisonment of the imperial family.

There was throughout Ethiopia, widespread resistance by the people to the communist policies of forced slave labour in remote areas, resulting in soil degradation, famine, and general impoverishment of the nation. Eventually, the Communist government was overthrown, and today Ethiopia is on the verge of determining its political future, including the settlement of the thorny Eritrean issue.

Many patriotic organizations established by exiled Ethiopians in various countries, are struggling for a re-establishment of the monarchy and the Royal Dynasty based on ancient traditions of the KEBRA NAGAST.

APPENDIX II

THE FALASHAS

The world marvelled once more at the extraordinary skill and military genius displayed by the state of Israel, in rescuing thousands of Ethiopian Jews from the famine that was ravaging the land of the Negus in 1984.

Under the "Law of Return" which gives every Jew the right to full Israeli citizenship, vast numbers of immigrants have entered Israel. Among these have been some 100,000 survivors of the Nazi death camps. "Operation Magic Carpet" brought in thousands of Jews from Yemen and Morocco, and some 120,000 more were flown in from Iraq in "Operation Ezra and Nehemiah"; but it was not until February of 1980 that the mission of rescuing the Falashas was entrusted to Israel's famed and highly efficient intelligence agency, the Mossad.

In a major secret operation, Israeli agents rounded up tens of thousands of these ostracized people and led them across deserts and mountains into Sudan, where border camps were prepared to receive them, and specially chartered planes would take them 'on wings of Eagles' to Zion, to the Promised Land, to Israel.

Who were these peoples? What impelled the Israeli authorities to undertake such a vast and costly enterprise shrouded in secrecy and hidden even from their own population?

In modern Ethiopia live a number of people, estimated at some twenty-three thousand. They are a remarkable people indeed: black-skinned, but with strong Jewish ties. In Ethiopia they are known as "Falashas" meaning stranger or outsider.

For many centuries the existence of Falashas, or "Black Jews", was unknown to the outside world. All knowledge about them had been lost. It was only in the nineteenth century that they were rediscovered by missionaries and anthropologists. Since then their history has been painstakingly reconstructed and their religion assiduously studied. Many surprising conclusions were made, but baffling mysteries remain.

The Falashas' religious ties to the service of Jehovah are obvious, and it appears that their religious development had its beginnings long ago because they knew nothing of the Talmud, a body of writings that reflected relatively late developments of Jewish religious thoughts and philosophy.

The Falashas, the Jews of Ethiopia, call themselves "Beta Israel" (House of Israel), and according to their traditions, they originated from the nobles of Jerusalem who accompanied Menyelek (David II), (the son of King Solomon and Makeda, Queen of Sheba) when he returned to his country. Another opinion holds that the Falashas were descendants of Jewish soldiers who in ancient times manned the south border garrisons of Egypt. Finally, some believe that the Falashas are merely a segment of a local population which at one time in the past converted to Judaism. Thus the mystery of their origin has not been entirely solved. According to scientific theories, they are of Hamitic (Cushite) origin and belong to the Agau family of tribes which already formed part of the Ethiopian population prior to the settlement of the Semitic tribes who arrived from southern Arabia.

Ethiopian chronicles show that Judaism was widespread before the conversion to Christianity of the Aksum dynasty during the fourth century. After this, those who remained faithful to Judaism were persecuted and compelled to retreat from the coastal region into the mountains north of Lake Tana. They concentrated themselves in this region and lived in political independence under their own rulers.

The Falashas played an active role in the uprising of the Agau tribes against the Aksum dynasty in the tenth century. According to Ethiopian tradition, there was a Jewish queen known as Judith (or Esther) who led the rebels in deposing the Negus and vented their anger against the Christians, their churches and their monasteries. Thus began a sporadic war between Christians, Jews and Muslims with the eventual defeat of the Falashas by the Negus Ishaq in the early fifteenth century. Later, it was the Negus Zara Yakob (1434-1468) who gave himself the title of "Exterminator of the Jews", and his son Baeda Maryam (1468-1478) organized a massacre of the Falashas. Paradoxically, Ethiopian chronicles praise their bravery and their devotion to their religion.

In spite of the massive Falasha losses in these wars, the strength of the Falashas was not completely broken, so when the Agau tribes again rose in rebellion during the reign of the Negus Susenyos (1607-1632), the Falashas, under the leadership of their king, Gideon, participated in the revolt.

However, after the Negus had subdued the other rebels, he directed the whole of his power against the Falashas, and he conquered their fortresses. Men, women and children were killed.

The Negus then promised the remaining Falashas that they could return in peace to their villages if they laid down their arms. After a short while, however, the Negus reneged on his promise, and presented them with the alternative of conversion or death.

In the great massacre perpetrated against those who refused to accept baptism, King Gideon lost his life. Thereafter, many Falashas were sold as slaves, and the death penalty was decreed against those who continued to observe Jewish customs. These events marked the end of Falasha independence. Even their lands were confiscated, and they were compelled to till them as tenants.

In the course of time they were permitted to return to their former religion; and even though there were no further wars, from then on suffering and degradation were the lot of the Falashas. In spite of all this, the Falashas retained their distinctiveness, and considered themselves part of the Jewish people, both in their origin and faith.

Their religion is based on the Bible, which they possess in the Geez language in the same translation as that adopted by the Ethiopian Church; it includes a number of Apocryphal books (Tobit, Judith, Wisdom of Solomon, Wisdom of Ben Sira, I and II Maccabees, and the Book of Baruch). In addition to these they consider the books of Enoch and Jubilees sacred texts. The Falashas have priests who claim descent from Aaron, and in every region they inhabit, the priests elect a High Priest who then becomes the spiritual leader of the community.

The sanctity of the Sabbath is rigorously observed by the Falashas. Work ceases on Friday at midday when all purify themselves by ritual immersion and the wearing of their Sabbath clothes. The lighting of candles or the kindling of fire, the drawing of water, going beyond the limits of the village, and sexual intercourse are forbidden on the Sabbath. From Ethiopian sources it also appears that in ancient times the Falashas observed the Sabbath rest even when in war, and fought only when attacked.

The Falashas determine their festivals by means of a calendar patterned after the Jewish one, and they celebrate the new moons and the Jewish festivals as prescribed in the Pentateuch. Their adherence to the practice of male circumcision performed on the eighth day after birth as is prescribed biblically, further confirms their Jewish religious ancestry.

The laws of ritual uncleanness and purity receive special attention by the Falashas. Their wives stay in a special hut on the outskirts of the village during the days of their menstruation and they return to their homes only after having purified themselves by immersion. A special hut is also prepared for women in confinement. The uncleanness lasts for forty days if a male child is born, and eighty days if it is a female child. Upon the conclusion of her days of uncleanness, the woman shaves off the hair of her head, immerses herself, and washes her clothes before returning to her home. The confinement hut is then burned down.

The Falashas do not eat raw meat like other Ethiopians, and they observe the Pentateuchal laws concerning the ritually clean and unclean animals and the purging of the sinew of the femoral vein. For this reason the Falashas do not eat meat slaughtered by Christians. Family life is usually exemplary. Divorce is rare and only adultery is recognized as a justification for it. It is for this reason that the Falashas are not affected by the venereal diseases which are so widespread in Ethiopia.

The Falashas firmly believe in only one God, the God of Israel, who has chosen His people and Who will send the Messiah to redeem them and return them to the Holy Land. On several occasions prophets arose among the Falashas who announced the coming of the Messiah and caused messianic movements to emerge. During the reign of Emperor Theodore II, in 1862, such an episode was responsible for the disaster which overtook a large group of Falashas who attempted to reach Israel by foot. Most of them died on the way and the remainder returned, broken and destitute.

The Falashas believe in the World to Come and the Resurrection of the Dead. In their writings there are detailed descriptions of the rewards which await the righteous in the Garden of Eden and the chastisements and punishments which await the wicked. Edward Ullendorf, noted authority on the traditions and culture of the Falashas, saw in their Judaism a strange fusion of pagan, Jewish and Christian beliefs and practices. On the other hand, Joseph Halevy and other researchers were deeply impressed by their Jewish consciousness.

Today most of the Falashas speak Amharic, which is the official language of Ethiopia. Their literature, however, is written entirely in Geez, the classical Ethiopian language which is to this day the holy language of the Ethiopian Church. The Bible is read also in the same Geez. It is a translation which was made not from the original Hebrew text but from the Septuagint. This is also the translation accepted by the Ethiopian Church, and there is no evidence as to whether the Falashas ever possessed a different version which was closer to the original.

The Portuguese Jesuits of the 17th century asserted that in their days the Falashas possessed the Bible in Hebrew and knew a faulty Hebrew. According to one tradition, the last king of the Falashas (during the reign of the Negus Susenyos) burnt their books before his death; but another tradition, reported by Filosseno Luzzatto, says that the Falashas hid all their Hebrew books in the town of Gondar so that they would not fall into the hands of their enemies. In all these tales there is difficulty in distinguishing fact from legend.

The book Teezaza Sanbat (Precepts of the Sabbath) is an original Falasha work, and they attribute it to Aba Zabra, a monk who lived in the days of the Negus Zara Yakob (15th century). It is a collection of the laws of the Sabbath (according to the Book of Jubilees) and of legends on the creation of man, the Garden of Eden, Noah, Abraham, Moses and others. This work does not exist in a Christian version, but some parts of it have been introduced, with slight changes, into a Christian work entitled Dersana Sanbat (The Sermon on the Sabbath), which praises the so-called "Christian Sabbath", that is, Sunday.

In addition to these works, there are also texts which have not yet been published, such as those in the Faitlovitch Library in Tel Aviv, Israel, and which include such works as "The Testament of Isaac", "The Testament of Jacob", "The Praises of Wisdom", "The Words of Moses" and others. It may be assumed that there are still more unknown works in other libraries and in the hands of the Falashas. It appears that all the books of the Falashas were written before the loss of their independence.

Mention has already been made of the tradition on the origin of the Falashas from the Jews who accompanied Menyelek, the son of King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, when he returned from Jerusalem to Ethiopia. Since the Ethiopians themselves, especially the royal dynasty, claim the same origin, the Falashas added a story: on his way Menyelek crossed a river on the Sabbath with the Holy Ark of the Covenant which he had stolen from the temple in Jerusalem. Some of his followers crossed over with him and from that time he and his sinful companions became Christians, while the other followers who observed the Sabbath became the fathers of the Falashas.

The story contends that the Holy Ark was indeed deposited in Aksum, within a secret cave which was subsequently sealed after an earthquake caused a landslide. It is only when a Falasha approaches it that the wall is opened up and remains thus until he has prostrated himself before the Holy Ark.

It is estimated that there are approximately some 12,000 Falashas still living in the area north of Lake Tana and in the outskirts of the town of Gondar. They are mainly engaged in agriculture, but as previously mentioned, they do not own their own land. Therefore, working as lessees or tenants on the land, they must hand over the major part of their produce to the landowners. In addition to this, the Falashas (both men and women) engage in various crafts such as pottery, weaving, basketry, spinning, and work as blacksmiths and goldsmiths.

Ever since their modern day "discovery" by Joseph Halevy in 1867, the Falashas have been the subject of unending fascination and study by a variety of scholars. The abundance of legends and traditions that permeate their history, has also fueled much speculation as to their true origins and ancestry.

In general, the outward appearance of the Falasha is similar to that of the Amhara. As a result of the intermingling of Hamitic and Semitic bloods, there are differences in the coloring of the skin and the facial features, which at times tend towards the Agau type and at others toward the Semitic type found in Oriental Jews. However, an anthropological study has not yet been carried out.

The question of how Jewish the Falashas are, or whether they are indeed Jews at all, is still very much a matter of considerable debate in Israel. Although some of the Hasidic Jews and other orthodox groups both in Israel and in the United States, still refuse to recognize them as Jews in any sense, their dramatic rescue in the secretive "Operation Moses", has provided adequate proof that the State of Israel regards them as Jews.

There are a number of theories connecting the Falashas with the Israelites of old. Some claim that when the Hebrews left Egypt at the time of the Biblical Exodus, a group broke off from the rest and found their way south to Ethiopia, where they eventually established their own kingdom. However, one of the most popular and persistent beliefs is that the Falashas are one of the "lost ten tribes of Israel."

Around the year 964 B.C. after the death of King Solomon, a breakaway took place in Israel. Ten of the twelve tribes seceded and under Jeroboam, formed the Northern Kingdom. Then, when this Northern Kingdom fell to the brutal Assyrian army some 200 years later, the majority of the Israelites were forcibly deported to Assyria where they lost their separate identity and were assimilated. Many orthodox Jews believe that the Falashas are the lost tribe of Dan. However, this notion has no historical basis. The important question is not where did the Falashas come from, but rather, where did their Jewish religion come from.

Regardless of the true nature of their origin or conversion to Judaism, the fact remains that the Falashas constitute a living testimony to the exciting saga of the transfer of the Ark of the Covenant from the temple in Jerusalem to a still unknown location in Ethiopia.

The numerous prophecies in Daniel, chapters 8, 9 and 11 concerning the restoration of the temple in Jerusalem, the “daily sacrifice”, and the many predictions as to the rediscovery of the Ark of God and its return to God’s temple, makes the emergence of the Falasha Jews of Ethiopia an event of undeniable prophetic importance.

It is known that at present in Israel an intense training of young Levite youths in the priestly rituals of temple ceremonials is taking place, with a view to an early establishment of the Biblical system of sacrificial worship. The presence of thousands of Falashas in Israel, themselves the only living descendants of the custodians of God’s Holy Ark of the Covenant, may in fact signal the start of a series of prophetic events culminating with the rebuilding of the Temple of God in Jerusalem, and the return of the Messiah as King.

Ethiopia, the Biblical land of the “men with the burnt faces” is yet to fulfill its greatest prophetic destiny, and the Falasha Jews are at the centre of these coming earth-shaking events.

INTRODUCTION

THE inhabitants of the kingdom which we know now as Abyssinia were wont to call their country Ethiopia. Hence the name Ethiopic was given to the Liturgy used by the Church (Monophysite) of Abyssinia. The language also in which the Liturgy is written is often called Ethiopic, though its more exact name is Geez. It is now, and has been for many centuries, a dead language.

Very little is known of the history of the Church of Ethiopia or Abyssinia in early times, and nothing of the history of its Liturgy. The Church has always been in close connexion with the great Patriarchate of Alexandria, the tradition being that such connexion goes back to the time of St. Athanasius, who is said to have consecrated Frumentius and sent him as a missionary Bishop to the country in which he had formerly been a slave. Whatever may be the truth underlying this tradition, the fact remains that down to the present day the Ethiopic Church has been content (in honour, it is said, of Frumentius) with a single Bishop, or rather Metropolitan, consecrated and sent to it, whenever a vacancy occurs, by the Patriarch of Alexandria.

From the tradition as to the introduction of Christianity into Abyssinia, Le Brun¹ has drawn the curious inference that the Ethiopic was the first of all Churches to have a liturgy in writing. His argument is that the other liturgies were not put into writing till the end of the fourth century, but that St. Athanasius, when he consecrated Frumentius, who was before but a layman, must have given him a written liturgy to take with him to Ethiopia. The argument is not very convincing, even if the truth of the tradition be granted, for there is no reason to suppose that Frumentius would have been sent alone.

On the other hand, it seems quite impossible to suppose, as Littmann seems to do in his History of Ethiopic Literature,¹ that the Church first received its liturgy from the Coptic Church so late as the thirteenth or fourteenth century. This seems impossible, first of all, on general grounds. The Church was always in close touch with Alexandria; it followed it, for example, into Monophysitism in the fifth century. It was only after the rise of Islam in the seventh century that the Church in Abyssinia became to a great extent isolated. It is not then to be supposed that it remained for so many centuries without a liturgy when the other Christian churches all had theirs.

This general argument would of course be greatly strengthened, if we could be certain that the Ethiopic version of the Testament of Our Lord and the great ecclesiastical work known as the Ṣinôdôs belonged to the earliest period of Ethiopic literature. The former of these is thought to have been translated into Ethiopic from Greek,² and if this be correct, it must be of early date, for in the later periods of the literature, the translations were always made from Arabic or Coptic. This Ethiopic version of the Testament contains an Anaphora which is almost identical with that afterwards known as the Anaphora of Our Lord Jesus Christ. The other work the Ṣinôdôs is reckoned by the Ethiopic Church as part of the New Testament. This fact tells in favour of an early date, and so Archdeacon Charles says of it (Hastings, DB. I., p. 792) that it 'became early naturalized in the Ethiopic Church.' The Ṣinôdôs also contains an Anaphora, about which much has been written in recent times, and which was the source from which the Anaphora of the Apostles was developed. These two Anaphoras (Apostles and Our Lord) have special claims to be considered early. No doubt some of the other Anaphoras are much later than these, bearing as they do, evident marks of late origin, or at least development. All, however, with one exception (Basil) seem to have been used in their present form in the Ethiopic Church only. The Anaphora of St. Basil is a translation of the similarly named Coptic Anaphora.

The subject of this volume being the developed form of the Ethiopic Anaphoras as they have existed since the sixteenth century at latest, I do not here discuss the origin and relationships of the Anaphora of the Ethiopic Church Ordinances which is found, as above-mentioned, in the Ṣinôdôs. It is unnecessary to repeat what has been so recently said by many others.¹ A volume in this same series by the Rev. A. Linton, gives much of the information required.² Since, however, the Anaphora of the Apostles is a development of the earlier one, I have printed in a different type those parts of the later Anaphora which are borrowed from the earlier form. Almost every word of the earlier Anaphora is to be found incorporated in the later, with the exception of two brief paragraphs. In one case the paragraph 'Of the oblation of oil,' is omitted from the later form; in the other, the prayer 'Of Imposition of hand,' a different prayer has been substituted. There are also a few slight variations of order.

Omitting then further reference to this earlier Anaphora, and passing to the more developed form of the Liturgy, we find that at least as early as the sixteenth century, and probably for centuries earlier, the Eucharistic service consisted, as it does in the Abyssinian Church of to-day, of two parts, the Pro-Anaphora, invariable except for the lections from the New Testament; and the Anaphora which varied according to the day on which the Liturgy was used. Just as in the Orthodox Eastern Church the Anaphora of St. Chrysostom is used generally, but that of St. Basil is substituted for it on certain days and that of the Pre-sanctified on others, so the Ethiopic Church had its normal Anaphora, that of the Apostles, for which others were substituted on certain days. The only difference is that in the latter case the number of subordinate Anaphoras is very much larger.

In the Ethiopic Liturgy the Pro-Anaphora ends with the Sursum Corda. At least in the MSS. the Anaphora, except in the case of the Anaphora of Our Lord, is marked as beginning after this point. The reason of this may be that the Sursum Corda, being said at the beginning of every Anaphora, came to be regarded as belonging to the invariable part, but the fact that the MSS. mark the Anaphora as beginning after the Sursum Corda is worthy of remark. In one other Anaphora¹ the Sursum Corda occurs, but in quite a different (and very strange) position, but this is doubtless due to the fact that when this Anaphora was used the Sursum Corda was said twice.

Though the present volume is not concerned directly with the Pro-Anaphora, a brief mention of some of the distinguishing features of this may not be out of place. It follows, on the whole, the lines of the corresponding part of the Coptic Liturgy, both deriving from the Greek Liturgy of St. Mark. Before the Prothesis, or setting forth of the oblation, with which the Coptic rite begins, the Ethiopic Liturgy has a somewhat long preliminary part with prayers for the cleansing of the clergy and the vessels of the service. The Prothesis is longer than in the Coptic rite and includes prayers not only for the preparation of the altar (or tâbôt, as it is called in the Ethiopic Church) but also for the blessing of the masôb, the paten, the chalice and the cross-spoon.¹ In both Liturgies the Prothesis ends with Psalm cxvii said with doxology. Between the Prothesis and the Mass of the Catechumens comes the Enarxis. This is similar in both rites, except that the Ethiopic is fuller and includes a litany which is lacking in the Coptic. The Mass of the Catechumens consists in both of the Censing and four lections. These last are taken successively from the Pauline Epistles, the Catholic Epistles, the Acts, and the Gospels. In both Liturgies the hymn Trisagion is sung between the lection from the Acts and the Gospel, being followed in the Ethiopic by the Hail Mary. In both rites intercessions are offered, in the Coptic after the Gospel, in the Ethiopic before it.

There is more difference between the two rites in the Mass of the Faithful, than in other parts of the Pro-Anaphora, yet even here they run on parallel lines, both including the Prayers, the Creed and the Kiss of Peace. The Ethiopic, however, omits the Prayer of the Veil with which this part of the Coptic Liturgy commences, and inserts between the Creed and the Kiss of Peace the ceremony of the Lavabo, which is not found in the Coptic. It is possible that this ceremony is a later addition; it does not occur in the Liturgy of 1548 (see below, p. 13).

The Greek word Anaphora is never used in Ethiopic of the concluding part of the service. The most usual title, found in all the Anaphoras but two, is 'Thanksgiving of the Eucharist' ('akuatêta querbân'). This I have translated by 'Eucharistic Thanksgiving'. This title would seem to be applicable in strictness to that part only which extends from the Sursum Corda to the Invocation. This was probably the original use of the term which was afterwards extended to the whole of the concluding part, just as in the case of the word Anaphora itself. Quite a different word is used in the case of the normal Anaphora of the Apostles. In this we find Qeddâsê,¹ i.e., consecration, a word which has two other technical meanings one wider, in which it is applied to the Liturgy as a whole, the other narrower, in which it means the recital of the divine holiness in the Sanctus, the Greek 'Ἁγιασμός. The same title Qeddâsê is given to the Anaphoras of Our Lord and Our Lady by Rodwell, who no doubt found it in his MS., and it would seem to be used of the former of these in the modern Abyssinian Liturgy also. The last words of the facsimile pages of the Anaphora of the Apostles given by Dr. Mercer in his edition² are 'Qeddâsê of our Lord,' which seem to refer to what follows on the next page of the MS., though they are not so taken by the editor.

² Mercer, The Ethiopic Liturgy, 1915.

In the MS. used for the present edition (Orient, 545) the title of this Anaphora is quite different: 'The Book of the Covenant which Our Lord Jesus Christ spake to His Apostles before His ascension after His resurrection from the dead.' This title is no doubt due to the connexion of this Anaphora with that found in the Testament of the Lord.¹

NUMBER AND NAMES OF THE ANAPHORAS

The Anaphoras used in the Ethiopic Church are very numerous, more numerous than in any Church except that of the Syrian Monophysites. The total number seems to be sixteen. None, however, of the British Museum MSS. contains more than fourteen, though some have fewer. The same number are found in the MS. of the present day Abyssinian Liturgy from which Dr. Mercer published his edition of the modern rite.

These include, in addition to the Anaphora of the Apostles, the following: (2) The Book of the Covenant which our Lord Jesus Christ spake, etc. The Eucharistic Thanksgivings of (3) our Lady the Holy Virgin Mary, which Abba Cyriacos,² Bishop of the city of Behnesa, composed, (4) St. John, the Son of Thunder, (5) St. John Chrysostom, (6) St. Athanasius, (7) St. Epiphanius, (8) the 318 Orthodox, (9) St. Gregory of Alexandria,³ (10) St. Dioscorus, (11) James (or, Jacob) of Serug, (12) St.

¹The Latin Testamentum represents the Greek διαθήκη which properly means a 'Will' or 'Testament' but often stands for 'Covenant' (συνθήκη) also.

² Or, Heriakos.

³ That is, apparently, Gregory of Nazianzus. A MS. of the Ethiopic Anaphoras now in Trinity College, Dublin, calls him, however, the 'brother of Basil.' This would be Gregory of Nyssa.

Basil, (13) St. Gregory of Armenia, (14) St. Cyril of Alexandria.

In addition to these, one MS. now in Paris has two more, one bearing the name of St. James the Lord's brother, and the other that of St. Cyril, the latter being different from No. (14) above.

The first four of these are in the same order in all the British Museum MSS. and also in Dr. Mercer's MS. The order of the other varies considerably.

As to the usage of these Anaphoras Dr. Mercer writes as follows (p. 148): 'Only one is normally used, the alternate ones being only for rare occasions.' He does not give any authority for this statement, which is quite at variance with the only evidence on the matter known to me. This evidence is contained in the marginal notes of the MS. from which I have translated. According to these the various Anaphoras are used, apparently as substitutes for the normal Anaphora of the Apostles, as follows:—

Our Lord: On the Feasts of our Lord and on Mount Tabor.

The Nativity of Our Lord is celebrated on the 29th of each Ethiopic month,¹ but these Feasts are not, it would seem, included here, as the Feast of the Nativity is specially mentioned below. There are several other Feasts connected with our Lord, the Baptism, January 11 (6), the Conception, March 29 (25), and various 'Entrances': into the Temple, February 8 (2), into Jerusalem, March 22 (18), into the Upper-room (Octave of the Resurrection), into Egypt, May 24 (19).

Mount Tabor is the Feast of the Transfiguration, August 13 (6).

Our Lady: On the Feasts of our Lady Mary (and) on (the Feasts) of Gabriel and Dacesius.

¹ The dates are given according to the Ethiopic Calendar. The number added in brackets gives the day according to our reckoning.

The Rest of our Lady is commemorated on January 21 (16), and, apparently by reason of this, the 21st of each Ethiopic month is dedicated to the Virgin. Besides these days, her Nativity is commemorated on May 1 (April 26) and September 10 (7), her Burial on August 15 (8), her Assumption on August 16 (9), her Presentation on December 3 (November 29), and her Conception on December 16 (12).

The Feasts of Gabriel are on March 30 (26), June 12 (6), and December 19 (15); that of Dacesius on December 22 (18).

John the Son of Thunder: On the Feast of St. John the Evangelist and on the Feasts of (St.) Stephen, and on (the Feast of) St. George, and on the Feasts of All Martyrs, and on the Day of the Nativity of Our Lord Jesus Christ, in the month of Preaching, and on the Feast of Simeon.

The Feast of St. John is on January 4 (December 30); the Feasts of St. Stephen on January 1 (December 27), September 15 (12), and October 17 (14), and the Feasts of St. George on April 23 (18) and November 7 (3).¹

The Feasts of All Martyrs refer, it would seem, to no special day, but to all days on which a martyr is commemorated.

The Nativity of Our Lord is commemorated on the 29th of each month, the date being chosen from the December festival (December 29).

What the month of Preaching means I have been unable to discover. The last name Simeon refers apparently to the Prophet Simeon who is commemorated on February 8 (2).

John Chrysostom: On the Vigil of the Passover, and on the Fast, and on the Day of the Saviour, and on the Feasts of John Chrysostom, and on the Feasts of the Cross.

The first of these explains itself; the 'Fast' seems to refer to the 'Fast of Christ' which is marked in the Calendar given by Ludolf² on February 4, January (29), but is probably not a fixed day but variable, marking the commencement of the fast before Easter. The Day of the Saviour is probably Good Friday, the 'Day of Salvation', (τὰ σωτήρια).

² Ludolf, Comm. ad Historiam Æthiopicam, p. 407.

The Feasts of John Chrysostom are on May 12 (7) and November 17 (13) and those of the Cross on March 10 (6) and May 9 (4).

Athanasius: On the Christian Sabbath.

That is to say, on Sunday. Saturday is known as the Sabbath of the Jews.

Epiphanius: On the Day of Baptism, and in the month of Rain(s), and on the Feast of Epiphanius, and in the Prayer of the Fifth Day.

The Day of Baptism is January 11 (6), the day on which the Baptism of Christ is commemorated. On that day there is a great ceremony of purification in which the whole population takes part, and during which there is even, it is said, a kind of re-baptism performed.

June 25 (19) is marked in Ludolf's calendar as the 'Beginning of Rain(s).' The note here evidently refers to the same time.

The Feast of Epiphanius is May 17 (12).

The Prayer of the Fifth Day probably refers to Maundy Thursday, on which day alone the Eucharist is celebrated in the Ethiopic Church with unleavened bread.

The 318 Orthodox: On (the Feast of) Cana of Galilee, and on the Feast of Gêânâ, and on (the Feast of) the Four Living Creatures, and on the Feast of the Twenty-four Heavenly Priests . . .¹ and on the Feast of the Congregation of the Firstborn, and on the Feasts of the 318 Orthodox.

Feast of Cana of Galilee on June 12 (6); Feast of Gêânâ on December 28 (24), i.e. the Vigil of Christmas. The Feasts of the Four 'Living Creatures' and of the Twenty-four 'Heavenly Priests' are not mentioned by Ludolf. They are, however, commemorated in the Coptic Church (cf. Dowden, Church Year and Kalendar, p. 148) and probably the Ethiopic commemoration was on the same days.

As to the Feast of the Congregation of the Firstborn, I can discover nothing. The Feasts of the 318 Orthodox are on September 21 (18) and November 9 (5).

Gregory of Alexandria: On the Feast of Hosanna and at the Passion.

That is to say on Palm Sunday, and, apparently, during Holy Week.

Dioscorus: On the Feast of the Ascension, and on the Feast of the Paraclete, and on the day of the Rest of Dioscorus.

The meaning of the first two is obvious. Dioscorus is commemorated on September 7 (4) and October 17 (14).

James of Serug: On the Feasts of Michael and Gabriel, and on (the Feast of) All Angels, and on the Feasts of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and in the intercalary month.

Michael the Archangel is celebrated on the 12th day of each month, and also on September 9 (6). The Feasts of Gabriel have been already mentioned above under Anaphora of Our Lady.

No special commemoration of All Angels is marked by Ludolf.

The three patriarchs are commemorated on the 28th day of each month. The intercalary month is a short month of five (six in Leap Year) days which comes at the end of the Ethiopic Year in accordance with the Alexandrian system of twelve months of thirty days each, followed by five extra days to make up the total of 365.

Basil: On the Feasts of all Patriarchs and Bishops.

Gregory of Armenia: [No note as to usage is given.]

Cyril: On the Feast of Cyril the Patriarch, and on the Feasts of all the righteous and holy Prophets.

This Anaphora is used apparently on all days of commemoration of Old Testament worthies. There are many of these in the Ethiopic Calendar in addition to the monthly celebration of the three great patriarchs, viz. :—Moses, Aaron, Job, David, Elijah, Elisha, the Four Great Prophets, the Minor Prophets, Ezra, etc.

Cyril of Alexandria, himself, is commemorated on February 14 (8), June 12 (6), July 3 (June 27).

It would seem from this list that these Anaphoras were in use frequently, at any rate when the MS. was written, in the seventeenth century. Some of the notes may be uncertain or ambiguous, but, putting all these aside, we have Athanasius used on all Sundays, and we find somewhere in the list nearly all the great days of the Christian Year : Christmas, Epiphany, Palm Sunday, Good Friday, Ascension Day and Whitsunday. Besides this there are four days each month, the 12th, 21st, 28th and 29th which have a special commemoration. On the whole then it can hardly be said with truth that the subordinate Anaphoras were used but seldom.

TEXTS AND TRANSLATIONS

ONLY a few of these Anaphoras have been so far published in Ethiopic, or translated into other languages. What has been already done in this respect may here be briefly mentioned.

Texts. In 1548 the Ethiopic New Testament was published at Rome, and as an Appendix to it was added the text of the Pro-Anaphora and of three of the Anaphoras (Apostles, Our Lord and Our Lady). The editor was an Ethiopic priest named Tasfa Sion.

No liturgy in any oriental language was published earlier than this, and even the Greek Liturgies of the Orthodox Church had been edited but a few years previously. It is quite unknown what MSS. Tasfa Sion employed for this edition. Indeed, so much does it differ from all the known MSS. of every age, that it would seem, either that he relied to some extent at least on his memory, or that he used his MSS. with considerable freedom. The text of the Ethiopic Liturgy seems to have been little varied through the centuries, except in the way of additions and transpositions. Apart from these there is comparatively little difference between the Liturgy of the seventeenth century and the Liturgy of the Abyssinian Church of to-day, so far as it has been published by Dr. Mercer. No doubt there are a few places where the Modern Liturgy agrees with the edition of 1548 and one or two Berlin MSS. against the text of MSS. in the British Museum. These probably represent local variation. More often all other authorities agree against Tasfa Sion's edition.

Of only two other Anaphoras has the Ethiopic text been published. The shortest of all (Dioscorus) was printed in Ludolf's Ethiopic Lexicon, and the text of John Chrysostom was given, from an Oxford MS. by Dillmann in his Chrestomathia Æthiopica (1868).

Translations. A Latin version of the Anaphora of the Apostles was published by Tasfa Sion in 1549, and this has often been reprinted, as by Renaudot (with corrections) in the eighteenth century.

The first English version in Brett, On the Liturgies, was made from Renaudot's Latin. Rodwell translated in the Journal of Sacred Literature (1863-64) the Pro-Anaphora and the three Anaphoras of the 1548 edition. These he afterwards published in a separate volume together with other liturgical matter. A later English version of the Pro-Anaphora is to be found in an appendix to Dr. Swainson's work on the Greek Liturgies. This was made by a German scholar, Bezold, who edited the Ethiopic text also (somewhat incomplete) in parallel columns.

The most recent translation of the Ethiopic Liturgy (as distinct from the modern Abyssinian rite) is that found in Brightman's Liturgies Eastern and Western. This was made by the Rev. C. J. Ball from the same British Museum MS. which I have used, some variants being added by him from three other MSS.

Quite recently Dr. Mercer has published a work on the Ethiopic Liturgy based on a MS. of the present day Liturgy, which he calls Mercer 3. In his volume he has included excellent photographic reproductions of those pages of the MS. which contain the Pro-Anaphora and the Anaphora of the Apostles. This is the most useful part of the volume, for the translation is quite unreliable in those parts in which the editor had not Mr. Ball's translation to guide him. Indeed, in some places he follows Mr. Ball's translation where the text of his own MS. differs.

None of the other Anaphoras has ever been edited or translated in full. The words of Institution in all the Anaphoras are given in Neale and Littledale, Primitive Liturgies, Appendix I, and, for the modern rite, in Dr. Mercer's book. The words of Institution and also the Invocation in all the Anaphoras have been published also in Ethiopic and French by Father Chaine in Bessarione, 1910.

It was originally intended to include in this volume only four or five of those Anaphoras which were as yet untranslated, and to refer to Brightman's volume for purposes of comparison with the normal Anaphora. A departure has been made from this original intention in more than one respect, by including the Anaphora of the Apostles translated afresh from Orient. 545, the oldest MS. available in this country; by adding from the same MS. translations of the whole or part of three Anaphoras already available in English (Our Lord, Our Lady, Dioscorus); and by giving (in part) the text of all the remaining Anaphoras, with one exception (Basil). This Anaphora has not been included since it is merely a translation of the Coptic Anaphora bearing the same name.

The following Anaphoras are now given for the first time in an English version:—John Chrysostom, James of Serug and Gregory of Armenia, in full; Athanasius, Epiphanius, The 318, Gregory of Alexandria and Cyril, in part.

THE STRUCTURE OF THE ANAPHORAS

When we compare the parts that are common to the normal Anaphora of the Apostles and to all or the majority of the subordinate Anaphoras, we find that a definite plan has been, more or less regularly, followed in the composition of the latter. All begin with the Thanksgiving or Preface, divided into sections by certain proclamations of the deacon, and generally also by the formula which introduces the Intercession. In two Anaphoras (Greg. Alex. and Basil), however, this last is found after the Institution as in the liturgies of the Antiochene or Syrian type. Following the Preface comes the Sanctus, which occurs, or is implied, in all but two (Epiphanius and The 318). Perhaps in these it is implied also.

After the Sanctus the normal Anaphora has a brief Commemoration of the Passion. The feature is retained in all the others, but its position is by no means fixed; in some it comes before the Sanctus, in others before the Institution, in others after the Institution; it is sometimes divided into two, or even three, parts coming at different points of the service. The brief Commemoration of the Anaphora of the Apostles is generally lengthened considerably so as to include some of the following: the Incarnation, Life and Miracles, Death, Burial, Descent into Hell, Resurrection, Ascension, Pentecost, the Second Coming.

The next feature of the service, the recital of the words of institution, is naturally contained in all the Anaphoras.

The Oblation occurs in most of the Anaphoras, but is absent from four. The Invocation is found in all with one exception (Greg. Arm.), and even here there is one brief clause which can be interpreted as a kind of Invocation, though the Holy Spirit is not named.

After the Invocation in most of the Anaphoras comes the Prayer of the Fraction, followed by the exclamation 'Pray ye,' a formula which seems to imply the Lord's Prayer, as otherwise that Prayer would be entirely absent from the subordinate Anaphoras, except Our Lord (see p. 66 and Chrysostom (p. 92)).

Following this in the normal Liturgy we have the Inclination, introduced by the formula 'Standing, bow your heads.' This formula is absent from three Anaphoras. In one of these (Our Lord) it is given in Rodwell's edition.

The omission by all the other Anaphoras of the next section of the normal Liturgy, the Manual Acts and Communion, is somewhat remarkable. It must naturally be taken for granted that all here followed the normal.

It is noteworthy in this connexion that the only part of the normal Liturgy which makes reference to any of the subordinate Anaphoras is just this. In the Anaphora of the Apostles three formulas are given for use in the delivery of the Bread, one to be used in the Anaphora of the Apostles, the second in the Anaphora of Our Lord, and the third in the Anaphora of the Elders. As there is no Anaphora which bears this last name, it is a natural conjecture, that it is a general term to include all the others except the two specially named.

The Prayer, 'Pilot of the soul' follows the Communion in the normal Liturgy, and the same prayer is appointed at this point in all the other Anaphoras except Our Lady.

The conclusion of the service is marked by the rubrics 'Imposition of hand' both in the normal and the majority of the rest.

These landmarks of the service may now be set out as they occur in the Anaphora of the Apostles.

- A. Thanksgiving or Preface (contained after B.C. etc.)
- B. 'For the sake of the blessed' (introducing the Intercession).
- C. 'Ye who sit, arise.'
- D. 'Look to the east.'
- E. 'Let us attend,' or 'We are attending.'
- F. Sanctus.
- G. 'Answer ye.'
- H. Commemoration of the Passion.
- J. Institution.
- K. Oblation.
- L. Invocation.
- M. Prayer of the Fraction.
- N. 'Pray ye' (the Lord's Prayer).
- O. 'Standing, bow your heads' (the Inclination).
- P. Manual Acts, Communion and Thanksgiving.
- Q. 'Pilot of the soul.'¹
- R. 'Imposition of hand.'

A few words must be said in addition about two of these, B and E.

B. 'For the sake of the blessed.' This is the formula which introduces the Intercession. I am not quite sure that this is the correct translation. In Ethiopic the formula consists of two words, the opening ones of the Intercession in the Anaphora of the Apostles. The first of these two words is a preposition which may bear either of meanings 'for the sake of', or 'on behalf of'. In Brightman's LEW the former of these meanings is given; Renaudot, however, translates by 'pro', and ¹ In Or. 545 the words of this prayer are not given, except in the Anaphora of Our Lord (cf. below, p. 66).

Rodwell has 'for', which is ambiguous, but which he probably took as an equivalent of Renaudot's 'pro'. If the words 'hear us' which occur further on in the passage in the translation given by Brightman were correct, the meaning would more probably be 'for the sake of'. These words 'hear us' are not a translation of the text. The Ethiopic word which they are intended to represent, is the proper name 'Simon' which precedes Peter, not only in Orient. 545, but also in Mercer 3. I have, however, though with some hesitation, retained the translation 'for the sake of', because in the Anaphora of Our Lady immediately before the formula come the words, 'We take as intercessors with our Lord God those two of whom we make mention the Patriarch Abba N. of the great city of Alexandria, and the head of our cities the blessed Bishop Abba N.' (Rodwell's translation.) The places which this formula occupies in the various Anaphoras are to be noted. In only six does it occur in exactly the normal position. In two it comes after the Institution, as in the Syrian type of Liturgy. From one it is altogether absent.

E. Only two of the other Anaphoras have this formula in the subjunctive as in Apostles. Six others have the imperfect which would mean 'We are attending', or, 'We will attend'. As the difference is only in a single vowel, we might suppose it a copyist's error, if it occurred in one or two places only. The occurrence, however, so often seems rather to point to a real variation in these Anaphoras.

THE VARIOUS ANAPHORAS IN DETAIL

Our Lord. The title of this in Orient. 545 is 'The Book of the Covenant which our Lord Jesus Christ spake to His Apostles before His ascension after His resurrection from the dead.' This title connects it at once with the Eucharistic Office which is found in the Ethiopic version of the Testament of our Lord which it reproduces almost verbatim.

In this Anaphora before the Thanksgiving or Preface comes the beginning of the Sursum Corda in the form, 'Let your hearts be in heaven. Yea, let our hearts be in heaven. For Thy name's sake strengthen us and make us worthy of Jesus Christ.' Then follow various warnings against unworthy reception, proclaimed by the deacon, together with an invitation to draw nigh, and then comes the rest of the Sursum Corda and the exclamation of the deacon, 'That which is holy for the holy,' after which the Thanksgiving commences. The rest of the Anaphora follows the normal order, including the Sanctus, which is implied by the deacon's 'Answer ye', as far as the Invocation. The words of Institution are in an unusual form, the formula passing into the second person in the case of the cup. After the Invocation in Orient. 545 there is nothing more except part of Psalm cxlv said by the priest, the Lord's Prayer, said by the people, and the prayer: 'Pilot of the soul', but in Rodwell's edition are added the Prayer of the Fraction, the 'Pray ye' which precedes the Lord's Prayer, and the Inclination. If these parts, which are added in Rodwell's edition, really belong to this Anaphora, then the only one omitted of the parts enumerated above, is the Imposition of hand.

Our Lady. This is in some respects the strangest of all. The order of parts does not differ from the normal, but K and Q are omitted.

Cyriacos, if he was the author, promises in the beginning of the Anaphora to set forth Mary's praises with brevity. This promise he can hardly be said to keep. The final part of the Thanksgiving leading up to the Sanctus is of very great length, and includes (quite uniquely) the Prayer of Faith, that is, the Nicene Creed.

The first part of this section after an ascription of holiness to the Trinity, is in praise of the Virgin, who is seen as typified in the lives of all the great worthies of the Old Testament, from Adam to Malachi, and as the source of all Christian graces. Then follows a discussion as to the nature of the Deity, and a defence of the Trinity against Jews and Moslems. This leads up to the Prayer of Faith, after which there is a 'return to the beginning of our discourse' the wonderful nature of the Virgin and her Child-bearing, ending with 'now will we praise the Son by saying, Holy, Holy, Holy, etc.'

The mention in this section of the Moslems is of course a mark of lateness of origin, as is also the mention of incense after the Sanctus. Another note of lateness is, perhaps, to be seen in an exclamation of the deacon: 'Lift up your hands, ye presbyters,' which occurs before the Institution. This is not found in the Anaphora of the Apostles (except in its modern form), but occurs also in Chrysostom and James of Serug. Warnings against unworthy reception occur in this Anaphora in a shorter form, before the Inclination.

John, the Son of Thunder. Though this Anaphora contains all the parts of the normal as above enumerated, it has them in a very different order. The Sanctus comes early, and the Intercession is deferred till just before the Institution. The Commemoration (H) follows the Sanctus, and is of considerable length, including mention of the Incarnation, Life and Miracles, Passion, Death and Burial. This is followed by 'Look to the east', after which there is worship addressed to Christ under many rather extravagant titles, with further reference to the Gospel miracles.

The presence of two Oblations is another feature of this Anaphora. The first comes after 'Ye who sit, arise', and before the Intercession; the second occurs in the normal place, but includes a reference which is unusual to the saints of the Old and New Testaments, along with whom it is offered.

John Chrysostom. This Anaphora commences with an exclamation of the deacon, carrying on the thought of the Sursum Corda. The opening section of the Preface is of considerable length, speaking of the eternity of the Divine Essence, and of God's goodness to man as shown in the Incarnation.

The order of the parts is normal with two exceptions, H follows J and K is after M.

We find again in this Anaphora the formula 'Lift up your hands, ye presbyters', introducing the Institution (cf. above, p. 21). The Invocation is twofold, first said by the priest in a low voice, and then aloud. Warnings against unworthy reception are found in this Anaphora before the Lord's Prayer. The only omission is the final Imposition of hand.

Athanasius. This Anaphora has obvious tokens of very late origin. Though it bears the name of Athanasius, it is really better described in its opening words, as the Qeddâsê of the holy Christian Sabbath. The Sabbath is glorified throughout, and at the end is personified to such an extent that it is asked to 'pray for us and plead for us with the Lord our God.' The lengthening of the deacon's exclamations to 'Ye who sit, arise in the fear of God' and 'Let us look to the east in the fear of God' implies also lateness of origin. Besides this, the style is everywhere forced and rhetorical. This would be even more apparent were the translation of the whole given.

The order of the various parts follows almost entirely that of the normal Anaphora. The Intercession, however, does not come at the beginning, but is deferred till after the Sanctus. There is no oblation in the usual place, but, as in Cyril, there is an anticipatory Oblation before the Institution. The deacon's exclamation: 'Answer ye' is omitted.

Epiphanius. There is nothing of special note in this Anaphora except the number of omissions. These include D—G, K and N. The omission of the Sanctus together with the deacon's 'Answer ye' is remarkable. Only one other Anaphora (The 318) omits both of them. In the present Anaphora, as the parts follow the normal order, it is possible that D—G may be in some way included under C. The other two omissions are those of the Oblation and of the 'Pray ye' introducing the Lord's Prayer.

The 318 Orthodox. D, F and G are wanting in this Anaphora also. If, however, they are included under C then all the parts indicated above are here to be found.

The order of the parts is quite exceptional. The opening section of the Preface is followed by E the next by C. Further on in the Preface is inserted an unusual exclamation by the deacon: 'Upward be your thoughts'. The Intercession precedes the Institution, being separated from it by a Commemoration of the Incarnation, Works and Preaching. The rest of the Commemoration comes after the Institution and is in two parts, divided in a strange way by a repeated Sursum Corda.

This Anaphora has signs of being late. Part of the Preface is borrowed from Chrysostom; the allusion in the Preface to the 'great sea where fire and water are mingled together' seems a late touch; so does the curious passage in which Our Lord is said to have 'answered His disciples concerning His Essence'. Later in the Anaphora is found a strange reference to the cry to Adam and all his sons, when our Lord was in the tomb.

Gregory of Alexandria. This Anaphora also has late features. The deacon's exclamation E has been lengthened to 'Let us attend to the beauty of the glory of our God'; the Intercession comes after the Institution, though the Anaphora opens with a proclamation by the deacon asking for the intercessions of the people. The most noticeable sign of lateness is the insertion after the Institution of the five-fold 'cycle' of Hosanna. We seem to find in this Anaphora a double Invocation, the first preceding the Institution, the second following the Intercession.

The parts omitted are the Sanctus (though it is implied in 'Answer ye') the Oblation, the Lord's Prayer and the Inclination.

James of Serug. This Anaphora is one of the most interesting of all. If it be one of the latest, and it has certainly in places indications of late origin, it was composed by someone who could enter into the spirit of the ancient formulas.

The parts run on normal lines. None of the above enumerated features is wanting, except the deacon's 'Answer ye' after the Sanctus, which may be an accidental omission. The words of Institution are cast throughout in the second person, as they are (for the cup) in the Anaphora of Our Lord. These are, perhaps, indications of early date. On the other hand the long passage about the four Evangelists (p. 119) inserted before the Institution seems to be a mark of late origin.

Still more so is the obscure reference to 'Melos, the terrifying sword of fire' (if this be the correct translation). The same name (if it be a proper name) occurs in but one other Anaphora. The passage also about the three blasts of the trumpet (p. 123) is not likely to have been written early, and the same may be said of the reference a little further on (p. 125) to the Blessed Virgin 'who is our Lady and the Glory of our race', especially when the words are added, 'Thou didst say unto her, Whoso maketh memorial of thee, and calleth on thy name, shall live in life eternal.'

If there is any form of Oblation in this Anaphora, it is of the briefest kind.

Basil. This is not included, as it is merely a translation into Ethiopic of the Coptic Anaphora of St. Basil.

Gregory of Armenia. This is one of the shortest and probably also of the earliest. I see no sign in it of lateness of origin, except the reference in the first section of the Thanksgiving to making the sign of the cross. This clause may easily be a later addition.

The parts, so far as they are present, follow one another in the normal order, except that the Intercession immediately precedes, and is closely joined to, the Institution. The form of the Institution is strange. The words 'In the same night in which He was betrayed' come almost after 'Look to the east', but there is a long passage, including the Intercession, between them and the actual words of Institution.

E and R are altogether lacking, there is no Commemoration of the Passion, except in a very rudimentary form, and there is no Invocation.

Cyril. The Sanctus comes in this Anaphora after the first section of the Thanksgiving. It is followed by the Commemoration of the Incarnation, Passion, etc. (including the Session and the Second Coming). The Intercession comes immediately before the Institution being itself preceded by a form of Oblation. The other parts are in the normal order, though E and R are wanting.

We have mention again in this Anaphora of 'Melos, the sword of fire', as in The 318 (see p. 25). This is a mark of lateness of origin, as are also the passages (pp. 135-6) which immediately precede and follow the exclamatory 'Pray ye'.

This Anaphora and Greg. Alex. seem to be in some way connected with Basil. After 'Pilot of the soul' is found in both a rubric referring the priest to that Anaphora for the whole or part of the concluding portion.

THE INVOCATION IN THE ANAPHORAS

The two earliest forms of Invocation extant in Ethiopic are those found in the Anaphora of the Ethiopic Church Ordinances and in that of the Testamentum Domini. In both of these the Invocation is a prayer for the gift of the Holy Spirit upon the communicants for their sanctification and confirmation in the faith. In the Anaphora of the Church Ordinances the words are :

We pray Thee and entreat Thee to send the Holy Spirit on the oblation of this Church. Do Thou, uniting them, give them unto all who receive of it for sanctification and for fulfilling with the Holy Spirit and for strengthening of faith in truth, that they may hallow Thee, etc.

and in the Testamentum Domini:

Grant union unto us all who receive of Thy holy things that we may be filled with the Holy Spirit and the strength of faith in truth that for ever we may praise Thee, etc.¹

A form of Invocation of this type is found in four of the later Anaphoras, Our Lord, Gregory of Alexandria, Gregory of Armenia and Athanasius. In the first of these the words are almost identical with those of the Church Ordinances; in the second and third (pp. 112, 130) the wording is changed but the prayer remains of the same type. In the Anaphora of Athanasius there occurs before the Prayer of the Fraction a clause which seems to be a remnant of an Invocation of this kind. It is very short: 'Do Thou, uniting them, give them unto all, sanctifying one by the other.' Further on there are words which embody an Invocation of the later type. 'Let him who is the Lamb come. . . . Let His Body be united with this bread and His Blood poured into this cup, etc.' A passage almost identical with it is found after the Invocation proper in Dioscorus.

¹ This which agrees with the Syriac Testament implies a slight change of reading in the Ethiopic.

In the Anaphora of Our Lord we find two Invocations, the second being the same as that of the Testamentum Domini. The first is a prayer for the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the elements.

Therefore we Thy servants pray Thee, O Lord, and entreat Thee to send the Holy Spirit and power on this bread and upon this cup. May He make it the Body and Blood of Our Lord and Our Saviour Jesus Christ for ever.

Invocations of this type are found in the Anaphoras of The 318, Dioscorus and James of Serug. In Dioscorus except for the omission of the words 'and power' the form agrees almost verbally with that just quoted. The other two both begin in the same way (cf. also John Ev.) 'Flung wide be the doors of light and opened the gates of glory.' Then follows the prayer for the descent of the Spirit. In the Anaphora of The 318 the words are:

Let Him descend and come and shine on this bread and let it be the Body of Christ our God; and let the savour of this cup be changed and let it be the Blood of Christ our God.

and in James of Serug:

Let Him descend and abide on this table set before me Thy servant, and sent forth be Melos the terrifying sword of fire and let Him who breaketh this Eucharist be seen on this bread and cup.

In the other Anaphoras we find both types side by side. In the Anaphora of the Apostles:

We pray Thee, O Lord, and entreat Thee to send the Holy Spirit and power, etc. (as in the Anaphora of Our Lord). Do Thou, uniting them, etc. (as in the Church Ordinances).

In Epiphanius the form is not much changed, except that the prayer is addressed to the Son. Instead of the clause, 'for sanctification, etc.' we have here 'for blessing and for forgiveness of sin, for joy and for rejoicing, for renewal of soul and body and spirit, and for strengthening of faith unto (their) last breath.'

In John the Evangelist both parts have been lengthened considerably :

Flung wide be the doors of light and opened the gates of glory; and let Thy Living and Holy Spirit come, descend and dwell, tabernacle, rest and bring a blessing on the thanksgiving of this bread, and hallow this cup. May this bread be the communion of Thy Living Body and this cup the communion of Thy compassionate Blood; that to every one that believeth in the living Father and the only Son who was begotten of Him, and in the living and unsearchable Holy Spirit, and who receiveth Thy Body and Thy Blood, it may be for hope and for salvation, and for remission of sin, and for resurrection from the dead, for the light of the kingdom of heaven, and for life eternal for ever.

In Chrysostom (p. 91) we meet with an unusual double form, the first to be said 'in a low voice,' is a prayer of the earlier type, the second, to be said 'in a loud voice,' is not only for the descent of the Holy Spirit on the elements, but also for the sanctification of the communicants.

In Cyril the enlargement of the clauses and other features are evidences of the lateness of the form :

Before Thy face the Melos of fire flameth ; revealed and opened are the heavens in Thy righteousness and by Thy Will. Thy Living and Holy Spirit is sent forth ; may He descend and come and rest on this bread and cup, may He bless and hallow (them) ; and may it be unto us the communion of the Body and Blood of Thy beloved Son our Lord and our God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, that it may be for remission of guilt to those who offer it, and for forgiveness of sin to those who receive it. And to all those who in true faith partake and receive of it, be it unto them for compassion and mercy, for healing and for help, for life of soul and body, for remission of guilt, and for forgiveness of sins, and for resurrection from the dead and for new life.

I. THE ANAPHORA OF THE APOSTLES

[*The priest saith:*¹ The Lord be with you all.

The people say: With thy Spirit.

The priest saith: Give ye thanks unto our God.

The people say: It is meet (and) right.

The priest saith: Lift up your hearts.

The people say: We have (them) to the Lord our God.]

*The priest saith :*² We give Thee thanks, O Lord, by Thy beloved Son our Lord Jesus Christ for that in the latter days Thou didst send for us Thy Son, a Saviour and Redeemer, the Angel of Thy counsel, the Word which is from Thee, through whom also Thou didst make all things by Thy will.³

The deacon saith: For the sake of⁴ our blessed and holy Patriarch Abba Matthew and the blessed Metropolitan Abba Sinoda.

[After this follow the names of various saints, Stephen, Zacharias, John Baptist, the Four Evangelists, the Virgin Mother, the Twelve, James the Lord's brother, Paul, Timothy, Silas, Barnabas, Titus, Philemon, Clement, the Seventy Disciples, the Five Hundred Companions, The 318 Orthodox.]

The prayers of them all come upon us.

And remember Thou the catholic and apostolic Church in peace, which was made by the precious Blood of

² Saith: The rubrics are in the imperfect nearly always, not in the subjunctive. Hence 'saith' not 'shall say' as in LEW.

³ The parts in Clarendon type show the words taken from the Anaphora of the Ethiopic Church Ordinances.

⁴ For the sake of. (See Introduction, p. 18).

Christ. Remember Thou all Patriarchs, Metropolitans, Bishops, presbyters and deacons and all Christian people.

The assistant presbyter saith the Prayer of Benediction : O Holy Trinity, Father and Son and Holy Spirit, send Thy blessing on Thy beloved Christian people with the blessing of those in heaven and those in earth; and send on us the grace of the Holy Spirit, and make open unto us in mercy the doors of Thy holy Church, and in faith perfect unto us the faith of the Trinity unto (our) last breath.

O my master Jesus Christ, visit the suffering ones of Thy people (and) heal them.

And guide our fathers and our brethren who have gone forth and are on their journeys; bring them back to their homes in peace and in health—benediction.

Bless the winds of heaven, the rains and the fruits of the earth of this year according to Thy grace, and bring joy and gladness continually on the face of the earth, and establish for us Thy peace.

Turn the heart of mighty kings to deal bountifully with us at all times. Grant grace to the chiefs of the Church who are gathered in Thy holy Church to all by their names in the presence of powerful kings.

Comfort¹ (and) rest the souls of our fathers and our brethren and our sisters who have fallen asleep and entered into rest in the faith of Christ; give them rest.

And send a blessing—benediction—upon those who occupy themselves with the incense and the oblation and the wine and the oil and the chrism and the veils and the books of the lessons and the vessels of the sanctuary, that Christ our God may reward them in¹ the heavenly Jerusalem.

¹ LEW and Mercer translate 'lift them up', taking the word from noha, not from neheya from which it evidently comes. The same word occurs three paragraphs lower down where it has the same meaning.

And all those who are assembled with us to entreat for mercy, Christ our God have pity on them, and all those who give alms before Thine awful throne, receive them.

Comfort every straitened soul, those who are bound in chains, and those who are in exile and captivity, and those who are held in bitter servitude, deliver them, our God, in the greatness of Thy mercy.

And all those who have besought us to remember them, Christ our God, remember them in Thy heavenly kingdom²—benediction—feed them and set them up for ever and ever, and keep them in the true faith, in glory and honour all the days of their life, and endue them with love that is exalted above all thought and all understanding.

By the intercession and by the supplication which the Lady of us all, Thy holy and pure Mother, Mary, maketh on our behalf and by the four great luminaries. . . .

[In what follows are named the four archangels, the four incorporeal creatures, the four and twenty priests of heaven, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, John Baptist, the one hundred and forty-four thousand holy babes, the elders, the apostles, St. Mark, the seventy-two disciples, the seven holy children, SS. Stephen, George, Theodore, Mercury, Basilides, Claudius, Mennas, etc.]

their blessing and the grace of their aid be with us world without end.

O peaceful King of peace, Jesus Christ, give unto us Thy peace, and confirm unto us Thy peace, and forgive

¹ Reward them in. This is certainly the correct translation. LEW and Mercer have, 'bring them to'.

² Mercer 3 here adds, 'and me also Thy sinful servant remember'. Mercer translates, 'and drive away from me sin; remember me Thy work'!

us our sins and make us worthy that we may go out and come in in peace.¹

The priest saith: Rest the souls of these and of all and have pity on them. Thou Who sentest Thy Son from Heaven into the Bosom of the Virgin.

The deacon saith: Ye who sit, arise.

The priest saith: He was borne in the womb, He became flesh, His birth was made known by the Holy Spirit. To Thee, before whom stand ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands, both the holy angels and archangels, and Thy glorious creatures that have six wings, the Seraphim and the Cherubim.

The deacon saith: Look to the east.

The priest saith: With two wings they cover their faces, with two wings they cover their feet, and with two wings they fly from end to end of the world.

The deacon saith: Let us attend.

The priest saith: Ever then as they all hallow and praise Thee, with all those who hallow and praise Thee, receive our hallowing also which we utter unto Thee, Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord of hosts, the heavens and the earth are full² of the holiness of Thy glory.

The deacon saith: Answer ye.

The people say: Holy, Holy, Holy. . . .

(And here the priest maketh the sign of the Cross first upon himself and secondly upon the people and again upon the ministers.)

Truly the heavens and the earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory, by our Lord and our God and our Saviour

¹ This passage from 'and keep them in the true faith,' to 'in peace', is omitted here in Mercer 3, but is inserted (in substance) later just before the 'Dismissal' (p. 47). Instead of this long passage a brief petition only is inserted here. Have mercy, O Lord, on our patriarchs, bishops, presbyters and deacons, and all Christian people.

² Are full. On the wording of the Sanctus, see separate note, p. 50.

Jesus Christ. Thy Holy Son¹ came and was born of a Virgin to fulfil Thy will and make a people for Thee.
(Here the ascent of the incense.)

He stretched out His hands to the passion, suffering to save the suffering who have trusted in Thee; who was given up of His own will to the passion that He might destroy death, and burst the bond of Satan, and trample on Sheol, lead forth the Saints, confirm a covenant, and make known His Resurrection.²

In the night in which He was betrayed He took Bread.
(Here he elevateth³ (it).)

The people say : We believe that this is (so) in truth, we believe.

The priest saith: In His holy and blessed hands which were without spot; He looked up to heaven to Thee His Father—benediction—He gave thanks—benediction—blessed—benediction—and brake,⁴ and gave to His disciples—he cutteth it⁵—and said unto them, take, eat—pointing—this bread—he lowereth it⁶—is My Body⁷—pointing—which is broken for you for the forgiveness of sin.

¹Thy Holy Son. LEW, contrary to the punctuation in the MS., joins these words with the previous sentence, so also Mercer contrary to his own MS.

²After this Mercer 3 adds 'The deacon saith, Lift up your hands, ye presbyters.' The same words are found in three of the other Anaphoras.

³LEW renders 'shall take'. The word is, however, in the causative and means 'make to rise'. The rubric is wanting in Mercer 3.

⁴Brake. Mercer 3 adds here a direction to break (or cut) the bread into five parts without separating them.

⁵Cutteth, or, perhaps, as LEW, 'breaketh'. The verb is an unusual one.

⁶Lowereth (it). LEW, 'shall bow himself'. As the verb is causative, this meaning is impossible.

⁷My body. Mercer 3 adds words which seems to mean, 'which the spear pierced.' Mercer, however, takes as a rubric, 'while he shall break it with the spear.'

The people say: Amen, Amen, Amen, we believe and confess, we glorify Thee, our Lord and our God. This is true; we believe.

The priest saith: And likewise—he blesseth—the cup also, giving thanks—benediction—blessing—benediction—and hallowing, He delivered¹ to His disciples, and said unto them, Take, drink—pointing—this cup—pointing—is—pointing—My Blood—he shaketh it—which is poured out for you for² the forgiveness of sin.

The people say: Amen, Amen, Amen.

The priest saith: And when ye do this, make memorial of Me.

The people say: We declare Thy death, O Lord, and Thy holy resurrection;³ we believe Thy ascension; we glorify Thee and we confess Thee; we pray to Thee and confess Thee, our Lord and our God.

The priest saith: Now also, O Lord, remembering His death and His Resurrection we confess thee, and we offer unto Thee this bread—pointing—and this cup, giving thanks unto Thee; and thereby thou has made it a delight⁴ unto us to stand before Thee and do Thee priestly service. We pray Thee, O Lord, and entreat Thee to send the Holy Spirit and Power upon this bread—pointing—and on this cup—pointing.

The people say: Amen. O Lord, have mercy upon us, O Lord, have mercy upon us, O Lord, have pity upon us.

² Mercer 3 has 'and for the ransom of many', adding the rubric 'shaking the cup with the sign of the Cross', not as Mercer, shaking the cup, while he points at the Cross.

³ Here Mercer adds 'and Thy coming again.' So it is in the edition of 1548.

⁴ Delight. The meaning is not clear, but the phrase cannot mean as in LEW 'made us meet'. The word is a noun meaning, 'delight', 'profit', 'dignity'.

The priest saith: May He make it—he blesseth both the bread and the cup three times—the Body and Blood of our Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ for ever and ever.

The deacon saith: With all the heart we entreat the Lord our God to grant us a good communion of the Holy Spirit.

The people say: As it was, is and shall be to generations of generations, world without end.¹

(He maketh the sign of the Cross with the Blood over the Body.)²

The priest saith : Do Thou, uniting them, give them unto all those who receive of it, and may it be unto them for sanctification and for fulfilling with the Holy Spirit and for strengthening of faith in truth, that they may hallow Thee and praise (Thee) and Thy beloved Son Jesus Christ for ever and ever.³

Grant us to be united in Thy Holy Spirit, and heal us by this offering (prosphora)⁴ that we may live in Thee for ever and world without end.

The people say : Amen, grant us.

The priest saith: Blessed (be) the name of the Lord and blessed (be) He who cometh in the name of the Lord, and blessed be the name of His glory. So be it, so be it. Send the grace of the Holy Spirit upon us.

The people say in like manner.

*The deacon saith :*⁵ Arise for prayer.

¹ Here Mercer 3 adds some words which Mercer renders, 'The priest shall say: Truly the body and blood even to his hands and feet'. The words as they stand are meaningless. I would suggest as an emendation, 'The priest saith: The Body and Blood,—pointing with his fingers.' There is no mention of 'hands and feet'.

² This rubric is wanting in Mercer 3.

³ For ever and ever. Mercer 3 substitutes, 'with the Holy Spirit', adding immediately the 'Amen' of the people which here follows further on.

⁴ The Ethiopic is a transliteration of this Greek word.

⁵ From this exclamation to 'with thy Spirit' is omitted in Mercer 3.

The people say: O Lord have mercy upon us.

The priest saith: Peace be to you all.

The people say: With thy Spirit.

The priest saith: *Prayer of the Fraction.*¹

And again we entreat the Almighty Lord the Father of the Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ, to grant us to receive with blessing this Holy Mystery, to give us strength and to hold none of us guilty, but to all those who partake to make a delight the reception of the holy mystery of the Body and Blood of Christ the Almighty Lord our God.

The deacon saith: Pray Ye.

*The people say:*² Our father, which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, as in heaven so also on earth; give us to-day our daily bread; forgive us our trespasses and our iniquities, as we also forgive him that hath trespassed against us; bring us not, O Lord, into temptation, but save us and deliver us from all evil; for Thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory for ever and ever. Amen.

The priest saith: O Lord,³ who upholdest all, grant unto us as a strength the reception of the Holy Mystery, and hold none of us guilty, but bless all in Christ, through whom to Thee, with Him and with the Holy Spirit, be glory and power now and ever and world without end. Amen.

The people say: The hosts of the angels of the Saviour of the world stand before the Saviour of the world, and surround the Saviour of the world, even the Body and the Blood of the Saviour of the world. And let us come before the face of the Saviour of the world. In the faith of Christ let us give thanks.

² The Lord's Prayer is omitted in Mercer 3, but seems implied by the exclamation 'Pray ye'.

³ This prayer is different in Mercer 3 (see p. 51).

The deacon saith : Standing bow your heads.¹

The priest saith : O eternal Lord, who knowest what is hidden and what is open, before Thee, Thy people have bowed their heads, and to Thee have they brought in subjection the hardness of heart and flesh; behold from Thine appointed dwelling place;² bless them, men and women; incline to them Thine ear, and hear their prayer. Strengthen them with the might of Thy right hand, cover and succour them from evil affliction. Be to them a guard both of soul and body; increase in them both men and women thy faith and the fear of Thy name, through Thy only Son world without end.

The deacon saith: Worship the Lord with fear.

The people say: Before Thee, O Lord, we worship, and we glorify Thee.

The priest saith the Prayer of Penitence.

O Lord, Upholder of all the world, it is Thou who healest³ our souls and bodies and spirits, for Thou didst say by the word of Thine only Son, our Lord and our God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, which Thou spakest⁴ to our father Peter, Thou (art) the rock, and on this rock I will build My holy Church, and the gates

¹ After this Mercer 3 has a rubric which Mercer translates thus: The assistant shall turn round; while he comes in, he shall open the door of the prince. This is impossible. 'Open' is plural not singular, 'comes in' should be 'goeth out', and the last word is 'princes' not 'prince'. I do not understand the rubric, but the translation is: The assistant passes (or, turns round); as he goeth out the princes have opened the doors (or, they have opened the doors of the princes).

² Thine appointed dwelling place. LEW, heaven Thy dwelling place. 'Heaven' is impossible. The word is an adjective, and the phrase seems equivalent to that in the Coptic Liturgy of St. Cyril, translated (Hammond, p. 222) 'ex habitaculo præparato'.

³ Mercer 3 adds 'the wounds of', though the words are omitted by Mercer.

⁴ Mercer 3 has 'He spake'. Mercer renders 'thou spakest'.

of Sheol shall not be able to destroy it; and to thee I will give the keys of the kingdom;¹ that which thou hast bound on earth shall be bound in heaven, and that which thou hast loosed on earth shall be loosed in heaven. Loosed and freed be all Thy servants and Thy handmaidens by their several names whether they have done wittingly or unwittingly. Guard, O Lord, and protect these Thy servants and Thy handmaidens, my fathers and my brethren—and also loose my humility, even me Thy sinful and guilty servant; be they loosed and freed by the mouth of the Holy Spirit and by the mouth of me Thy sinful and guilty servant. O Lord our God, merciful and lover of men, who takest away the sin of the world, receive the penitence of these Thy servants and Thy handmaidens, and make the light of eternal life to rise upon them, and forgive them, O Lord, their sins, for Thou art good and a lover of men. O Lord our God, slow to anger, and great in mercy and righteous, forgive me and all Thy servants and Thy handmaidens and save us² from all transgression and curse, if we have transgressed against Thee, O Lord, whether in our words or in our deeds or in our thoughts: forgive and pardon, pity and absolve, for Thou art good and a lover of men. O Lord, pardon me and all Thy people; loose them.³

(And then the priest shall turn towards the people and make the sign of the cross three times and makes mention of those who are with him.)

Remember,⁴ O Lord, all Patriarchs, Metropolitans,

² 'us'. It seems necessary either to emend the pronoun thus from 'them' of the MSS., or else, as the Ethiopic has a stop at 'me', to render, 'forgive me, and save all Thy servants, etc'.

³ The last sentence runs thus in Mercer 3: 'O Lord our God, make us worthy, loosed and free, and me also Thy sinful servant, loose me.' Mercer is hopelessly astray in his translation.

⁴ Mercer 3 prefixes an additional intercession for the Patriarch and Metropolitan in particular.

Bishops, presbyters and deacons and subdeacons, readers and singers, men and women, old men and babes¹ and all Christian people, and stablish them in the faith of Christ.

*(And then he shall make mention of the dead.)*²

Remember, O Lord, our king John and loose him from the band of sin which he hath committed wittingly or unwittingly, subdue his adversaries and his enemies under his feet speedily.

Remember, O Lord, and loose all those who have fallen asleep and entered into rest in the true faith, and unite their souls in the bosom of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

And save us all also from all transgression and curse, and from all unbelief and from all iniquity, and from all excommunication and from all false swearing and from mingling with impiety and uncleanness. Give us, O Lord, wisdom and power of heart and understanding and knowledge that we may keep far and flee, now and henceforth, from every 'work'³ of Satan who tempteth.

Grant us, O Lord, to do Thy will and Thy good pleasure at all times; and write our names in the book of life in the kingdom of heaven with all the saints and martyrs, through Jesus Christ, by whom to Thee, with Him and the Holy Spirit, be glory and power now and ever and world without end. Amen.

The deacon saith : Attend thou.⁴

² This rubric is omitted in Mercer 3.

³ 'Work'. This word is supplied, as in LEW, from later MSS.

⁴ This exclamation in the MS. (and also in Mercer 3) is in the second person singular. The rendering 'let us attend', or 'give we heed', which is in LEW implies an emendation (possibly correct) by the insertion of a single letter.

*The priest saith: Holiness to the holy.*¹

The assistant priest saith: One is the Holy Father, one is the Holy Son, and one is the Holy Spirit.

*(The priest shall take the asbadikon.)*²

The priest saith: The Lord be with you all.

The people say: With thy Spirit.

(The priest saith: Lord have mercy upon us, Christ (have mercy upon us) in a loud voice three times, in a low tone three times, five times each, and the people say likewise.)

*(And the priest shall elevate the Body in his hand and dip the tip of his finger in the Blood, and he maketh the sign of the Cross once on the large portion and again inside and three times on the small portion.)*³

The deacon saith: Prayer. Ye who are in penitence bow your heads.

The priest saith: Prayer. Have⁴ compassion on Thy people who are in penitence, according to the greatness of Thy compassion, and according to the multitude of Thy mercy blot out their transgressions; protect and keep them, redeem their souls in peace. Cutting short their former deeds unite them in the holy Church by the grace and power of Thy only Son our Lord and our

² In the MSS. this word is by mistake written as two words, 'the reward of the deacon.' It is really a corruption of the Greek word δεσποτικὸν σῶμα the name given to 'the central square of the consecrated host, detached at the fraction and put into the chalice at the commixture' (see Brightman, LEW, Glossary).

⁴ This prayer in Mercer 3 commences 'O Lord our God, look upon those who are here present; have compassion on them according to', etc. Mercer disregards the change of text.

Saviour Jesus Christ, by whom to Thee, with Him and with the Holy Spirit, be glory and power now and ever world without end. Amen.

The deacon saith: Arise for prayer.

The people say: O Lord, have compassion upon us.

The priest saith: Peace be to you all.

The people say: With thy spirit.

The priest who consecrated saith: This is in truth the holy Body of our Lord and our God and our Saviour Jesus Christ which is given for life and for salvation and for forgiveness of sin for those who receive of it in faith. Amen.

The people say: Amen.

The priest saith: This is in truth the precious Blood of our Lord and our God Jesus Christ which is given for life and for salvation and for forgiveness of sin for those who take of it in faith. Amen. For this is the Body and Blood of Emmanuel our God in truth. Amen. I believe, I believe, I believe and confess until the last breath that this is the Body and Blood of our Lord and our God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, which He took of the Lady of us all, the holy and pure Virgin Mary, and made it one with His Godhead without admixture or intermingling, without separation or change; and He confessed indeed with a good confession in the days of Pontius Pilate, and delivered it up for our sakes on the tree of the cross by His sole will for the life of us all. Amen.

I believe, I believe, I believe and confess that His Godhead was not separated from His manhood, no, not for an hour, nor for the twinkling of an eye, He delivered it up for our sakes for life and for salvation and for forgiveness for those who receive of it in faith. Amen.

I believe that this is (so) in truth. Amen. This is

He to whom is due all honour and glory and worship, to the Holy Trinity, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, co-equal at all times, now and ever and world without end.

PRAYER OF THE PRIEST¹

O Lord, O Lord, it is not meet that Thou shouldest come beneath the roof of my polluted house, for I have provoked Thee to anger and moved Thee to wrath and have done evil in Thy sight and have polluted my soul and body, and in me there is not one good deed. But because Thou wast made and didst become man for my salvation, for the sake of Thy precious cross and Thy life-giving death and Thy resurrection on the third day, I pray Thee and entreat Thee to purify me from all transgression and curse and sin; and when I receive the mystery of Thy holy things be it not unto me for a reproach or for condemnation,² but have mercy on me and pity me in the multitude of Thy mercy, and grant me pardon for my sin and life for my soul, through the prayer of our Lady Mary and John the Baptist and³ for the sake of all the saints and martyrs for ever and ever.

The priest who consecrated shall say: Prayer. Behold⁴ Thy Son, a sacrifice which is well-pleasing unto Thee, and by this pardon me, for for my sake Thy Son died Behold the pure Blood was poured out for my

² For a reproach or for condemnation. Mercer 3 reads 'for condemnation, no, not for a moment', which Mercer translates 'for judgment, nor for nodding (sic)'.

³ And for the sake, etc. Mercer 3 'and all the holy angels and all the martyrs who strove for the right' (lit. good).

⁴ This prayer is a good deal altered in Mercer 3.

sake on Golgotha, and crieth¹ in my stead. For the sake of it receive my prayer. For my sin Thy Beloved received the spear and the nails, He suffered that He might be well-pleasing unto Thee. After I was safe, Satan returned and shot at me² with his darts. Grant me Thy mercy for the adversary is strong, and by the food³ of sin he hath slain me. Avenge Thou me on the insolent who is not satisfied with my life. Thou, O Lord, King and Saviour, bind up for me my wound. Till⁴ the going forth of my last breath I will believe aright that this is the Body and the Blood of Emmanuel our God in truth, which He took of the Lady of us all, the holy Mary.

(And then he shall sign therewith 'on'⁵ the Body and Blood with the sign of the cross of the Body and shall say:)

Blessed (be the Lord God for ever. Amen.)

(And he shall place it on the Blood, to wit the sign of the Cross of the Body. While he receiveth the host, he shall say:

O my Lord Jesus Christ, be not this Thy mystery (for) guilt upon me, but rather for the purifying of my soul and body.

(And⁶ then he administereth, saying, in the Anaphora of our Lord, the body of our Lord Jesus Christ which is of the Holy Spirit for sanctification of soul and spirit;

¹ LEW and Mercer wrongly 'let it cry'.

² LEW and Mercer, 'pierced me through'.

³ Food. The phrase seems to have the meaning 'fuel of sin'. The word does not mean 'burden', as LEW and Mercer translates.

⁴ From this down to 'soul and body' is omitted in Mercer 3.

⁵ 'On'. This word is supplied as in LEW from later MSS.

⁶ Mercer 3 has, 'He who delivereth the holy Body (saith)'. Mercer, joining with the preceding clause in his MS. (see above), translates 'bind up my wound which they gave His holy body'!

*and in every Anaphora of the Apostles,*¹ the Bread of life which came down from Heaven, the Body of Christ; *and in the Anaphora of the Elders,*² The Holy Body of Emmanuel our God in truth which He took of the Lady of us all.

And he who receiveth shall say: Amen.

(Prayer which the faithful say, each one when he receiveth the Host in his mouth and he shall say:)

Holy, Holy, Holy, Trinity ineffable, grant me to receive unto life this Body and Blood without condemnation. Grant me to bring forth fruit which may be well-pleasing unto Thee, that, appearing in Thy glory, I may live unto Thee doing Thy will. Confessing I will call upon Thee, O Father, and will call upon Thy kingdom. Hallowed be, O Lord, Thy name upon us, for Thou art mighty, praised and glorified, and to Thee be glory for ever and ever.³

(And after this prayer, he who receiveth shall eat.)

(And while receiving the Blood he shall say this:)

Fill my mouth with Thy glory, a joy to my heart and a delight to my soul, who have received the divine mystery which was with it in communion. The Holy Spirit came down upon it when the priest of the Lord consecrated it in a great mystery.⁴

The deacon saith while delivering (the cup): This is the cup of life which came down from heaven, to wit the Blood of Christ.

The people who receive say: Amen and Amen.

¹ Or, perhaps, omitting one letter 'in the Anaphora of the Apostles'.

² As to the meaning of this see Introduction, p. 17.

³ For the long addition after this prayer in Mercer 3, see p. 52. below.

⁴ A different prayer is substituted in Mercer 3, which follows the words for the delivery of the cup.

The deacon saith, after the priests and deacons have received: Pray ye for us and for all Christians who have bidden us make remembrance of them in the Eucharist, and in the love of Jesus Christ give praise and sing.

(And receiving the water they say this:)

Glory to the Lord who hath given us His Body and His Blood, even our Lord Jesus Christ for ever and ever. Amen and Amen. So be it. So be it.¹

(And then they shall sing:)

Precious is the glory of the psalm.²

The priest saith while going out: Those whom Thou hast called, O Lord, and those whom Thou hast sanctified, make partakers of Thy calling, and guard by Thy strength and stablish in Thy love and guard³ from all evil in Thy heavenly kingdom through Christ, by whom to Thee, with Him and with the Holy Spirit, be glory and power now and ever and world without end.

The deacon saith after the people have received: Eternal God, Light of life, Thou hast given, O Lord, to Thy servants strength and protection throughout past days and nights, guarding all things in peace; bless (them) in these days also and hereafter through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom to Thee, with Him and with the Holy Spirit, be glory and power now and ever and world without end. Amen.

The deacon saith: Let us give thanks to God, having partaken of His holy things: praising the Lord our ¹ This doxology and the preceding rubric are omitted in Mercer 3, but there is inserted later (see p. 56) a 'Prayer after the cold water' which may be intended as a substitute.

² According to LEW, p. civ, the Psalm which is here sung is Psalm cl.

³ The end of this prayer is different in Mercer 3, and runs thus: 'Guard them from every work (of evil and to every work) of good unite us through Thy only Son'. The words in brackets have been omitted in the MS. by homoioteleuton.

God, let us ask and beseech that what we have received be unto us a medicine for the healing of the soul. We have received of His holy Body. This is the Blood of Christ. Let us give thanks that He hath made us meet to partake in the precious and holy mystery.¹

The priest saith: My mouth shall speak the glory of God, and let all flesh bless His holy name for ever and world without end.

The people say: Our Father, which art in heaven, lead us not into temptation.

The priest saith : *Pilot of the soul.*²

And again we entreat thee, Who upholdest all, God the Father of the Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ: for That thou hast granted us a portion that we should receive of Thy holy Mystery that it be not unto us for guilt nor for judgment, but for renewal of soul and body and spirit, through Thy only Son, by whom to Thee, with Him and with the Holy Spirit, be glory and power now and ever and world without end. Amen.³

IMPOSITION OF HAND⁴

O eternal God, Light of life unquenchable, look upon Thy servants and Thy handmaidens, and sow in their hearts the fear of Thy name, and grant them in blessing

¹ LEW has an addition here of two other Psalm verses with the response in each case, Our Father, etc., as below.

² Pilot of the Soul. The text of this prayer will be found in the Anaphora of Our Lord. It comes from the Testamentum Domini (Syriac, but not Ethiopic). It is named in all the Anaphoras except that of Our Lady. Mercer translates this rubric: 'The priest shall say, going around breathing'!

³ For the passage in Mercer 3 which follows this prayer, see p. 55. below.

⁴ Before the 'Imposition of hand' Mercer's translation has the rubric: 'The priest shall say while filling it and cleansing it and giving thanks'. It may safely be said that this is wrong, though it may not be easy to suggest the right translation. The rubric seems to mean 'The priest saith at the end of the purification for the sake of thanksgiving.'

to bear fruit to that which hath been given them in Thy name, Thy Body and Blood; and let Thy hand be on those who have humbled their heads before Thee, (even) Thy people, men and women, old men and babes, virgins and monks, widows and orphans; and us also here cover and help and strengthen with Thy strength (and the strength of) Thy archangels; from every deed of evil turn us away, in every work of good unite us through Christ, by whom to Thee, with Him and with the Holy Spirit, be glory and power now and ever and world without end. Amen.¹

The deacon saith: Bow down your heads before God the Father that He may bless you.²

And then the priest shall bless, saying: The Lord bless (thee) and make His face to shine on thee, and be merciful unto thee, and give thee peace.

(And then the priest shall say as he blesseth three times with the sign of the Cross.)

Feed them and set them up and guard them for ever, and guard Thy holy Church which Thou didst purchase and redeem with the precious Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ (and) which Thou hast made to be a congregation of kings and princes, a pure generation and a holy people.³

The deacon saith: Go in Peace.⁴

The priest saith: The Lord be with you all.

The people say: With thy Spirit.

Amen: the Lord bless us His servants in peace. Be

² After this Mercer 3 adds, 'The people say: Amen. The Lord bless us and have compassion on us', omitting the rubric following and the words of the priest's benediction.

³ For the additions in Mercer 3 after this prayer see p. 55.

⁴ The words 'Go in peace' came in Mercer 3 after the following prayer.

it unto us for forgiveness that we have received Thy Body and Blood. Suffer us by the Spirit to tread on all the power of the enemy. The blessing of Thy holy hand which is full of mercy, it we all hope for. Remove from us every work of evil; unite us to every work of good. Blessed be He who hath given us His holy Body and precious Blood. Grace have we received and life have we found by the power of the Cross of Jesus Christ. To Thee, O Lord, we give thanks, having received the grace which is from the Holy Spirit.¹

The Anaphora of the Apostles is ended.

NOTE ON THE FORM OF THE SANCTUS IN ETHIOPIC

The translation usually given is: 'Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord of Hosts (or, Sabaoth), right (or, wholly) full are the heavens, etc.' For this translation the word translated 'right' or 'wholly' ought to be an adverb, that is to say, according to the Ethiopic idiom, it ought to be the accusative case of the adjective. This is nowhere found. In the four Anaphoras (Apostles, Athanasius, Gregory of Armenia, Cyril) in which the full form of the Sanctus occurs the word is always in the nominative. As the adjective means 'perfect' or 'complete,' this might be taken as agreeing with 'Lord,' or possibly even with 'Sabaoth' (which elsewhere is used as a Divine name). In the translation given in the text above I have followed a different explanation. It seems to me more likely that originally the opening words only of the Sanctus were written, followed by the adjective 'complete' or 'full' in the sense of 'etc.' Afterwards when the full form came to be written, this adjective would be retained under the erroneous impression that it formed part of the wording. From the Liturgy the word has even found its way into the text of the Ethiopic Bible in some MSS. in Isaiah ix.

NOTES ON MODERN CHANGES IN THE LITURGY

The more important changes and additions in the modern Liturgy of the Abyssinian Church as found in Dr. Mercer's MS. (Mercer 3).

Before the rubric (p. 35) 'Here the ascent of the incense' the following rubric and prayer are added:

The people say : Remember us, O Lord, in Thy kingdom; remember us, O Lord, O Master, in Thy kingdom; remember us, O Lord, in Thy kingdom, as Thou didst remember the thief on the right hand, when Thou wast on the tree of the holy cross.

The Prayer of the Fraction (see p. 38) is different and runs as follows:¹

I give Thee humble thanks, O Lord my God, Upholder of the whole world, who sittest upon the Cherubim and the Seraphim, and retest for ever,² who has manifested to us the hidden mystery on the tree of the cross. And who is a God merciful and holy as Thou? Thine is the power which Thou hast given to Thy apostles (and to those)³ who minister to Thee a sweet savour (even to) Thee, O Lord our God, etc.

The Prayer after the Lord's Prayer (see p. 38) also is different:

O Lord our God, who upholdest all, we pray Thee

¹ This Prayer is similar to the Prayer of Fraction in Tasfa Sion's edition (cf. Hammond, Antient Liturgies, p. 259).

² Mercer translates: givest rest to the world. I have followed Tasfa Sion 'requiescens in æternum'.

³ These words seem to have fallen out, see Tasfa Sion 'Apostolis et illis qui serviunt'.

and entreat Thee that Thy power, 'be not far'¹ from us, even as the power which Thou hast given to the apostles (and to those)² who serve Thee in lowliness of heart and offer unto Thee a sweet savour for the sake of our Lord, etc.

After the prayer commencing, 'Holy, Holy, Holy, Trinity' on page 46 is inserted a long Confession or statement of the Faith, taken almost verbatim from the Didascalia (chap. xxxiii.)

OF OUR FATHERS THE APOSTLES

We believe in one God the maker of all creation, through our Lord and our God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. For there was no 'cause'³ in His Essence, as we have already said, but He was at all times; He hath no beginning nor any end, and in Him is light unquenchable, and there is none that can approach thereto (or, unto Him). He was not two or four,⁴ neither can He receive any addition, but He is One alone who abideth for ever. For He was not known (to others), being unknowable,⁵ but we have known Him perfectly by the Law and the prophets that He is Almighty and set in authority over all creation, one God, the Father of our Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who was begotten before the world was created, the only Son, co-equal with Him, the Creator of (all) creatures and powers and hosts, who was pleased to be made man in the latter days, and took (flesh)⁶ of the holy Virgin

³ The reading in Mercer 3 is a vox nihili. A transposition of two letters gives the reading of the Didascalia as in the text.

⁴ The Didascalia reads: three.

⁵ A slight change would give the reading of the Didascalia which is preferable. 'Yet He was not One hidden who cannot be known'.

⁶ This word has dropped out in Mercer 3. It is in the Didascalia.

Mary, without seed of man, and grew up with men without sin or transgression, neither was guile (found) in His mouth. And afterwards He suffered and died in the flesh; He rose from the dead on the third day and ascended into heaven and sat on the right hand of power, and sent to us the Paraclete who proceedeth from the Father and hath saved the world, who is with the Father and the Son.

We say then, that every creature of God is good, and nothing is (to be) rejected; spirit, 'the life of'¹ the body is pure and holy in all things. And we say that marriage and the begetting of children are pure and there is no uncleanness (in them), for God created Adam and Eve that men might multiply.

We understand then that there is in our body a soul which dieth not and perisheth not with the body. And we abhor all the works of apostates from the faith and all 'division'² and transgression of the law, for they are unclean unto us.³ Again, we believe in the resurrection of the dead, both righteous and sinners, and in the day of judgment when each shall be requited according to his works. And, moreover, we believe that Christ was in no wise diminished by His Incarnation, but that He is God the Word, who became man in truth and reconciled the race of man with God as the High Priest of the Father.

We are not circumcised, then, like the Jews; we believe that He hath come¹ who fulfilled the Law and the prophets, for whose coming all nations hoped, even Jesus Christ, who sprang from Judah, from the stem of Jesse, whose government is on His shoulder.² To Him be glory and thanksgiving, majesty and blessing, praise and singing now and ever and world without end.

² A change of one letter gives this, which is the reading of the Didascalia.

³ Mercer's translation of these two sentences is strange: 'We say, therefore, that he is our body and soul, for he did not die, and did not repudiate the body: for we believe that we take all their deeds upon us, and all creation; but the law was perverted by impure words'!

The following prayer is used in the modern Liturgy as a substitute for that commencing, 'Fill my mouth with Thy glory' (see p. 46). In Mercer 3 it comes after the words used for the delivery of the cup.

(And then here he who 'receiveth'³ shall say in his heart this prayer as he retaineth the Blood in his mouth.)⁴

My Lord and my God, behold I have received Thy pure Body and Thy precious Blood for forgiveness of my sin and for remission of my guilt. O Only-begotten and Lover of men, fill my mouth with Thy glory. For that it was Thou who (wast praised and)⁵ didst become man, save us for Thy name's sake for ever and ever. Glory⁶ to Thee, my Lord Jesus Christ, who hast granted (this) to us all alike by the hand of Thy servant N.⁷ We ¹ It seems necessary to read the perfect as in the Didascalia. Mercer 3 has the imperfect, though Dr. Mercer translates as if it were the perfect. He also, to the detriment of the sense, renders the first word of this sentence, 'He was not circumcised' (sic).

² Mercer's rendering is: Sprang from the Jews from the Branch of Isaiah, the power of the blood of his shoulder.

³ Mercer 3 has a meaningless form, which Mercer translates 'administereth'. This contradicts the words of the prayer.

⁴ Mercer's rendering: 'the power of the blood being in his mouth' is absurd.

⁶ Mercer takes the word here translated 'Glory' as a rubric, and renders, 'Again'.

⁷ Mercer renders: 'Who hast given to all of us equality one with another on account of certain of Thy deeds'. This has no meaning.

glorify Thee, and pray Thee that we may be in Thy flock. Number us with Thy sheep, and accept us now, and remember not against us our former guilt. We give Thee thanks for Thy grace which hath been given unto us and for Thy help which hath been with us.

After the Prayer (see p. 48) which commences, 'And again, we entreat Thee', etc., are added the following :

*Psalm.*¹ And the fruit of the Holy Spirit, peace and life may He give us . . .² and favour with Hallelujah, Hallelujah. Peaceful be the holy Church with us before; and behind be it with us and abide with us. The priest saith: Hallelujah, Hallelujah, Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be Thy name, Forgive us our sins,³ Lead us not into temptation, O Lord, save us from the evil day, and deliver us from all temptation.

In the Dismissal after the Prayer (see p. 49) beginning, 'Feed them and set them up,' comes an address to the people which Dr. Mercer prints as part of the preceding prayer.

Ye who have come together in the faith of the holy Church, who have eaten the holy Body, and (drunk) the precious Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, may He pardon your sins which ye have committed (wittingly) or unwittingly against the purity of His law; may He have mercy upon you (in this) transitory (world), and keep you in that which is to come, for His Body's sake, the Body of His divinity, and His Blood's sake, the Blood of the covenant and the ordinance, even Jesus

¹ Mercer's translation of this paragraph is: Praise and reverence to the Holy Ghost; peace and life may He give us, bringing over the incense and censuring, Hallelujah, Hallelujah. Blessed, holy be the Church with us in full, as it was and shall be with us.

³ This is the usual clause of the Lord's Prayer, but Mercer translates, Medicine to us for our sins.

Christ the Son of the Lord of Hosts, the Son of Mary, pure in her virginity, sealed for ever.¹

Then follows immediately a prayer with the introductory rubric, 'After the cold water'. The same prayer occurs, almost verbatim, in Orient. 545 at the end of the Anaphora of the Apostles. The purpose of the prayer is not clear. Is it a prayer to be used after the ablution of the vessels? or is it intended as a substitute for words above on p. 47?

Dr. Mercer's rendering of this prayer is so extraordinary that it will be worth while to set in parallel columns his translation and a revised version of the same.

Revised.

O Lord,² I pray Thee and beseech Thee, my Lord and my God, Thou good Shepherd who didst love Thy flock, and gavest Thyself a ransom for Thy sheep, that Thou give unto me Thy Body, the food of righteousness indeed, and (Thy Blood) a draught of life eternal; and again, I beseech Thee and entreat Thee, my Lord, that this

Mercer.

I pray and beseech Thee, O my Lord and my God, look upon those who love thy flock, and accept my soul which is thy sheep, for that thou hast given us thy body, the righteous food which in truth is a portion of eternal life. And again we pray thee and beseech thee, O my Lord, that it will not leave and will not afflict my soul and

¹ In the latter part of this address Dr. Mercer's translation is very much at fault. From 'unwittingly' it runs, 'in charity which is transitory have mercy upon you, and in the future be ye crucified in this his body, the body divine and in this his blood, the blood of law; and the oblation of Jesus Christ the Son of the God of Sabaoth, begotten of Mary Immaculate in virginity, pure for ever and ever.'

² I take the letters in Mercer 3 to be a contraction for this. Mercer omits.

Revised.

Thy Body and Thy Blood which I have received be not for reproach and 'condemnation'¹ to my soul and my body, but that they be unto me to quicken me, and to give me health and understanding of Thy fear, and to teach me Thy love, that I may pray unto Thee every day of my life, and give praise without ceasing. O Lord, cleanse my soul, and again purge it that it may be an altar (or, sacrifice) unto Thee, and make my heart that the Holy Spirit may live and dwell (in it) and fill it. For I have received Thy Body and Thy Blood in faith and have partaken of it at the hands of Thy priests, and have eaten, for to Thee be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Mercer.

my body, which is the body and blood which thou didst take up and which gave me life and gave me health, and which placed me in fear of thee, and which teacheth me thy love that I may pray to thee all the days of my life, and its praise which likewise, O my Lord, is sweet to my soul, even refined, that it be unto thee sacrifice; and make my heart to live and remain and be full of the Holy Ghost, for thy body and blood will raise up him, who confesses and receives thee from the hand of thy priesthood and consumes thee, for to thee be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Immediately following the Prayer after the cold water, a rubric occurs in Mercer 3 which Dr. Mercer translates thus :

(The priest shall say : and after he had finished doing it, he gave his blessing, and while blessing with his fingers, absolving the people by the power of his hand, he blessed their eyes; and when he had blessed the presbyters, he placed his hand upon Peter and upon the others.)

¹ This is reading of Orient. 545. Mercer 3 has a vox nihili by the transposition of two consonants.

Partake of the Lord who will place you in his everlasting kingdom; and in wisdom may the Lord bless and behold and illuminate the eyes of thine heart, and in truth may the Lord bless and make his face to shine upon thee, and likewise women.

This, to say the least, does not seem right. The text of the passage is very corrupt, and it is by no means easy to translate, but it seems quite clear that the whole is a rubric interpolated with three formulas of benediction.

The following translation is only tentative: (So) *the priest saith, and after he hath finished*¹ . . . *he shall give the blessing. And he shall give the benediction with his fingers on the foreheads of the people 'with imposition of'*² *hand; and they shall bless one another, and when the presbyters bless, the position of the hand is (that) of Peter, and they say unto him: The Lord set 'thee'*³ *in His eternal kingdom, and for the 'deacons,'*⁴ The Lord bless (thee) and make (His face) to shine (on thee) and enlighten the eyes of thy heart, and for the faithful, The Lord bless thee and make His face to shine on thee, and likewise (for) the women.

The last addition comes at the very end of the Anaphora and consists of a prayer to be said when the ¹ The word 'gabro' after finished is apparently a mistake for 'gebro' which means 'has work'.

² The reading of the MS. seems impossible here. It is a plural word meaning 'laws', 'commands'.

³ MS. has 'you' (plural suffix).

⁴ This is only a conjecture. The word is not unlike the word for 'deacon'. It certainly cannot mean 'in wisdom' as Mercer renders.

*eulogia*¹ is administered, and of a final rubric. The prayer is not peculiar to the modern rite. It is found in Orient. 545 added by a late hand at the conclusion of the service. It is given also almost verbatim by Brightman (Introduction, p. civ) from a MS. at the Abyssinian monastery in Jerusalem. The fact that it is given in Brightman apparently escaped the notice of Dr. Mercer, for his translation is hopelessly astray.

The prayer runs as follows :

O Lord, our God and our Creator, who giveth His good things and sustenance to all flesh, Thou it is who givest a blessing to Thy servants who 'fear'² Thy holy name; stretch forth Thy holy right hand to-day also at this time and in this hour, and bless this bread unto me, and let blessing and benefit from Thee be upon it; and again, to every one (of us) that receiveth of it, let it be the salvation and healing of our souls, the strength and stay of our bodies unto the forgiveness of sin, that 'we may feed'³ on what Thou hast given us unto Thy praise, and may glorify Thy kingdom. O Holy Trinity,⁴ Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, O Lord, be Thy blessing on this bread, both on him who giveth, 'and on him who receiveth'⁵ and on those who minister in Thy fear. Glory be to the Father, etc. Amen.

The final rubric in Mercer 3 deals with the conduct of the communicant after receiving the Eucharist. Here

² So Orient. 545 reads: The word in Mercer 3 is meaningless.

³ So Orient. 545 reads: The verb in Mercer 3 has been divided into two words with the meaning (possibly): even this food which Thou, etc.

⁵ These words, omitted in Mercer 3, I have supplied from Orient. 545.

again the text is obviously corrupt, and the meaning is in many places obscure. In Dr. Mercer's translation it reads like nonsense. He gives it as follows :

And after the oblation is received, it is not fitting that he break it with his hands or feet, but he shall take off his robes and sacred adornments, and shall genuflect, and shall spit, and shall pour out the blood, having cut the finger-nails and his head having been shaved in the right manner, and he shall be girded like a man and shall come among us eating and drinking, but he shall not stand and associate with women, and he shall not lightly esteem this receiving of the oblation.

It seems to me that it is a rubric for all the faithful and not for the priest only. The translation would run somewhat as follows :

And after receiving the Eucharist a man must not wash his hands or his feet, or take off his clothes, but (must) worship and pray (lit. kneel) and (if) he spit and bring up the Blood (must) pare his nails and shave his head. (And he must not) go about in the streets, or associate with other men, or enter the bath, or eat and drink except in moderation, or have intercourse with a woman; and he shall not esteem lightly this receiving of the Eucharist.

II. ANAPHORA OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST

The Book of the Covenant which Our Lord Jesus Christ spake to His Apostles before His ascension after His resurrection from the dead.

The deacon saith: Let your hearts be in heaven.

The people say: Yea, let our hearts be in heaven. For Thy name's sake strengthen us and make us worthy of Jesus Christ our Lord and our God.

The deacon saith: If there be one that hath aught against his neighbour, let him forgive him.

If there be one that thinketh hypocrisy in his heart, let him make confession.

If there be one in whom is pollution of mind, let him not draw nigh.

If there be one that hath fallen into sin, let him not forget (it), for it shall not be forgotten.

If there be one that hath a diseased mind, let him not draw nigh.

If there be one that is defiled, or that is not clean, let him be rejected.

If there be one that is a stranger to the commandment of Jesus, let him withdraw.

If there be one that despiseth the prophets, let him withdraw himself from the wrath of the Only-begotten and save his soul (or, himself), let him not do despite to the cross; and let him flee from the wrath of God, for we have Him who seeth us, the Father of light with His Son and His holy angels who visit the Church.

Look to your souls (or, yourselves) and cleanse your bodies; and remember not their transgressions against your neighbours. See that none be in wrath against his fellow; the Lord seeth.

Lift up your hearts. Let us draw nigh to the salvation of life and to the holy things in the wisdom of the Lord. Let us receive the grace which hath been given us.

The priest saith: The Lord be with you all.

The people say: With thy spirit.

The priest saith: Give thanks unto our God.

The people say: It is meet and right.

The priest saith: That which is holy 'for'¹ the holy.

The people say: Holy, Holy, Holy, O Lord, God of gods, who wast and art for ever in heaven and earth.

The priest saith: We give Thee thanks, Holy God, the End of our souls, the Giver of our life, the incorruptible Treasure, the Father of the Only-begotten, Thy Son our Saviour who proclaimed Thy will, for Thou didst will that we should be saved through Thee. Our hearts give thanks to Thee, O Lord, to Thee, the Might of the Father, and the Grace of the Gentiles, the Knowledge of truth, the Wisdom of the erring, the Physician of the soul, the Greatness of the humble, our Friend. Thou art the Staff of the righteous, the Hope of the persecuted (or, the exiled), the Haven of those that are tempest-tossed, the Light of the perfect, the Son of the Living God. Make to shine on us from Thy grace which is 'unsearchable'² firmness and strength, trust and wisdom, and power of faith that bendeth not, and hope that changeth not. Grant knowledge of the Spirit to our humility that we Thy servants, O Lord, may ever be purified in righteousness, and that all Thy people may glorify Thee.

² A change of one letter gives this reading, which is found in the Testamentum Domini.

The deacon saith: For the sake of the blessed.

The priest saith: Yea, O Lord, to Thee we give thanks, and Thee we bless, and ever we pray Thee, O Lord, the Father of the lofty ones who reignest over the treasures of the light. Look down from heaven upon Jerusalem, Lord of dominions (and) of the chiefs of the angels, and the Might of lords, the Glory of thrones, the Raiment of the lights, the Joy of delight, and the King of kings, the Father who upholdest all things and governest by (Thy) hand and by Thy Counsel, Thy only Son Jesus who was crucified for our sin.

The deacon saith: Ye who sit (arise).

The priest saith: Through whom, the Word of Thy covenant, Thou didst make all things, being well pleased in Him.

The deacon saith: (Look) to the east.

The priest saith: And Thou sentest Him into the bosom of the Virgin; He was conceived in the womb, was made flesh, and His birth was made known through the Holy Spirit.

The deacon saith: We are attending.

The priest saith: Being born of a Virgin that He might fulfil Thy will and prepare for Thee a holy people.

The deacon saith: Answer ye.

The priest saith: He stretched forth His hands to the passion. He suffered that He might loose the suffering who trusted in Thee. Of His own will He was given to the passion that He might save the suffering, and strengthen those who tottered, find the lost, and give life to the dead, and abolish death, and burst the band of Satan, fulfil the will of His Father, and trample on Sheol, and open the gates of light, give light to the righteous, establish an ordinance (or, covenant), remove darkness, bring up the babes, and proclaim His resurrection.

On that night in which He was betrayed, He took bread into His holy and blessed hands, which were without stain; He gave thanks, blessed and brake, and delivered to His disciples, speaking (and) saying, 'Take, eat; this bread is My Body, which is broken for you for the forgiveness of sin. And as often as ye do this, make memorial of Me.

And in like manner mingling a cup of wine, giving thanks, blessing, hallowing, Thou gavest unto them. In truth this is Thy Blood which was poured out for our sin.

Now also, O Lord, remembering Thy death and Thy resurrection, we confess Thee, and we offer to Thee the bread and the cup, giving thanks to Thee, who alone art from eternity God the Saviour, for Thou hast bidden us to stand before Thee and serve as priests unto Thee.

Therefore we Thy servants pray Thee, O Lord, and entreat Thee to send the Holy Spirit and power on this bread and upon this cup. May He make it the Body and Blood of our Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ for ever.

Moreover, we offer to Thee this thanksgiving, Eternal Trinity, O Lord the Father of Jesus Christ (before) whom every creature and (every) soul trembleth and returneth into itself. Thine (is) this gift; not food and drink is it that we offer to Thy holiness. Make that it be not unto us for condemnation or for blaspheming of the enemy or for perdition, but (for) a healing of our bodies and for a strengthening of our spirits.

Yea, O Lord our God, grant us for Thy name's sake that we may flee from every thought that is not pleasing unto Thee. O Lord, grant us that every counsel of death may be banished from us, (even) each that by Thy name is written within the veil of Thy sanctuary in the heavens. May death hear Thy name and be amazed, and may the abysses be rent, and the enemy trodden under foot, may the spirit of destruction tremble, and the serpent (or, dragon) be removed, may unbelief be far away, and the traitor be afflicted, may anger be silent, envy avail not, may the arrogant be reproved, and the lovers of gold be rooted out, may oppression cease, the crafty be overthrown, and every root of bitterness be scattered.

Grant, O Lord, to the inner eyes of our hearts that they may see Thee and glorify Thee and praise Thee, remembering Thee and serving Thee, for Thou alone art their portion, the Son and the Word of God whom all things serve. Perfect and strengthen those to whom Thou hast revealed Thy grace; heal (and) guard those who are in grace; direct those who by the power of the tongue glorify the faith (and) who teach by the power of the tongue; save those who do Thy will continually; visit the widows; receive the orphans; receive those who have entered into rest in the faith.

Grant unto us, O Lord, a portion with all Thy saints; grant us strength to please Thee as they pleased Thee.

The deacon saith : With all the heart. . . .¹

The priest saith: Feed Thy people in righteousness and holiness; grant unto us all union whereby we may receive of Thy holy things (and) be filled with the Holy Spirit and the strength of faith in truth that for ever we may give thanks unto Thee and Thy beloved Son, with the Holy Spirit. Grant us, *etc.*²

² This etc. seems to refer to the clause (p. 37 above) commencing 'Grant us to be united in Thy Holy Spirit'.

The priest saith after they have received: I will extol Thee, my God and my King, and I will bless Thy name for ever and for ever and ever.

The people say: Our Father. . . .

The priest saith: Every day will I bless Thee and glorify Thee for ever and for ever and ever. The glory of the Lord, etc.

Pilot of the soul, Guide of the righteous, and Glory of the saints. Grant us, O Lord, eyes of knowledge ever to see Thee and ears also to hearken to Thy word alone. When our souls have been fulfilled with Thy grace, create in us pure hearts, O Lord, that we may ever understand Thy greatness, who art good and a lover of men. O our God, be gracious to our souls, and grant unto us Thy humble servants who have received Thy Body and Thy Blood, a pure and steadfast mind, for Thine is the kingdom, O Lord, blessed and glorious, Father and Son and Holy Spirit, now and ever and world without end.

III. THE ANAPHORA OF OUR LADY

The Eucharistic Thanksgiving of our Lady the holy Virgin¹ Mary, Mother of God, which Abba Cyriacos, Bishop of the city of Behnesa, composed.

My heart is inditing of a good matter;² and I will make known the qeddâsê of Mary, not in many (words) but in few; yea, I will make known the praise of the Virgin, not lengthening it with words of folly, but cutting it short; yea, I will make known the greatness of the Virgin. . . . O ye ancient fathers, consecrated by the imposition of hands, and appointed to succeed the apostles, we take you as our intercessors with God, and we take in our days as intercessors with our Lord God the two patriarchs Abba N. of the great city of Alexandria, and the head of the city of our fathers the blessed Metropolitan Abba N.

The deacon saith: Ye who sit (arise).

The priest saith: For these and for them all, O Advocate, do thou intercede with Thy Son to give rest to the souls of all Metropolitans and Patriarchs, etc.

The deacon saith: Ye who sit (arise).

The priest saith: Let us arise in the fear of God to magnify and praise Her who is full of praise, saying, O full of grace, O river of joy, far greater the majesty of aspect in Thee than the majesty of the cherubim with many eyes and the seraphim with six wings.

¹ After 'Virgin' there is a word meaning literally 'by' or 'in two'. What its meaning in the context is, I do not understand.

² This clause is thrice repeated.

The deacon saith: (Look) to the east.

The priest saith: Verily God the Father hath looked from heaven . . . and found none like Thee . . . and sent His Son to Thee whom He loved.

The deacon saith: We are attending.

The priest saith: Holy is God the Father who was well pleased in Thee; Holy is the Only-begotten Son who dwelt in Thy womb; Holy is the Paraclete, the Spirit of truth who strengthened Thee.

The deacon saith: Answer ye.

The priest saith: O Virgin, full of praise, with whom and unto whom shall we liken Thee? Thou art the loom out of whom Emmanuel put on the inexplicable clothing of the body. He made the warp of the original flesh of Adam and the woof of Thy flesh; and his reed¹ was the Word, Jesus Christ Himself, and His shuttle was the overshadowing from above of the most high God and the weaver was the Holy Spirit.²

Then follows a long list of Old Testament worthies in whom the Virgin's glory was reflected. She was the hope of Adam, the meekness of Abel . . . the ark of Noah . . . the ladder of Jacob . . . the fleece of Gideon . . . the harp of David, etc.

After this comes mention of her conception, her holiness of life, her betrothal, and the incarnation of her Son. This leads up to a discussion of the nature of the Godhead and of the Trinity, reminiscent in places of the Athanasian Creed, followed by the words: 'In such a faith and trust we all say the Prayer of Faith,' i.e. the Nicene Creed.

A new paragraph then begins: 'Let us now return to the beginning of our discourse and enquire of the Holy Virgin as to Her conception which is so marvellous in all.' This introduces a long description of the wonders of the Incarnation which ends with the Sanctus.

² Rodwell points out that this passage is borrowed from a homily of Proclus. The details of the comparison are somewhat altered in the Ethiopic version.

The people say: Holy. . . .

*The priest saith: O Virgin, O fruitful one, who art eaten, and gushing fountain who art drunk. . . .*¹

Further praise of the Virgin, ending with, 'Praise with pure incense we offer unto Thee'.

Here he offereth the incense.

Then follows a commemoration of Christ's work, His baptism, temptation, His hungering and thirsting, His miracles, and then comes the Institution.

On that night in which He delivered His soul unto death, He showed to His disciples by many signs concerning His passion and His crucifixion, His death and His resurrection on the third day with body and soul with bones and blood, as He was before. When the twelve disciples were with Him on His right hand and on His left, and with them was numbered Judas who betrayed Him, like tares mingled with the wheat.

The deacon saith: Lift up (your hands, ye presbyters).

The priest saith: Then was it that Jesus Christ took bread into His holy and blessed and pure hands which were without stain; He looked up to heaven to His Father, and interceded with Him who begat Him, and committed to Him His disciples that He might keep them from all evil; He blessed, being Himself blessed; He hallowed, being Himself holy; and gave to His disciples, and said unto them, Take, eat; this bread is My Body which is given for you and for the redemption of the whole world.

And likewise the cup after they had supped: He turned His eyes (to heaven) and said, Take, drink; this cup is My Blood which the spear caused to gush forth for you. And when ye do this, ye make a memorial of My death and show forth a memorial of My resurrection. O Lord, as then, bless, break and give this bread. Amen. O Lord, as then, sign and hallow this cup. Amen.

Here follow prayers of the priest for himself, for his assistant priest and deacon, as well as for the people, ending :

O Lord, have mercy upon us, Christ (three times).

The people say likewise.

The priest saith: Do Thou, uniting them, give to all those who partake of it, that it may be unto them for life for ever and ever.

Prayer of the Fraction.

O God, the Maker of all, the Beginning of all, the End of all. . . . As this sign of the cross is not separate or different from this bread, so likewise let Thy greatness be mingled with our humility, and our humility with our greatness, O Lord our God, Upholder of the world.

The deacon saith: Pray ye.

The priest saith: Unto (our) last breath let us hear these words. . . .

This is an exhortation to seek a refuge in the Eucharist, and is followed by the words :

If any one is polluted or unclean, let him withdraw.

Further warnings against unworthy reception.

The deacon saith: Standing (bow your heads).

The priest saith: To Thee . . . stretch we forth our souls. . . .

A prayer of humble access, which is followed by an address to the people promising that as they are gathered to hear the words of Mary's Liturgy (qeddâsê), so they shall be gathered in the heavenly Jerusalem to hear in Mount Zion the harp of God's children, etc. . . .

The deacon saith: Pray ye.

The prayer which follows is an address to the Virgin that she may bring to the mind of her Son, 'though He forgetteth it not', His birth, His abode in the manger, His flight in the days of Herod, His and her tears, hunger and thirst, etc.

Imposition of the hand.

Final Thanksgiving.

IV. THE ANAPHORA OF SAINT JOHN THE EVANGELIST

THE EUCHARISTIC THANKSGIVING OF SAINT JOHN THE SON OF THUNDER

To Thee, O Lord, we have raised our eyes, we have lifted up our hearts, we have exalted our thoughts. Thou art He who was before the world (was) and shall be for ever. Thou hast no limit; Thou hast no end. None is there who hath found it; none is there who findeth Thee; none is there who knoweth Thee; and there is none who can behold Thee. Thou knowest Thyself. Thy kingdom shall not end, nor Thy power pass away, nor Thy greatness have an end, nor Thy glory disappear. Hidden art Thou from all, and to Thee all is open. Thou hast no beginning, and Thou settest an end to all; Thou hast no limit, and Thou givest a bound to all. All things (are) in Thee, and all from Thee, and all because of Thee; Thou art in all. Higher than the highest in Thy greatness, yet Thou hast visited the lowly by the coming of Thy Son; more distant than the distant in Thy withdrawal, yet in Thy mercy Thou drawest nigh to them that are afar off. Thou art He who is within all things, and Thou art He who is without all things. By Thee is Thy greatness covered, and by Thee is Thy power hidden. Thou by Thyself hast veiled Thyself, and thou by Thyself hast covered Thyself. Thy Son whom Thou hast begotten hath spoken to us concerning Thee; He hath declared unto us Thy story. This is He who was begotten of Thee; glorious is He for ever as Thou art who begattest Him. Thou Thyself hast spoken to us concerning Him, and Thou hast witnessed to Him by Thy words that He is indeed Thy Son, and that Thou in truth art His Father. Thou with Thy Son art worshipped, and to Him (is) glory (given) with Him who hath begotten Him. There is no day between Him and Thee; there is no hour between the Son and the Father who begat Him. The Father is not older than His Son, nor the Son younger than His Father. The thought of the heart is not able to fathom the thought although it run swifter than a post and be exalted above the watchers, pass into the darkness and go forth into obscurity, that it may enter in and see Thee, may search and discover and know . . . that there is not a moment nor as it were the twinkling of an eye between Thee and Thy Son (nor) between the Son and the Father and Thy Living and Holy Spirit.¹ He knoweth how to fathom Thy Godhead. He hath declared to us concerning Thine Essence, and hath informed us concerning Thy Unity, and hath taught us concerning Thy Union, and hath made us to know concerning Thy Trinity, concerning your² equality which groweth not old, and your union which is inseparable, and your nature which is indivisible. The Father witnesseth concerning the Son and the Holy Spirit, and the Son declareth concerning the Father and the Holy Spirit, and the Holy Spirit teacheth concerning the Father and the Son, that one in name They are threefold in Godhead.

¹ This whole sentence is somewhat obscure, particularly at the end, but the general meaning is, I think, fairly well expressed by the above translation. Possibly the last six words should be connected with what follows.

² This word three times repeated in connection with the Holy Trinity in this sentence is very strange. There is no doubt as to the plural suffix in the Ethiopic text. See also p. 105.

The secret and marvel of Thy glory Thou revealest, and in mercy Thou dost manifest Thy grace to those that praise Thee, the lofty ones each in his order, the angels each in his rank, the watchers in their brightness, the Cherubim in their majesty, the Seraphim in their holiness, and all with fear and trembling do (Thee) worship. They worship as from afar off the God who is near.

The deacon saith: We are attending.

The priest saith: Veiling their faces in the brightness lest the consuming fire consume them, they cover their feet with coals, lest the mighty flame burn them, and they fly into the four quarters of the world and into all the ends (of the earth) before Him who is in all the ends of the world. With voices loud and clear and wondrous they cry to hallow the One who is hidden from all. According to their hosts and ranks and companies and places they praise Thee, the Father; Thee they worship, and they praise Thy only-begotten Son, and Thy living and Holy Spirit; and all together they cause to ascend unto Thee the praise of Thy glory. 'Assist'¹ us that we also together with them may say, Remember us, O Lord, in Thy mercy.

The deacon saith: Answer ye.

The priest saith: And we also likewise glorify Thee and confess that Thou, O Lord of Hosts, art Holy, Holy, Holy (in full); Heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory. Awful art Thou and Thou art a Holy Father; awful art Thou and Thou art a Holy Son; awful art Thou and Thou art a Holy Spirit, threefold in name, One God. And to all Thy saints Thou hast granted in Thy goodness to be holy, and all Thy work

¹ The addition of one letter gives this reading. The MS. reading is unintelligible.

Thou hast created by Thy Word. Thou hast created all, and art subject to none; Thou upholdest all, and art not weakened; Thou sustainest all, and art not diminished; Thou carest for all, and art not silent; Thou givest to all, and art not exhausted; Thou satisfiest all, and art not lessened; Thou rememberest all, and forgettest not; Thou keepest all, and slumberest not; Thou hearest all, and art not deaf; Thou forgivest all, and receivest not. Glorious art Thou, and none other giveth unto Thee, Creator whom none commandeth, King whom none appointeth, Lord whom none upbraideth, God to whom none lendeth, Master to whom none giveth, Giver by whomnought is spent. Present everywhere we have heard concerning Thee as we were able to hear, and Thou hast sent to us Thy Son. He came, and yet issued not forth from Thee; He left His place, and yet moved not from Thee; He dwelt entire with Thee, and Thou sentest Him unto us, and yet He was not separated from Thee. And He was where Thou wast; He abode in heaven with His Father, and yet was on earth with His 'mother'.¹ He came down (to earth) yet was He not lessened on high, nor increased below. He was conceived in the womb, yet was not enveloped therein; He tabernacled in the bosom, and yet was not contained therein. The Creator of all flesh was born; He who dwelleth above the Cherubim had his tabernacle in a maiden's body; the consuming fire put on human flesh; the subtle spirit was clothed with a body. Before hidden He was born openly and He who formeth babes became a babe in the womb. They wrapped in swaddling clothes Him who is clothed with light; in the house of a poor man He dwelt as if in need; He sent forth messengers as a king; men brought Him gifts from afar; He whom 'the ox knoweth as its owner'¹ was laid in a manger. He was nursed as a babe and they worshipped Him as the Lord of all. He walked on earth as man and wrought as God. Of His own will He hungered as the Son of man, and as the Mighty One He satisfied the hungry, even great multitudes, with a few loaves. He was athirst as a mortal and made the water wine as the Giver of life to all. He slept as the sons of men (but) awoke and rebuked the winds as the Creator. He was weary and rested as one that is lowly, but He walked on the waters as the Most High. Men smote His head as a slave, and He freed us from the yoke of sin as the Lord of all. He patiently endured all, and received the spitting of the unclean who with His spittle healed the blind, and hath given unto us His Holy Spirit. They condemned Him who forgiveth sin and judged the Judge of judges. He was crucified on the tree that He might destroy sin; He was reckoned with the transgressors that He might unite us with the righteous. Of His own will He died, of His good pleasure was He buried. He died that He might slay death, He died that He might give life to the dead. He was buried that He might raise up those that were buried, and preserve the living, and purify the unclean, and justify sinners; that He might gather them who were scattered and bring back the transgressors to glory and honour. To whom be glory and honour and praise for ever and ever.

The deacon saith: (Look) to the east.

The priest saith: From the dead whom Thou hast

¹ The MS. reads 'He was laid in a manger which its owner appointed for the ox'. A slight change gives the above which is an obvious reference to Isaiah i.

Amen. We worship Thee and glorify Thee, World of wisdom, Voice of counsel, Treasury of succour, Storehouse of joy, Spring of profit, Source of prophecy, great glorious stream of the apostles, Well of honour and (Glory)¹ of the kingdom, pure Crown of priests, King with a glorious crown that art adored, Origin of glory and Light of honour, Raiment that is not woven, Garment that is not spun, Way unto the Father, Door unto Him that begat Thee, Treasure that was revealed, Pearl that was found, Pound that gained profit, Talent that was doubled, Leaven that leavened the meal, Salt that gave savour to the saltless, Light that put darkness to flight and Lamp that gave light to all the world, Foundation that was not shaken, Building that was not destroyed, Ship that was not wrecked, Habitation that was not plundered, an easy yoke and a light burden is Jesus Christ, the Power and Wisdom of the Father. Sun of righteousness and from whose wings ariseth the Sun of righteousness and the source of profit, to Thee be glory and honour and praise for ever and ever.

The deacon saith: Ye who sit (arise).

The priest saith : We offer¹ to Thee a pure oblation, perfect for the repentance of our souls, that our bodies may be fully sanctified; not gold nor silver offer we to Thee; not the precious stones of iniquity and sin; not raiment which waxeth old nor herds that death destroyeth nor a slaughtered lamb, but Him who by His death saveth His flock and hath Himself given us life. Howbeit they live not who forsake Him that saveth them, in whom they would have been saved. Yea, Thine own of Thine own offer we to Thee. To Thee we offer in Thy Godhead, to Thee we offer in Thy manhood, to Thee we offer in Thy manifestation before Thy people. Thy Flesh and Thy Blood we offer to Thee before Thine Essence on behalf of Thy holy Church which was saved from death by Thee, and for whose sake Thou wast smitten before the council, that Thou mightest free it by Thy Blood and Thou didst suffer on Thy Cross to guard it by Thy crucifixion from temptation until Thou comest to Thy marriage feast. And for all Thy holy prophets who sounded as with the voice of a trumpet and proclaimed Thy coming amongst all the peoples of darkness.

For all Thy apostles who ploughed the land of the nations with the ploughshare of Thy cross and sowed the treasures of Thy word in all the ends of the world.

And for all Thy victorious martyrs, faithful and pure, whom, for Thy flock's sake, the wolves devoured like lambs.

For all Bishops who have fulfilled their work in purity and whose perfection Thou hast accepted to give them the due reward of their righteousness.

And for all presbyters who have guarded their deposit in righteousness, that they may receive their inheritance with joy.

For all deacons who have despised the wings of the spirit, that they may have fellowship with the Holy Spirit.

And for all readers who have served well and taught Thy people and preached Thy Scriptures.

For all victorious kings who have entered into their rest in the true faith.

For young men and maidens who hated this world and desired the heavenly marriage, and for all Thy saints who delivered up their souls to Thee and fulfilled their warfare and departed with a fair name to seek their reward with a loud voice.

For all our fathers and brethren who have passed from this world, that Thou mayest appoint them a memorial before Thee.

And for all those who were born (again) in the baptism of Thy exalted Church that Thou mayest give them joy in their struggle and make them (such) that Thou mayest grant unto them their crown.

And for all those slain with the sword or led away captive; for the poor and needy, and for widows and orphans, and for me Thy lowly servant whom Thou hast called by Thy grace. Unworthy though I be, Thou hast made me great and exalted me—not in myself—and hast brought me near before Thee in Thy mercy that I should offer before Thy altar, O Lord, that Thou shouldest pardon the souls of me and of all Thy people.

For this our congregation that it may be blessed with Thy manifold grace, that the weak may be strengthened and sinners justified, the repentant cleansed, the righteous kept, the troubled delivered, that the despised may find rest, the sad be consoled and the sorrowful made glad, the despairing delivered, and the sick made whole, the transgressors brought back and the lost found, those that are afar off brought nigh and those that are nigh kept near.

And for all those who desire to make them a memorial before Thee for Thou knowest all and rememberest all.

For the fruits of harvest that crown the year, that they may be blessed in Thy great mercy, and that Thou mayest give the crown in Thy compassion.

And for all those who have brought this memorial of their oblation that Thou mayest accept their vows and receive their oblation.

For those who have received Thy seal and have gone forth from this world of sorrow and reached the land of joy that they may enter into Thy feast and receive Thy crown and find rest in their eternal inhabitations in Thy city whose artificer and builder Thou art.

For all those who have sinned and transgressed after the manner of men, do Thou, O Lord their hope, merciful and good, pardon their sins and forgive their iniquities and transgressions.

For all those whose names we know, and those whom we know not, for to Thee (all is) open and Thou knowest them. May their remembrance be before Thee through our Lord Jesus Christ.

The deacon saith: For the sake of the blessed.

The priest saith: Remember these and all. Give rest to their souls, and cherish them by the waters of rest in the fields of Paradise in the bosom of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob by Thine angels the guides of light in Thy holy mansions through Thy beloved Son our Lord Jesus Christ.

In that night in which He was taken for that He willed to be slain, and it was His pleasure to suffer and to endure the pain of the nails, that He might free His Church by His Blood and establish His people by His cross, build His altar and abolish idols, choose (His) priests and scatter the priests of the Gentiles, He took bread in His holy and blessed hands, the espousal gifts of Thy bride and the divorce of the synagogue which Thou hast put away, He gave thanks, blessed, and brake and gave to His disciples, and said unto them, This is My Body, the food of righteousness indeed, whoso eateth of it shall not die;¹ Take, eat of it, all of you.

And likewise He gave praise over the cup also, and said, This cup is My Blood of the new covenant, Take, drink of it, all of you. It is a wondrous sign to all who worship Him, (and) a bar of judgment to them that crucified (Him), which was written with His Blood and sealed by His cross and signed by His death unto eternal life, by which sin is forgiven. And thus make memorial of Me when ye are gathered together.

We also, O Lord, who have gathered together to make memorial of Thy passion and be partakers with Thee in Thy resurrection from the dead, beseech Thee, O Lord our God, that as the bread was gathered when it was scattered over mountains and hills and in the desert and valleys, and being gathered was made one perfect loaf, even so gather us from every evil thought of sin into Thy perfect faith, and as the mingling of this wine with water cannot be separated into its two parts, even so may Thy Godhead be joined with our manhood and our manhood with Thy Godhead, Thy greatness with our lowliness and our lowliness with Thy greatness.

Receive at our hands this our oblation which we offer before Thee for a memorial of righteousness along with holy Abel and all those who were blameless, in whom Thy greatness was well pleased, and in their eternal oblation which they had as a memorial before Thee, with wise Noah and all the upright on whom Thy Godhead dwelt and whom Thou didst exalt in Thy goodness that they might receive a goodly portion and an inheritance and life eternal in the kingdom of heaven with all those who were found worthy before Thee; with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob our upright fathers, who did good and departed in purity and reigned in righteousness; with Moses Thy servant and all the prophets, who preached to us without fear and proclaimed concerning Thee without doubting, that they might receive a wholly perfect reward; with Simon Peter and all Thy disciples; with Paul and all Thy apostles who by their sufferings bare abroad Thy gospel, and by their death kept the preaching of Thy doctrine; with Stephen and all Thy martyrs who shed their blood for Thy Blood that they might receive honour from Thy glory and whose names are written¹ in the free Jerusalem which is in heaven.²

Thy Church, O Lord, beseecheth Thee and worshippeth Thee, Thy Bride extolleth Thee, Thy people confess to Thee through the prayers of the perfect and the adoration of the saints, the petitions of the watchers and the praises of the angels, and the glory of the archangels and the consecration of the Seraphim, the glory of the Cherubim and the exaltation of all the exalted ones.

Flung wide be doors of light, and opened the gates of glory, set wide, and let Thy Living and Holy Spirit come, descend and dwell, tabernacle, rest and bring a blessing on the thanksgiving of this bread and hallow this cup. May this bread be the communion of Thy living Body and this cup the communion of Thy compassionate Blood, that to every one who believeth in the living Father, and the only Son who was begotten of Him and in the living unsearchable Holy Spirit (Amen) and who receiveth Thy Body and Thy Blood, it may be for hope and for salvation and for remission of sin and for resurrection from the dead, for the light of the kingdom of heaven and for life eternal for ever. Amen.

Prayer of the Fraction.

And again let us entreat Him who upholdeth all (even) God the Father of the Lord our Saviour Jesus Christ for that He hath granted us the reception of the holy mystery. Him let us entreat, the Lord our God who upholdeth all, to vouchsafe us a day of blessing.

Pray ye.

O Lord, Lord of all, Upholder of all, the Father of the Lord God, even our Saviour Jesus Christ, we pray and beseech Thee by all in all. For that Thou hast granted us again to fulfil this holy mystery, vouchsafe this to us as a blessing, and count it not a condemnation to any one of us, nor make it a delight of the body, but make it for us of all delight to have received Thy holy mystery, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom, to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit, be glory and power now and ever and world without end. Amen.

The deacon saith: Standing (bow your head).

The priest saith: What blessing or what speech shall utter praise? What word or what thanksgiving? What praise or what name shall we speak for that this bread is broken, but Thy name alone, O Jesus Christ, whose name giveth life and salvation? This (is) the Bread of life which came down from heaven for the salvation of the world. We bless Thee who art for us the Way to the place of life, we give Thee thanks who by Thy word hast created all. Thou (art) the Guide, and Thou the Door of grace; Thou (art) the Salt, and Thou the Treasury of pearls, and Thou the Net of life, Truth, Might, Wisdom, Refuge, and Rest, Help and Life by which names Thou didst 'stoop'¹ to be called for love of men, that they might be saved and renewed from manifest evil deeds, whereinto at the first they fell through sin. And to Thee be the glory for ever and ever.

Pilot of the Soul.

And again let us entreat Him who upholdeth all, even God the Father of the Lord our Saviour Jesus Christ, giving thanks to Him by all in all for that He hath granted us the reception of the holy mystery. Him let us entreat the Lord our God who upholdeth all to vouchsafe us a day of blessing.

Pray ye.

O Lord, Lord of all, Upholder of all, we entreat Thee by all in all, because Thou hast hidden these things from those who think they are wise and prudent, and hast revealed (them) to us the lowly, yea, O Father, for so it seemed good in Thy sight. Do thou grant us the reception of Thy holy mystery, not for condemnation, not for judgment, but for remission of sin, and for life eternal and for knowledge of truth; and as Thou hast granted us in this world reception of the holy mystery, so in that which is to come may our portion be the resurrection from the dead with Thy saints, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom to Thee, with Him and with the Holy Spirit, be glory and power, now and ever and world without end.

¹ The word in the MS. means 'wait' which gives no sense. I have altered as above.

Imposition of hands.

The beginning of Thy holiness (is) glory.¹

Thy servants and Thy handmaidens have humbled the neck of soul and body and spirit. Incline Thine ear to their prayer; bless them, men and women, with the blessing of Thine angels (even) of the hosts 'which are in heaven'.² Bless the work of their hands, and be Thou with them in every good work. Vouchsafe them the reception of Thy holy mystery for understanding, and watchfulness, and for 'deliverance'³ from all evil, and for sustenance of their souls and bodies and spirits, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom, to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit, be glory and power now and ever and world without end. Amen.

¹ These seem to be the opening words of some hymn (cf. Chrysostom, at end).

² These words seem to have been misplaced. In the text they come after 'men and women'.

³ A slight alteration gives this meaning.

V. THE ANAPHORA OF SAINT JOHN CHRYSOSTOM

THE EUCHARISTIC THANKSGIVING OF SAINT JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE¹

The deacon saith: Upward be your thoughts; in heaven be your hearts. Know where ye stand, and hear the word of righteousness, and hearken unto good words.

The priest saith: Behold we declare the essence of the Father who was before the world was created and shall be for ever and ever. None was before Him, neither after Him shall there be any other; and there is none like unto Him, nor any that know what He is, who was before all things; before the heavens were spread abroad and before the face of the dry land was seen; before the mountains rose and before the height of the air was enlarged, was He in His essence; before the abysses were hollowed, before the springs of waters burst forth and before the streams of the rivers ran, was He in His essence. Before the winds blew and before the thunderbolts flashed and before the lightning gleamed and before the thunder roared, before the dense clouds were spread forth, was He in His essence. Before the lights shone and before the veil of darkness came, before the light of day appeared, and before the night was buried in sleep, was He in His essence.

¹ The text of this is not exactly the same in Orient. 545 as it is in Dillmann's Chrestomathy. It has not been considered necessary, however, to record the variations.

Before the sun ruled in the height of the day, and before the moon reigned in the height of the night, was He in His essence. Before the stars glittered, and before the spirits moved, and before the angels were created, was He in His essence. Before the rational soul and before the mortal flesh, before every creature that is hidden or that is revealed, that is above or that is beneath was He in His essence. Before times and hours, before nights and days, before months and years, before days and periods, was He in His essence. The glory that is with Him and the praise that is His are full and perfect, the riches of His grace.

Let us tell, then, of the greatness of His mercy that hath been manifest upon us, which cannot be numbered nor measured. When we transgressed His commandment by the counsel of the accursed serpent, we went forth from the garden of delight unto destruction, from life unto death, from liberty unto bondage, and were brought under the yoke of sin. But He forsook us not, and despised not us, His work, and was not wroth with us for our sins, so that we should perish utterly even as we had sinned against Him, but He loved us and visited us, had mercy upon us, spared us and pitied us, and delivered us from the hand of him who held us. He sent unto us His Son as a Saviour and Redeemer, the Angel of His counsel, the Right hand of His arm, the Might and the Wisdom of Him the Father, by whom He made all that He pleased, even those who are in the world.

Those whom He chose, them He called, those whom he called, them He loved, those whom He loved, them He honoured, those whom He honoured, them He justified, those whom He justified, them He ordained to be the adopted of His Son. And by Him hath He gathered us from the dispersion into the great faith and hath made us a congregation of people and brought us nigh to Him for His glory, and hath written our names in the Book of life, that their memorial may be before Him, each one both of the dead and of the living.

The deacon saith: For the sake of the blessed.

Again we declare the essence of the Only (Son) what it is and the manner of His descent and of His birth. He came (to earth), but came not forth from the Father; He came down, but He was not separated from His essence; He left His place, but He moved not from the Trinity; He bowed Himself, but was not disjoined from the Union; He dwelt in the Virgin's womb, but left not His own dwelling-place.

The deacon saith: Ye who sit, arise.

The priest saith: He was conceived in the womb, but His fulness was not in any part diminished; He was contained in her bosom, but was not lessened on high; and He was born, but received no addition below.

The deacon saith: Look to the east.

He became perfect man without sin and He was manifested as a servant, but He wrought as God. Even as He bare witness be ye preachers of His gospel.

The deacon saith: Let us attend.

The priest saith: By His Father He was glorified and by angels adored and by man praised and by Himself was He sanctified, and heaven and earth are full of the holiness of His glory.

The deacon saith: Answer ye.

The priest saith: Never, then, let us cease in our hearts to utter the holiness of His glory, and let us cry, saying:

The people say: Holy. . .

The priest saith: Holy, Holy, Holy art Thou in truth, O Jesus Christ, who art sanctified by the mouths of all, and to all Thy saints Thou hast granted of Thy goodness to be partakers of that holiness which is indestructible and imperishable. Eye hath not seen nor ear heard nor hath entered into the heart of man what He hath prepared for them that love Him.

To His holy disciples and pure apostles He showed the ordinance of the mystery of the Eucharist.

The people say: Lift up (your hands, ye presbyters).

He took bread in His holy and blessed and pure hands which were without stain; He looked up to heaven to Thee His Father, God and Lord of all, who art above all things; He gave thanks, blessed and brake, and gave to them and said unto them, This is My Body, the food of righteousness indeed, whoso eateth of it hath eternal life. Take, eat of it, all of you.

And likewise also the cup; He mingled water and wine; He gave thanks, blessed and hallowed, and gave (to) them, and said unto them, This is My Blood, the draught of life indeed, whoso drinketh of it hath eternal life. Take, drink of it, all of you. It is a sign for you and for those who (shall come) after you. And thus make memorial of Me until I come; and when ye are gathered together in My name, declare ye My death and My resurrection and My ascension into heaven.

We, too, who are gathered together, declare the death of Him who dieth not, we declare the suffering of Him who suffereth not. On that night on which He sat down to meat with His disciples, He delivered His soul unto the passion by the will of His Father and His own good pleasure. They seized Him who is Almighty; they bound Him who ruleth all, and enchained the Son of the living God. In wrath they haled Him and He followed them in love; and they led Him away, He going after them as a gentle lamb which openeth not its mouth before him that sheareth it. They set before the judgment-seat Him before whom the archangels stand in fear and trembling; they condemned Him who forgiveth sins, and judged the Judge of judges. They crowned with a crown of thorns Him who crowneth with a diadem the Seraphim; they clothed with a scarlet robe in mockery Him who putteth veils of majesty on the Cherubim. A wicked servant hardened his hand, and smote on the face Him before whose face the Cherubim cover themselves with wings of fire, veiling themselves. They knelt before Him, mocking Him whom the hosts of angels adore with great amazement.

Oh, the humility of such humility, Oh, the patience of such patience, Oh, the silence of such silence, Oh, the goodness of such goodness, Oh, the love of such love, Oh, that love for man, the love (that) drew the Son of God from His abode and brought Him unto death.

They crucified as a malefactor Him that had no sin, and they numbered the Creator of life with the transgressors.

Ah! the hands which formed Adam were pierced with the nails of the cross; Ah! the feet which walked in Paradise were pierced with the nails of the cross; Ah! the mouth which breathed into Adam's nostrils the breath of life drained the bitter vinegar (mingled) with gall.

What mouth or what lips or what tongue could tell the sufferings of the Son? The heart is divided and the understanding stricken and the soul is fearful, and the flesh weak when they tell of the sufferings of the Beloved. He died who dieth not; He died that He might destroy death; He died that He might give life to the dead.

The deacon saith: Those who loved Him wept and bewailed for Him.

The priest saith: Io Io Io, Emmanuel our God; Io Io Io, Jesus our Saviour; Io Io Io, Christ our King; Io Io Io, righteous men took Him down from the tree and brought mingled spices (and) myrrh and wrapped Him in linen for the burial of His body. On the third day He restored His soul to His body; He rose again from the dead perfect without corruption, and freed us from the yoke of sin. In that flesh (united) with the power of His Godhead He ascended into heaven where He was before.

In a low voice. We pray Thee, O Lord, we entreat Thee that as Thou didst send Him on Thy holy disciples and pure apostles so send on us that Holy Spirit of Thine who sanctifieth our soul and body and spirit; and may we be pure from all our sins, that we may draw nigh to receive Thy divine mystery, for Thine is the kingdom, the honour and the glory for ever and ever.

In a loud voice. Remember, O Lord, the covenant of Thy words which Thou didst make with our fathers and with the holy apostles that Thou wouldst send Thy Holy Spirit whom the world cannot receive. And Thou hast taught us to call on Thee, saying, Our Father, which art in heaven; hallowed be Thy name; Thy kingdom come; that is, Thy Holy Spirit which faileth not and is unsearchable. May He come from on high from the highest heaven of heavens, bless this bread and hallow also this cup. May He make this bread the communion of Thy life-giving Body (and) again make this cup the Communion of Thy compassionate Blood; may He be united to this bread and cup; may He be for sanctification and cleansing from defilement and for resurrection from the dead, for the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven and for life eternal. Amen.

Prayer of the Fraction.

Oh, this inexplicable and uninterpretable mystery. What is His name? and what is His Father's name? What is His country? and who knoweth its place? The thought of the heart cannot fathom it to find out the reason of the thing, or to speak forth His nature whether first or last. He declared to us concerning Himself and concerning His Father as we were able to hear that in truth He is our Saviour who came to this world in the garb of this flesh which He took of us. This it is that we offer for our salvation even as He was offered on Calvary for the life of all the world. Not barely as ye see this bread as earthly bread dry and baked, which may be handled and touched, but He is the fire of God-head which burneth up the thorns of sin; devouring is He who devoureth transgressors, and consuming is He who consumeth sinners.

Know and examine yourselves. Take heed, then, faithful brethren. If there be any of us that hath a stain in his flesh or sin in his soul, let him depart and not come; and if there be one of us that hath envy in his heart, let him abstain and not present himself. But he that hath purified his soul and his body is blessed; let him come and receive and confess his sin for the Lord our God is merciful.

Pray ye. The mercy of our God is from everlasting and to everlasting. This is the mercy of God who sent His only-begotten Son to take away the sin of the world. This is the mercy of God who hath given to His priests tongues of fire to loose the band of sin. And now, too, the Lord our God hath loosed us from the band of death.

Our Father which art in heaven.

The deacon saith: Standing (bow your head).

Yea, forgive that He may forgive you; yea, pardon that He may pardon you; yea, pray that ye enter not into temptation. It is temptation to receive His Body with irreverence and take His Blood without fear, while one hath upon him the stain of sin. And now with holy soul and with pure heart and with clean thought let us draw nigh to our salvation. Come, let us worship and adore Him.

Pilot of the Soul.

The beginning of Thy holiness is glory (and so on).¹

¹ These words which seem to be the beginning of some hymn, or prayer are found also in John Evang. (p. 85). Cf. also p. 98.

VI. THE ANAPHORA OF SAINT ATHANASIUS

THE EUCHARISTIC THANKSGIVING OF SAINT ATHANASIUS, APOSTOLICAL PATRIARCH OF ALEXANDRIA, WHO SHED LUSTRE ON THE SEE OF MARK THE APOSTLE

ON THE FEAST OF THE GREAT FOUNTAIN OF THE SABBATH DAY.

The deacon saith: Ye who are gathered on this day, hearken to the Eucharist (qeddâsê) of the holy Christian Sabbath.

The priest saith: I call heaven to witness against you, I call earth to witness against you that ye stand in fear and trembling without disturbance. Let no one be here that hath anger against his brother, being full of revenge like Cain; let no one be here in strife with his neighbour like Dathan and Abiram who strove against Moses, and let no one be here that practiseth deceit with his fellow like the serpent who seduced Eve.

O ye priests, ye are the bright eyes of the Lord, consider together each man with his fellow (and) try (those) from amongst your people to see that there stands not nor abides in your midst at prayer, either an adulterer, or a murderer, or an idolater, or a thief, or a liar, which five are dogs who shall be condemned to outer darkness. Reprove the sinner as your brother, admonish him openly, if there be in him a sin unto death, exhort him that hath transgressed to leave his ways and to make confession to God that He may forgive him.

A similar paragraph follows addressed to the deacons, the lights of the Church.

The deacon saith: Ye who sit, arise in the fear of God.

The priest saith: Let the inner ears of your heart be opened, and not the ears which are set without.

Let the inner eyes of your heart, etc.

And let not your mind be as the waves of the sea, now rising up and again sinking down, but let it be as a pillar of fire reaching from the earth to the heaven.

And let our hearts be stretched forth to His fear as a golden curtain of dense web. Let us lift up our hands to Him and stretch forth our right hands and our left like a sword of fire that filleth Satan with fear, even as it is said; and let our feet be planted in the house of God as a nail of iron that moveth not day or night. At all times let us be thus, the Lord seeing us.

The deacon saith: Let us look to the east in the fear of God.

The priest saith: Man being in honour knoweth not, and is as the beasts which are without understanding and is like unto them; man being a king knoweth not, he hath dishonoured himself of his own will, and is become a slave, and those who are not lords rule over him; man being master knoweth not, etc.

O Lord, how great art Thou who hast made all men! Thou hast stretched forth the heaven as a vault to be a marvel unto him; and Thou hast spread forth the earth for the treading of his feet. Thou bringest down the rain from the bosom of the cloud for his sustenance; Thou hast given light to the sun that he may rejoice by day, and hast beautified the moon lest the darkness of the night cover him. . . .

Thou hast made him (man) to see death and life. He loved death and despised life—not the death of the body (only). . . but eternal death.

Oh! Adam, what hast thou done, who hast not suffered us to take delight in the garden of delight in the mansions of the Lord?

Oh! Eve, what hast thou done. . . ?

Oh! Eve, what hast thou done. . . ?

O! Adam and Eve. . .

A long passage follows on the evil effects of the Fall.

Hail to thee, Eden, paradise of Adam our father to which we cannot attain until we have kept our feet from ways of vanity.

And again let us say, O Seraphim, guardians of Paradise with swords of fire, suffer us to enter in that we may see the mansions of the Lord, though we may not abide therein.

O Seraphim, suffer us to enter in to see the abode of life. . . .

Three other similar paragraphs.

First let us subdue our flesh and collect our thoughts from wandering at any time that our prayer may be accepted, O Lord our God.

The deacon saith: We are attending.

The priest saith: Here we have not a place that is deep and rough, nor a way that is not straight, but that which leads on high, whereon the prophets and apostles went before us.

Another similar paragraph follows, and then mention of those who were before in the flesh, but are now like unto the angels, who are cleansed and have washed their robes, and whose names are written in the book of life with the blood of the Lamb.

We also have three births, one, holy baptism which maketh us like unto Christ, and one the Body and Blood of Christ which pardoneth transgression and sin, and one, tears of repentance which come forth from within like the Jordan (and) which draw nigh purely before God.

And let all of us in purity wash our bodies in pure water and be in the likeness of the angels who glorify God with a voice of praise. In their several majesties, ranks, hosts, etc. . . . some encircle, and some surround and some sing praise, and some shout aloud with joy, some give thanks and some glorify—having each six wings thus they say, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord of Hosts (in full); heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

And we also say together with them, Holy, etc.

Behold we magnify, behold we praise, behold we honour, behold we exalt, the firstborn among days, which is the holy Christian Sabbath; and let us say, This is the day which the Lord hath made, let us be glad and rejoice in it; and let us sing with Asaph the prophet. Rejoice ye in the Lord who hath helped us. Verily, let us rejoice in the Lord who hath bestowed on us freedom after bondage, light after darkness.

Various other texts are mentioned, followed by praise of the Sabbath (the day of Abraham and Moses) and mention of things that are to happen thereon.

Pray, then, for us, and plead for us, and He will have compassion on us; not in our name but in your names, not according to our unholy deeds but according to the mercy of our God.

The people say: According to Thy mercy.

The priest saith: We pray Thee, O Lord, and entreat Thee for those who have fallen asleep, our fathers and our brethren who have passed from this world, that Thou wouldest give them a peaceful rest. . . . And those also whose names we know not, remember Thou them in Thy mercy and write their names in the book of life in Jerusalem (which is) free.

The people say the diptychs.

The priest saith: The beginning of this Thy holiness (is) glory and thanksgiving, majesty and exaltation, O Jesus Christ, Son of the living God.

There follows praise of Christ, His essence and His working.

Thou Thyself didst know Thine essence and comprehend Thy Godhead. This bread which is Thy Body we offer to Thee, and this cup which is Thy Blood we present to Thee for our sin and our transgression, and for the foolishness of Thy people. There is not one of the mysteries of Thy Godhead which Thou didst hide from Thy disciples—(He offereth incense)—Thou didst take bread before them, didst give thanks, bless and break, and give to them saying: Take, eat; this bread is My Body, from which there is no separation.

And likewise the cup—Thou didst mingle water and wine, didst bless and hallow, and say, Take, drink; this cup is My Blood, from which there is no division. As often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup proclaim My death and My resurrection, and confess My ascension into heaven, hoping for My coming again in glory.

The people say: We proclaim.

The priest saith: As Thou didst not hide from Thy disciples the mysteries of the majesty of Thy Godhead, and they hid nought from us, (but) made us Patriarchs, Metropolitans, Bishops, presbyters and deacons according to the order of the Church, root out from the earth the remembrance of all those that contend against our law and write not their names in the book of life; and all those who have no fellowship in the holy Church, the congregation of the apostles, hang on their necks a collar of fire, and let them be dragged thereby, and come to grievous woe; and all those who hate Thy holy name, draw Thy sword and encircle them, and let the earth whereon they tread engulf and devour them and let them go down alive into Sheol.

But as for us who have been persecuted for Thy name's sake, show us Thy compassion, for ravenous 'wolves'¹ have been multiplied who spare not the flock. Do Thou uniting give to them all, sanctifying one by the other. O Son, cry aloud, as He who suffered, and say, eknâsh lamâ sabaqtâni; and while it is still in their mouths, say, Abba, Father, have mercy on those who have eaten My Body and drunk My Blood.

The people say: As it was. . . .

Prayer of the Fraction.

And again we entreat the God of mercy. To Him are we priests, who Himself is priest; and to Him we do sacrifice, who is Himself the sacrifice; and to Him we offer who is Himself the offering. And let Him who is the Lamb come from the highest heaven; let us see Him, and sacrifice Him with our hands that we may be glad in Him. Let His body be united with this bread, and His Blood also be poured into this cup; and let not one of us when he eateth this bread think that what he eateth is the Body only, but the Blood and the Spirit; and let not one of us think when he drinketh this cup that what he drinketh is the Blood without the Body and the Spirit, but (that) the Body and the Blood and the Spirit are one, even as the Godhead of the Lord our God was one with His manhood.

Pray ye. We pray Thee, O Father, and entreat Thee

of Thy goodness to send Thy Son, even Thy Beloved whose essence is unsearchable, He being the fire of the Godhead. Let us see Him, therefore, who is as the fire of life, as a spiritual victim and a reasonable sacrifice. May He, even Jesus Christ be united to this Eucharist for ever and ever.

The deacon saith : Standing (bow your heads).

The priest saith : O this day, the holy Christian Sabbath, powerful as the Father, mighty as the Son, real as the Holy Spirit; O this day, etc. . . pray for us and plead for us with the Lord our God.

Pilot of the Soul.

Even as David said in the Psalms, O Lord, who shall dwell in Thy tabernacle? . . . Thy Holy Spirit made answer and said, He that walketh in purity. . . . And again he said, Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? . . . The Holy Spirit made answer and said, He whose heart is pure and whose hands are pure. . . . He shall receive a blessing from the Lord, and shall enter into the city whose artificer and maker is God.

Pray ye. Behold we magnify, behold we praise the first-born among days which is the holy Christian Sabbath. . . .

Imposition of the hand. 'My priests' He called them; He who is uncreated, loved more than all the priests from whose hands we have received the Holy Body of Thy Son, and the precious Blood of Thy Messiah.

O Lord our God, our Father which art in heaven, make that it be for life and for salvation and for forgiveness of sin. Amen.

VII. THE ANAPHORA OF SAINT EPIPHANIUS

THE EUCHARISTIC THANKSGIVING OF SAINT EPIPHANIUS, PATRIARCH

Great is the Lord in His greatness, holy in His holiness, praised in His praise, glorified in His glory. . . .

There is no beginning of His essence, nor end of His Being; there is no number of His days nor reckoning of His years. . . .

Mysterious is He who cannot be comprehended by the thought, and lofty is He who cannot be known by the understanding.

There follow a great number of similar clauses commencing: Exalted is He, Deep is He, High is He, Low is He, Powerful is He, Victorious is He, Wise is He, Prudent is He, Mighty is He, Strong is He, etc., etc., and then the paragraph ends as follows:

He alone is God, King of kings and Lord of lords, and when He saw that the blood of the holy prophets, from the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zacharias the son of Barachias, availed not to save the world, He sent to us His Son as a Saviour to help and ransom and to bring before Him the memorial of the living and the dead.

The deacon saith: For the sake of the blessed.

The priest saith: He came, though He was here (already), He was sent, though here His sound was heard; He came down, though He moved not from His throne nor left His place.

The deacon saith: Ye who sit (arise).

The priest saith: He was conceived in the womb, though He filled all things.

Here follows mention of His baptism, temptation, His hungering and thirsting, His preaching of the gospel of the kingdom of heaven.

And then He stretched forth His hands to the passion on the tree of the cross, that He might heal the wounds of the suffering by the sprinkling of His Blood. In that night on the evening of the fifth day (of the week) at the dawn of the sixth, as He was at meat in the house of Lazarus His friend, He took unleavened wheaten bread of that which they had brought unto Him for supper; He gave thanks, blessed and brake, and gave to His disciples, and said unto them, Take, eat; this bread is My Body which is broken for you.

And again He mixed a cup of wine with water; He gave thanks, blessed and hallowed, and gave to His disciples, and said unto them, Take, drink: this cup is My Blood which is poured out for you; and be this ordinance unto you for a memorial of My death and My resurrection.

And we also, our Lord and our God, pray Thee and entreat Thee to send the Holy Spirit and power on this bread and upon this cup. May He make this bread Thy holy Body, and this cup Thy life-giving Blood. Do Thou, uniting (them), grant to those who receive of it that it be unto them for blessing and for forgiveness of sin, for joy and for rejoicing, for renewal of soul and body and spirit, and for strengthening of faith until (their) last breath.

Prayer of the Fraction.

Where is the place of wisdom, and where her abode and where her coasts, and where shall be found the track of her way? Who hath gone over the sea and bought her with red gold, and who hath gone up above the clouds and brought her down? . . .

The deacon saith: Standing (bow your heads).

The priest saith: Lord of lights, Lord of dominions, Lord of the heads of the angels. . . .

O Lord Almighty, Father of our Lord and our God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, make us worthy to receive of this bread, the life-giving Body of Thy Son, and of this cup, the reasonable Blood of Thy Messiah, by whom to Thee, with Him, etc.

Pilot of the Soul.

The deacon saith: Pray ye.

Yea, O Lord, Lord of all.

This phrase is repeated eight times, substituting for the second 'Lord' the words God, Ruler, Upholder, Creator, Holder, King, Saviour, Sustainer, in succession.

As Thou hast united the Flesh of Thy Son with our flesh, and as Thou hast mingled the Blood of Thy Messiah with our blood, so unite Thy fear to our hearts, and the beauty of Thy Godhead in our thoughts. We are fleshly and mind the things of the flesh, and do the works of the flesh, and walk in the ways of the flesh, but do Thou 'teach us'¹ the works of the Spirit, and give us understanding of the law of the Spirit, and guide us in the ways of the Spirit, for if Thou hast mercy on us sinners, then art Thou called merciful. The righteous Thou teachest² according to their works and rewardest after their righteousness. Remember not against us our former sins; let Thy compassion speedily find us, O Lord; to Thee we call, to Thee we cry, to Thee we make supplication for ever and ever. Amen.

¹ 'Teach us'. This word has been omitted in the MS. but is added by a later hand in the margin.

² Teachest. So it is in the MS. Perhaps the translation should be 'pitied', or 'hast mercy on'. The verbs in Ethiopic differ only in a single letter, and the two letters are often interchanged.

VIII. THE ANAPHORA OF THE CCCXVIII ORTHODOX

THE EUCHARISTIC THANKSGIVING WHICH THE CCCXVIII ORTHODOX MADE
TOGETHER WITH ONE VOICE

Awful amid the clouds and higher than the heavens is God, Glorious in all His ways, God of gods, Sabaoth, Perfect. There is no time when He was not, nor any time when He failed, nor any time when He appeared in the perfection of His Godhead; and there is none that is able to behold Him, and there is none that knoweth the nature of His essence. Him the heavens and the earth praise, with all their generations, the sea and the rivers and all that in them is, by whose grace all things were created, and by whose goodness all things stand, who is one, the Father of the Only-begotten, the Father of the Lord, the Father of the Messiah, Light in truth with His Son.

The deacon saith: We are attending.

The priest saith: We declare the essence of the Father with His Son and the essence of the Son with His Father. Before all creation, and before the making of the heavens; before the earth was 'founded',¹ and before the mountains and the hills rose up, and before the heights of the air appeared, etc., etc.

The deacon saith: Ye who sit (arise).

The priest saith: Let us then understand this matter with great diligence, lest we come into the great sea where fire and water are mingled together and where we cannot swim or come forth from it.

Let us understand even as the apostles have taught us concerning the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, saying: The Father affirmeth concerning the Son that He is His only-begotten Son Jesus Christ, and the Son affirmeth that God the Father begat Him; and They declare of the Holy Spirit that He hath proceeded from the Father and received of the Son, one counsel and one power and one might that is indivisible, in His essence there is no cause and no variation, in His Godhead no diminution nor addition. Even as the Lord answered His disciples concerning His essence, saying: We have no first and no last, We have no left and no right, We have no roof and no foundations, We are the roof and We the foundation; there is none that can behold Us, nor any that knoweth Our Essence; We know all, and understand all; We put far the near and bring near the far off, We silence the cry of the tongue, as he who heareth not, and We know the whisper of the heart. My Father and I and the Holy Spirit are the foundation and the door and the habitation; My Father and I and the Holy Spirit are majesty and favour and grace; My Father and I and the Holy Spirit are sun and light and heat; My Father and I and the Holy Spirit are fire and flame and coal.

Such is Our essence and such Our end and Our days are not for ever, but for ever and ever and ever, and moreover in them is no number, nor any end.

The deacon saith: Upward be your thoughts.

The priest saith: Slow of anger, and great in mercy and righteous. . . . When Thou givest the recompense which eye hath not seen nor ear heard and which hath not been conceived in the heart of man, even what Thou hast prepared in Thy Son Jesus Christ for ever and ever.

The deacon saith: For the sake of the blessed.

The priest saith: God the Father sent His Son to dwell in the body of a maiden who knew not a man; He was enveloped in the womb in the form of a babe, but was not contained (therein); He was made man, though He was God.

A commemoration follows of His works and preaching.

They accounted as (but) man Him who forgiveth sin, and they judged the Judge of judges.

And He chose from their midst the twelve apostles (and) went about with them, and He showed them the ordinance of the mystery of the Eucharist. He took bread before them; He blessed, and said, Take, eat; this bread is My Body which is broken for you for the remission of sin.

And likewise He blessed the cup also, and said, Take, drink; this cup is My Blood which is given for you for the forgiveness of sin.

Then Jesus said, My soul is troubled which maketh glad the troubled. In that night they seized Him, and in the morning the elders of the Jews and the chief priests, with Pilate the Governor, sat in the tribunal to judge Him.

A commemoration of the Passion and Crucifixion.

Oh, the hands. . . . Oh! the feet. . . . Oh! the mouth, etc., as in Chrysostom, p. 90.

A commemoration of the Burial.

They took Him down from the tree, and laid Him in a sepulchre; it was not in their own sepulchre that they laid Him, but without in the sepulchre of the strangers of three cubits (depth?), and they sealed it with a stone. And while He was there He cried to Adam His servant and to all his sons.

The priest saith: The Lord be with you.

The people say: With thy spirit.

The priest saith: Give ye thanks to God.

The people say: It is right and meet.

The priest saith: Lift up your hearts.

The people say: We have them unto the Lord our God, our Father which art in heaven, our Father which art in heaven, our Father which art in heaven: Thou art the Lord our God.

The priest saith: And when He had said this to Adam His servant, Adam rejoiced and came forth with all his sons, and went into the holy city even as it was said; and again, that He might cause the glory of His resurrection to be seen, he unveiled a portion of His Godhead and made those who kept the tomb to fall (to the ground).

A commemoration of the Resurrection, Appearance in the upper room, Ascension and Second Coming.

Flung wide be the doors of light and opened the gates of glory, and Thy Living and Holy Spirit shall be sent from the place of His secret essence.¹ Let Him descend and come and shine on this bread and let it be the Body of Christ our God; and let the savour of this cup be changed, and let it be the Blood of Christ our God; and to the utmost end have mercy and compassion on us the congregation of the holy Church, and specially on those who have chosen my poverty for the service of this mystery have mercy and compassion for ever and ever.

¹ It would be possible to take this whole sentence in the indicative, 'Flung wide are the doors. . . . Spirit is sent, etc.'

Prayer of the Fraction:

And again. . . . Remember the Body which Thou didst take of the holy Virgin that it is our flesh, and not (something) which Thou didst bring from heaven.

Five other similar phrases follow.

Pray ye.

The deacon saith: Standing (bow your heads).

The priest saith: We give Thee thanks, O Lord, through Thy beloved Son Jesus Christ. It is Thou who hast brought us nigh before the greatness of Thy majesty. To Thee be glory and honour and praise for ever and ever.

Pilot of the Soul.

Pray ye.

IX. THE ANAPHORA OF SAINT GREGORY OF ALEXANDRIA

THE EUCHARISTIC THANKSGIVING OF SAINT GREGORY OF ALEXANDRIA

Instead of 'In heaven'.

The deacon saith: Pray ye for our fathers the Popes and our fathers the Bishops and our brethren the priests, and our helpers the presbyters; pray ye, sons of this Church, for the faithful, men and women; and again, pray for virgins and monks, and for children and babes, and for old men and youths. Arise duly, arise that the peace of God may be with you.

The priest saith: We give thanks unto Him who doeth good unto us, the merciful God, the Father of our Lord and our God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; we give Thee thanks, Holy God, Merciful God, Compassionate God, slow of anger, great in mercy and righteous; Thou art our God without beginning and our Saviour without end. . . .

The deacon saith: Let us attend to the beauty of the glory of our God.

The priest saith: This is He who made the heavens and this He who founded the earth. . . .

The deacon saith : Ye who sit (arise).

The priest saith : He came down from above the heavens His throne, He became incarnate amongst us, and was made man amongst His first creatures, He came down, yet put not off the glory of His Godhead, and gave us life by His death.

The deacon saith: Look to the east.

The priest saith: We raise to Thee the eyes of our hearts, and we bend before Thee the stubbornness of our heart—Thanks be to Thee, glory be to Thy kingdom—and with Thy archangels we offer incense unto Thee. We stretch forth (our) hands¹ unto Thee and spread a tent over this sacrifice (or, altar).

He suffered of His own will, and was crucified of His good pleasure, and He died by the counsel of His Father; and He rose on the third day, and ascended in glory to heaven.

The deacon saith: Answer ye.

The priest saith: He covered the heaven with His beauty, He filled the earth with His glory,—secretly—O my God, Master (and) Friend, the First and the Last, Thou art the Bread of Life, who didst come down from heaven; send on us the grace of the Holy Spirit to sanctify us, body and soul and spirit—aloud—O Eternal God, the First and the Last, First without to-morrow, Last without yesterday, Ancient of days without to-day. . . .²

He took bread in His hands which were pierced, and wherewith He formed Adam our father—pure is He without sin, and clean is He without guile—He gave thanks, blessed and brake, and gave to His disciples, and said unto them—pointing—This is My Body—pointing—the food of righteousness indeed; whoso eateth shall live for ever and ever.

And again, He looked on this cup, the water of life with wine; He gave thanks, blessed and hallowed, and delivered to His disciples, and said unto them, This is—pointing—My Blood—pointing—the draught of life indeed; whoso drinketh of it hath eternal life. Take, drink of it, all of you, that it be unto you for life and for salvation,¹ (even to you) who are gathered in this 'house of prayer,'² the place of prayer of all faithful men and women.

In the beginning was the Word; the Word is the Word of God; and the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, and the garb of flesh, which is perishable, but which He made imperishable, hid Him from us. . . The cycle³ of Hosanna He showed to His disciples, and said unto them, crying with a loud voice, Say ye, Blessed, Hosanna in the highest.

The people say: Hosanna in the highest three times.

By His Hosanna He showed signs and wonders such as were not wrought before, nor shall be hereafter [Hosanna]

Four similar clauses, with same response follow.

The deacon saith: For the sake of the blessed.

Intercessions follow.

The assistant saith the Prayer of Benediction: O Holy Trinity, Upholder of the whole world, who hast wrought great things and wonders by the power of Thy Word, bless the east and the west, the north and the south, [the north wind and the south wind]⁴ the heaven and the earth, the sea and the rivers and the fountains of waters and every spring of water; bless the winds of heaven and the rains of the earth; bless the sun and the moon and the stars; bless the mountains and the ¹ It would, perhaps, be better to put a full stop at 'salvation', and to take the following words with the succeeding paragraph.

² Lit. in this prayer. Probably bēta=house-of, has dropped out.

³ The phrase does not occur elsewhere in the Anaphoras. The word which I translate 'cycle', means 'circuit', and seems to be a technical word describing the five-fold 'Hosanna' passage following.

⁴ The words in brackets seem to be a gloss defining the sense in which the previous words are used, for in later Ethiopic the words for 'north' and 'south' have interchanged meanings.

hills, the trees and the corn and the fruits of the earth; bless those who are under the heaven, and those who dwell in the earth; O Christ our God, reward them in Thy heavenly kingdom, and fill their hearts with the fear of Thy name, and stablish their life for ever.

Further intercessions.

And us, who have gathered to eat Thy holy Body and to drink Thy precious Blood, raise up by Thy right hand with those who have done Thy will. Rear up our babes and prolong their days, and (bring) our youths to old age. Impoverish not our rich, enrich our poor, and heal our sick, make not them who are whole to fall sick. Have compassion on the dead, and have mercy on the living. Bless me and sanctify my soul and cleanse my body to receive Thy life-giving Body and to drink Thy Blood, the Blood of the divine mystery.

The deacon saith: With all the heart we entreat.

The priest saith: Do Thou, uniting them, grant that it be for life eternal unto all those who receive of it; grant us to have fellowship in Thy Holy Spirit; grant us to receive the communion of the Holy Spirit that He may vouchsafe good unto us.

Prayer of the Fraction—in Basil (and so on).

Pilot of the Soul.

Pray ye.

Guide our souls and our bodies, O Pilot, Almighty God. . . . Mingle our weakness with the strength of Thy Godhead, and again, unite our suffering with the suffering of Thy cross. To Thee we pray, Thee we entreat, to Thee we make supplication for ever and ever.

Imposition of hand.

X. THE ANAPHORA OF SAINT DIOSCORUS

THE EUCHARISTIC THANKSGIVING OF SAINT DIOSCORUS

Before the world (was), and unto everlasting is God in His kingdom, God in His triune nature, God in His divinity. Before the morning and the evening, and before the day and night; before the angels were created, was God in His kingdom. Before the heavens were stretched forth, and before the face of the dry land appeared, before the green herbs grew, was God in His kingdom. Before the sun and the moon and the stars, and before the orbits of the lights was God in His kingdom. Before the beasts that move, and the birds that fly, before the creatures of the sea was God in His kingdom. Before He created Adam in His own image and likeness, and before (man) transgressed the commandment was God in His kingdom.

Glory (be) to the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, now and ever and world without end. Amen.

The deacon saith: For the sake of the blessed.

The priest saith: Let the heaven hearken and the earth hear, and the foundations of the 'hills'¹ tremble.

The deacon saith: Ye who sit (arise).

The priest saith: By the will of His Father He came down to Mary; He sojourned in her pure virginity. God was born.

The deacon saith: (Look) to the east.

The priest saith:

In the manger of the cattle was He laid
 Gifts to His royal majesty were paid
 As any other babe He wept (afraid)
 Seeking His food from the breasts of the Maid.¹

The deacon saith: We are attending.

The priest saith: He walked openly and was seen as man. Little by little He grew. At the age of thirty years was He baptized in Jordan. As man He sojourned in the wilderness to fast. By the devil was He tempted; by the power of His Godhead He destroyed the chiefs of darkness.

The deacon saith: Answer ye.

The priest saith: Holy, Holy, Holy is God in His Trinity. Though He was King, He showed His humility as a servant.

He stretched forth His hands to the passion—even He who had formed man²—that He might free man from the yoke of sin. In that night in which He was betrayed He took bread in His holy and blessed hands which were without spot, He looked up to heaven to Thee His Father, He gave thanks, blessed and brake, and gave to His holy disciples and pure apostles, and said unto them, Take, eat; this bread is My Body which is broken for you for the forgiveness of sin. And again, He mingled water and wine; He gave thanks, blessed and hallowed, and delivered to His holy disciples and pure apostles, and said unto them, Take, drink;

¹ These words in the original are, as Rodwell points out, in rhyme. An attempt has been made to reproduce this feature.

² Possibly a word has dropped out and we should read, '(His hands) wherewith He formed man' (cf. Anaphora of Gregory of Alexandria, p. 110).

this cup is My Blood which is poured out for you for a ransom for many. The Jews seized Him and set Him before the judgment-seat, Him before whom the hosts of angels stand in fear and trembling. They crucified Him on the tree, and pierced Him with nails, and smote His head with a reed; they thrust through His side with a spear; they gave Him to drink in His thirst gall mingled with myrrh, even to Him who gave Israel to drink from one rock for the spies.¹

He died who dieth not; He died to destroy death; He died to give life to the dead, even as He had promised them by the word of a covenant. They took Him down from the tree and wrapped Him in linen clothes and buried Him in a new tomb. On the third day He rose from the dead, came to (the place) where His disciples were, and appeared to them in the upper room of Zion. And on the fortieth day, when He ascended to heaven, He commanded them, saying, Wait for the promise of the Father; and on the fiftieth day He sent to them His Holy Spirit (in tongues) as of fire, and they spake together in the speech of all lands.

So likewise send 'that'² Spirit of Thine on this bread and upon this cup. May He make it the Body and the Blood of our Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ for ever and ever. As Thou Thyself didst say, Whoso

¹ Rodwell translates, 'to drink from the square rock, to each a fountain', or lit. 'from the four stones, to each a fountain'. Four stones do not constitute a square rock. Also the numeral is 'one' not 'four'. The Ethiopic phrase for 'spies' is 'men of eye'. The word for 'men' might mean 'each', if it were not here in the construct state, and 'eye' and 'fountain' in Ethiopic as in Hebrew are denoted by the same word. Why the spies are specially mentioned is not clear.

² There is some confusion in the MS. here. 'Likewise' is added by a later hand. I have emended 'that' from a similar word which has no meaning in the context.

eateth My Flesh and drinketh My Blood shall be with Me and I will be with him.¹

May the Lamb come, may we see Him with (our) eyes and sacrifice Him with (our) hands, that we may rejoice in Him. May He be united to this bread and His Blood poured into this cup, and let none of us think when he eateth this bread that what he eateth is the Body alone without the Blood and the Spirit, nor let one of us think, when he drinketh this cup that what he drinketh is the Blood without the Body and the Spirit; but one is the Body and the Blood and the Spirit, even as His Godhead with His manhood is one for ever and ever.

Pilot of the Soul.

For He despised not (and so on).

¹ From this point on, Rodwell's translation differs. A Prayer of the Fraction is mentioned in his MS., but Pilot of the Soul is apparently omitted.

XI. THE ANAPHORA OF JAMES OF SERUG

THE EUCHARISTIC THANKSGIVING OF JAMES OF SERUG

Rise in the fear of God to hearken, open the windows of your ears and awaken your hearts. Not without purpose is it that we are in this place. The Lord seeth and trieth each one of us.

Let us draw nigh and pray unto God remembering our forefathers who have entered into rest in the true faith; and let us begin with our present honoured father, our archpope Abba Matthew and his colleague Abba Sinoda, our Pope.

The deacon saith: For the sake of the blessed.

The priest saith: Rest Thou the souls of these and of all whose names have been called and of those whose names have not been called, for whom this fair memorial hath been made before Thee, and have mercy on them, even Thou who sentest Thy Son from heaven into the Virgin's womb, that He might do Thy will.

The deacon saith: Ye who sit (arise).

The priest saith: To Thy Son Thou hast committed and entrusted authority, and hast given and appointed unto Him the judgment of heaven and earth, He being set in authority before the world was created.

The deacon saith: (Look) to the east.

The priest saith: How great is the majesty and the strength and the patience, which (is) with might, of Thy Son.

The deacon saith: We are attending.

The priest saith: Him Thy Beloved the angels worship and the archangels, ten thousand times ten thousand, and every name that is named; the hosts of Michael by their tribes, and the hosts of Gabriel by their companies, the Cherubim in their majesty, and the Seraphim in their holiness, and all the hosts of angels by their ranks give praise to God whom the saints extol with glory.

Let us, too, say together with them,

Holy, Holy, Holy, in truth Thou art our Lord and our God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; holy in Thy holiness, exalted in Thine exaltation, praised in Thy praise, and glorified in the glory of Thy holy angels art Thou.

O Lord our God, like unto Thee in image and brightness is He who begat Thee; Thou (wast) sent from Him Thy Father—source from source which issued from on high, a long thread which was not cut off from the Father, the Creator of heaven and earth. Of Thine own will Thou camest down from heaven; Thou wast contained—a tiny child—in the womb of the Virgin; a maiden, a daughter of the poor did carry Thee; a Galilean maiden embraced Thee; her didst Thou strengthen and in Thee she was not amazed; her soul Thou didst hallow and her body Thou didst purify. In Bethlehem Thou wast born; Thou wast seen as man; by John wast Thou baptized and on the sea Thou didst walk; Thou didst rebuke the winds, and give life to souls. Hosanna. Thou wentest about with Thy disciples. In the might of the Godhead Thou didst satisfy a multitude of men with five loaves and two fishes.

O Lord, Judas, to whom Thou hadst done no hurt, did hurt to Thee; before Annas Thou wast reviled and before Caiaphas Thou wast scorned and before Pilate Thou wast tried, and Thou wast numbered with the transgressors. Then on the sixth day they crucified Thee on the tree in the likeness of this sign of the cross which we make, raising up our hands on this table.

O Lord, by the hand of a servant wast Thou stricken, with a reed wast Thou smitten, with a spear wast Thou pierced; bitter gall and vinegar they gave Thee to drink. Though Thou wast God and able to prevent them, Thou preventedst (them) not, but didst endure (and) didst humble Thyself even unto death. All this came unto Thee for love to men. Thou didst rise again from the dead and didst raise the dead; Thou leddest captivity captive, an offering to Thy Father; in the garb of flesh with the might of the Godhead Thou didst ascend to heaven where Thou wast before.

O Lord, have mercy on Thy people, remember Thy covenant with Abraham Thy beloved, and Isaac Thy servant, and Israel Thy holy one whom Thou didst call by Thy name.

O Lord, for the sake of the holy prophets and the apostles who proclaimed (Thy word); for the sake of the ordained priests and the victorious martyrs; for the sake of the blessed righteous and for the sake of the patient¹ virgins and monks.

O Lord, for the sake of these four evangelists—their likeness is as the wheels of the thrones in heaven; Matthew in the likeness of a Man, who declared Thy birth of the seed of David in the flesh, beginning from the first born of the patriarchs; Mark in the likeness of a Lion, who proclaimed aloud² with a true faith Thy gospel to the Egyptians; Luke in the likeness of an Ox preached Thy humility, Thy lying down with the asses and oxen, Thy being wrapped in swaddling clothes, Thy being with the Virgin Thy mother in the manger; John in the likeness of an Eagle, who soareth and proclaimeth on high the essence of the Godhead, expoundeth the sea of wisdom, and maketh deep his preaching. It was Thou who didst choose him from amongst his fellows, and adorn him with holiness, and gird him with Thine own girdle of virginity in the likeness of the angels that he might be without stain.

O Lord, what mouth or what lips or what tongue is able to praise (Thy) loftiness? Glory to Thee, power to Thy kingdom, might to Thy Father, praise and glory with honour to the Holy Spirit, co-equal with Thee and with Him who begat Thee, undiminished for ever.

The deacon saith: Lift up (your hands, ye presbyters).

The priest saith: Thou didst take bread in Thy holy hands that Thou mightest give to Thy holy disciples; Thou who didst bless them, who art with glory, bless now also this bread; Thou who didst break then, who art with blessing, break now also this bread.¹

And, again, Thou didst mix a cup of wine with water that Thou mightest give (it) to Thy pure apostles. Thou who didst hallow then, hallow now also this cup; Thou who didst deliver then, deliver now also this cup; Thou who didst unite (them) then unite now also this bread with this cup, that it may be Thy Body and Thy Blood.

The deacon saith: Be it in heaven.

The priest saith: Flung wide be the gates of light, and opened the doors of glory, and drawn back be the veil that is before the Father's face and let Him descend—Behold the Lamb of God—and abide on this table²

¹ Thou who didst . . . bread. This clause is omitted in the MS., but added by a later hand.

² The word 'priests' comes in the MS. after 'table'. It seems impossible to connect it with the rest of the sentence.

set before me Thy¹ servant, and sent forth 'be'² Melos the terrifying sword of fire, and let Him who breaketh this Eucharist be seen on this bread and cup.

Prayer of the Fraction.

And again we entreat of Thee, O Lover of men, and we give Thee thanks by all in all. And let not Thy Body and Blood be a reproach to any one of us because that our souls and bodies are not pure.

As Thou didst turn Thy Body on the tree of the cross upwards and downwards, to the right hand and to the left as to the four corners of the earth for the life of all the world, so we also take and show with this bread the selfsame sign of the cross. And to none of us who receiveth of it may it be for death or for doom.

What, then, O Lord, Thou who knowest the folly of men? None can be found that hath not forsaken Thine ordinance from the first Adam unto this very day, but Thou art slow to anger and great in mercy and righteous, O Lord our God.

Pray ye.

Yea, I will pray even as the first ordinance that was commanded from the Lord, as Moses and Aaron the priests prayed for the people. I also pray to Thee for those who have come to the house of Thy sanctuary, priests and deacons, and those of Thy people and Thine inheritance who are without. And if there is one of the laity whose thought is far from Thee, make him to be plunged in Thy will.

As Thou didst gather this bread while it was scattered amidst the mountains and hills and in the valleys and the field, and (as) it being gathered became one prosphora. . . .

² It seems better to read the subjunctive. The MS. has the indicative.

The deacon saith: Standing (bow your heads).

The priest saith: Yea, we humble ourselves and give thanks to Thee who sittest in Thy temple on high whereunto neither the thought of man nor the knowledge of angels attaineth. We entreat the bounty of Thy goodness for Thy people and Thine inheritance who have come to this Thy holy church on this day, priests and deacons, who have bowed their heads before the majesty of Thy greatness to receive Thy Body and Thy Blood at the hand of me Thy sinful servant whom Thou hast called by Thy favour, not for my merit nor my worthiness, but in my poverty.

This then is the covenant of Thy word which Thou didst speak to Thy priests, saying, (Ye are) the salt of the earth, who didst say to the priests, (Ye are) the light of the world, who didst say to the priests, (Ye are) in the likeness of the angels, who didst say to the priests, (Ye are) the lamp of the Church. Come then, O Thou Chief of the priests, Jesus Christ, to bless Thy people for ever and ever.

Pilot of the Soul.

O Thou Creator of the lights, who didst abolish the darkness, and destroy idolatry, and by Thy death annihilate death, we entreat the bounty of Thy goodness for Thy people and Thine inheritance who have come to this the house of Thy sanctuary to receive Thy Body and Thy Blood which is their hope from Thy glorious table.

By day guard them from wandering and error, in body, in imagination or in sight. By night be Thou their shepherd throughout its watches, let not vain thoughts that destroy the soul approach unto them.

If they sleep, make the wings of Thine angels to cover them; let not a deep sleep like death overwhelm them. Awaken them in Thy love, O Lord, that they may extol Thy glorious name and power, O Lord our God, the Upholder of the world.

Pray ye.

Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us Christians Thy people is this world a hope, for it waxeth old and perisheth, but we hope and look for that which is to come. For Thou didst say, Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my word shall not pass away. And again Thou saidst, There shall be a blast of a trumpet three times, that is, to wake the dead. At the first blast of the trumpet the dust of the flesh shall be gathered which was scattered to the furthest ends, that which is above and that which is beneath, that which is on the dry land and that which is in the sea, and that which the beasts have devoured, that which hath waxen old or perished by various deaths, the husk of the flesh that hath fallen on the earth shall be gathered to its former receptacle.

And at the second blast of the trumpet the bones shall be joined to the flesh and the body shall be complete, (but) without motion or movement until its due time.

And at the third blast of the trumpet the dead shall rise as in the twinkling of an eye, both righteous and sinners, bearing with them the deeds, whether good or evil, which they wrought on earth in the days of their life. And Thou shalt set the righteous on Thy right hand and the sinners on Thy left. And Thou shalt speak to Thy chosen with a word of blessedness, saying, Come unto me, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom of heaven prepared for you before the world was created. I was hungry, and ye gave me to eat : I was thirsty, and ye gave me to drink : I was naked, and ye clothed me : I was sick, and ye visited me : I was a prisoner, and ye spake unto me : I was a stranger, and ye lodged me. And then Thou shalt turn to Thy left hand and reproach the sinners with a word of accusation, saying, Depart from me, ye accursed, into eternal fire prepared for Satan and his angels. I was hungry, ye gave me not to eat : I was thirsty, ye gave me not to drink : I was naked, ye clothed me not : I was sick, ye visited me not : I was a prisoner, ye spake not unto me : I was a stranger, ye lodged me not.

And then shall be stopped every mouth and tongue that speaketh wickedness and deceit. Then shall be sorrow, sorrow that availeth not ; then shall be crying, crying that availeth not ; then shall be wailing, wailing that availeth not ; then shall be groaning, groaning that availeth not. Then shall tears flow as the water of the rain¹ without limit or end ; and devastating lightning shall be sent forth upon them, and the sound of a fearful thundering, even of a mighty thunder that cutteth and divideth asunder. This is the portion of sinners.

Then shall the earth restore her dead² and the mother shall not hear the wailing of her daughter ; then shall be revealed to the soul all the works which it hath wrought in the days of its life. Have mercy and compassion on us then, we beseech Thee, for that we have eaten Thy Flesh and have drunk Thy Blood, for Thou didst say, Whoso eateth My Flesh and drinketh My Blood hath eternal life.

And again we beseech Thee by Mary Thy mother who is our Lady and the Glory of our race, (even) by her who bore Thee, for Thou didst say (unto her), Whoso maketh memorial of thee and calleth on thy name shall live in life eternal.

And thirdly we beseech Thee by the persons¹ of the angels and by the persecutions of the prophets, by the preaching of the apostles, by the right hand of the priests and by the blood of the martyrs, by the virginity of young men and maidens and monks and by the faith of believing men and women. Have mercy on us, then, spare us and pity us.

Glory (be) to the Father who sent, praise to the Son who was sent, honour and glory to the Holy Spirit, the Giver of life now and ever and world without end. Amen.

Imposition of hand.

Sole in power is the Lord and there is none other name like His beneath the four foundations or above the seven habitations,² who created all things without toil and formed Adam the work of the hand of God.

Now, our Lord and our God, we pray Thee and entreat Thee for those who have bowed their heads before Thee, that Thou wouldest work for them. Bring up their babes and train their children, support their old men, and strengthen them that are bruised amongst them, guard their wives, and protect their little ones, satisfy their hungry, and give their thirsty to drink, clothe their naked and give rest to their afflicted, comfort their sorrowful and make their sad to rejoice, restore their sick and heal their diseased, enlighten the eyes of their blind and make the ears of their deaf to hear, loose their bound and redeem those of them that are captive, purify their bodies and sanctify their souls, and as they return to their houses do Thou, O Lord, guide them and bring them home.

O Lord, feed them and set them up for ever and ever.

XII. THE ANAPHORA OF SAINT GREGORY OF ARMENIA

THE EUCHARISTIC THANKSGIVING OF SAINT GREGORY OF ARMENIA

We give Thee thanks, O Lord; we glorify Thee and praise Thee. Blessed is Thy name and we too bless Thee; praised is Thy name and we too praise Thee. Majestic art Thou above the majestic; greatness beyond utterance is in Thee. Glorious art Thou and we glorify Thee, who art above the holy ones and wonderful is Thy glory. Above myriads of myriads of angels Thou art sanctified, and above the watchers who sleep not Thou art glorified; and above the threescore majestic ones who approach unto Thee. Waves of fire flee that they approach not unto Thee; and at the coals of fire that issue from Thy mouth they are afraid and are troubled. All together with one voice sanctify and glorify Thee. So we too Thy humble servants, with hands outstretched and raised, making the sign of Thy cross to glorify Thee and praise Thee; and the Seraphim and the Cherubim also that have each six wings.

The deacon saith: Ye who sit (arise).

The priest saith: All together with one voice sanctify Thee and praise Thee one to another, each to his fellow, and say, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord of hosts (in full).

The deacon saith: Answer ye.

The priest saith: Our Lord who was hidden in a veil of clouds was born of the holy Virgin a Saviour; He was found, who may not be known, even He who was indeed the sun-rising. We confess the Father who sent, and we confess the Son who was sent, and the Holy Spirit, the Giver of life, and we say, Holy is the Lord who loosed death and broke the nails of brass. From the dead He rose and raised the dead, and descended into Sheol, loosed the bound (and) preached unto them liberty.

The deacon saith: (Look) to the east.

The priest saith: We give Thee thanks and glorify Thee, Dispeller of darkness, in truth our Saviour that in Thy Son's love and Thine own love for mankind He gave His Flesh in the same night that He was taken—though He was God and all (in all)—He received the spitting of the unclean and the confinement of chains; He bore all. All this which He bore, though He was Lord and God, He bore for our sakes; for the poor and needy, for prophets and apostles, for martyrs and the faithful, for Bishops¹ (and) presbyters, for deacons and readers, for widows and orphans, for maidens and youths, for the sinners and the scattered, that He might gather the scattered and make just the sinners, and turn the erring to repentance, and make known His resurrection. Those whose names we know let us declare, and those whose names we know not, Thou, O Lord, knowest them and seest them, and all is open before Thee.

The deacon saith: For the sake of the blessed.

The priest saith: For them and for all through our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ Thy beloved Son whom Thou lovedst in the beginning (and) didst send. As Thou didst gather this bread when it was scattered on the mountains and hills, and being gathered it became one perfect loaf, even so gather us also by Thy Godhead from every evil thought unto a perfect faith. As Thou didst mingle water with wine—wine also mingled with water, when it is mixed and mingled it is impossible to separate one from the other—even so gather us by Thy Godhead from every evil thought unto a perfect faith. Mingle, O Lord, our humanity with Thy Godhead, Thy greatness with our humility, and our humility with Thy greatness, that we may offer this Eucharist which Thou didst give to Thy disciples, saying, Take, eat; this bread is My Body which is broken for you, and is given that sin may be forgiven and for life eternal. Amen.

And likewise over the cup also Thou didst speak unto them, saying, Take, drink; this cup is My Blood which is poured out for you and is given that sin may be forgiven and for life eternal. Amen.

And thus make ye memorial of Me—Thou didst say unto them—as often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, proclaiming My death and being raised in My resurrection, and confessing (it).

And make ye memorial of Me with glory and with praise, and with thanksgiving and with might.

We offer (it) to Thee that it may be for all those who receive of it for joy and for rejoicing, for healing and for help, for renewal of body and for healing of soul and spirit. All together with one voice have given Thee thanks for ever.

Prayer of the Fraction.

We give thanks to Thee, O Lord, Jesus Christ, Lord of Hosts, and Lord of dominions, and Lord of mercies that Thou hast granted us a part in this Thy holy and pure mystery, that we may glorify Thee and sanctify Thee. Above the holy ones Thou art, and marvellous in Thy glory, who art Lord for ever and ever, the Lord our God who upholdest all things.

Pray ye.

O Lord, who upholdest all, we pray and beseech Thee that as Thou hast granted us a part in this pure and holy mystery we may be transformed into Thine essence by Thy Godhead in this bread, and may it be unto those who receive for joy and for rejoicing, for healing and for help, and for life eternal and for renewal of body and for healing of soul and spirit. Join (us) to Thine inheritance in Thy heavenly kingdom by Thine only Son, by whom to Thee, with Him and with the Holy Spirit, be glory and power now and ever and world without end. Amen.

The deacon saith: Standing (bow your heads).

The priest saith: Maker of the great lights is Jesus Christ alone; He who separated the light from the darkness protect you.

[Thy people who have humbled themselves unto Thee and expected from Thee a blessing and a good hope, that Thou wouldst guard them and bless them, and bring up their children to receive the Holy Eucharist; grant (this) unto them for a blessing through Christ Jesus our Lord, by whom to Thee, with Him and with the Holy Spirit, be glory and power now and ever and world without end. Amen.

Pilot of the Soul.

And again let us beseech the Lord our God who upholdeth all, the Father of our Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ.

O eternal Lord, whose name is great and holy, who above the lofty art glorified, and whom the humble praise, we give thanks to Thee and glorify Thee for that Thou hast granted us a part in this Thy Holy Eucharist which we have received. Perfect this unto us in confessing Thee unto life and forgiveness of sin, that we may give thanks to Thee and glorify Thee at all times and in every hour, O Lord our God who upholdest all.

Pray ye.

O Lord, who upholdest all, we pray and beseech Thee to sanctify us by the Holy Spirit. Make this Thy blessing unto us, O Lord, that we may thank Thee and glorify Thee at all times and in every hour through Thy only Son, by whom to Thee, with Him and with the Holy Spirit, be glory and power now and ever and world without end.

XIII. THE ANAPHORA OF SAINT CYRIL

THE EUCHARISTIC THANKSGIVING OF SAINT CYRIL

With Thee, O Lord, God of gods and Lord of lords—God, secret is His Essence which hath no limit, exalted above all things is His Essence which is incomprehensible—is a consuming fire and a life-giving fire.¹ God of gods and Lord of lords, whose throne is above the heavens, Lord of lords, of whose feet earth is the footstool, exalted and high who dwelleth amid the lights, exalted and hidden whose throne is in the heavens. . . .

With two wings of fire they cover their feet lest the devouring fire consume them, with two wings of brightness they cover their face lest the awful brightness smite them, with two wings of the spirit they fly 'to the ends of the earth',² the Seraphim with their . . .³ the Cherubim with their praises, the angels according to their hosts, the watchers according to their orders, the chiefs of the watchers according to their ranks, the angels of fire in their brightness, the spiritual ones in their essence give thanks and praise with an awesome voice; they cry and say with a great and loud voice, and crying, thus they say, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord of hosts (in full).

¹ There is some difficulty about the construction of this first sentence, but the general sense is clear.

² The MS. has 'on the ends of the Spirit'. The word for 'wings' and that for 'ends' differ only in one letter, so perhaps, 'on the wings of the Spirit' should be read.

³ The MS. reads 'their heads', which seems unsuitable in the context. I cannot suggest any word for which it may be a mistake. 'Heads' may have the sense of 'chiefs', but this does not seem to suit the rest of the sentence.

The deacon saith: Answer ye.

The priest saith: And we also say together with them, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord . . . Holy art Thou, awful is Thy holiness, the Father of our Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who is alone, and Thou alone art His Father in truth. . . .

Mention is then made of the Eternal Generation and Essence of the Son, His Incarnation, Passion, Death, Burial, Resurrection, Appearance to the disciples, Ascension, Session, Second Coming.¹

The deacon saith: Ye who sit (arise).

The priest saith: Yea, O Lord, Thou restorest all by Thy Word, the dead whom Thou didst raise by Thy death. . . .

The deacon saith: (Look) to the east.

The priest saith: To Thee we offer this pure and holy oblation before Thee. For the sake of Abel and Seth and Noah and Melchizedek, for the sake of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, for the sake of Moses and Aaron and all the prophets, for the sake of Simon Peter and John the Baptist and all the apostles, for the sake of David and King Hezekiah, and Constantine, and all kings who have entered into rest in the true faith. . . .

For the sake of every mouth and tongue that hath confessed the name of our Lord Jesus Christ Thy Son and Thy Beloved, whom Thou lovest, to whom, etc.

The deacon saith: For the sake of the blessed.

The priest saith: For them and for all, our Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ, Thy Church worshippeth Thee and Thy Bride extolletH Thee; by the benefits of the exalted ones, by the consecration of the Seraphim, and by the amazement of the Cherubim, by the thanksgiving of the angels, by the prayers of the watchers, and by the perfection of the saints, by the purity of Adam, and by the almsgiving of Noah, and by the acceptance of Abraham, by the goodness of Isaac. . . .

¹ In connection with the Burial occurs here also, as in the Anaphora of The 318 (p. 106), the phrase 'they buried Him in a sepulchre of three cubits'.

Further mention of Old Testament saints and apostles and unnamed Christian worthies.

and by the prayer of our Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ which ascended to the Father.

In that night in which He was betrayed He took bread in His holy and blessed hands which were without spot; He looked up to heaven to Thee His Father, He gave thanks, blessed and brake, and said: Take, eat; this bread is My Body, which is broken for you and given for the redemption of all the world, by which sin is forgiven.

And again, after they had supped, He took the cup, He gave thanks blessed and hallowed, and said unto His disciples, Take, drink; this cup is My Blood of the new covenant which is poured out for you for the redemption of all the world, by which sin is forgiven.

Yea, O Lord our God, hear the prayer of Thy servants and receive those who worship Thee. Before Thy face a sword¹ (?) of fire flameth; revealed and opened are the heavens in Thy righteousness and by Thy will. Thy Living and Holy Spirit is sent forth; may He descend and come and rest on this bread and cup, may He bless and hallow (them), and may it be unto us the communion of the Body and Blood of Thy beloved Son, our Lord and our God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, that it may be for remission of guilt to those who offer it and for forgiveness of sin to those who receive it.

And to all those who in true faith partake and receive of it, be it unto them for compassion and for mercy, for healing and for help, for life of soul and body, for remission of guilt and for forgiveness of sin and for resurrection from the dead and for new life. Amen.

Prayer of the Fraction.

To Thee, O Lord, we have lifted up our eyes, longing for the descent of the Holy Spirit, and Thee we worship on the knees of our hearts, and to Thee we bow the heads of our minds and spirits. Sanctify us, O Lord, by Thy holiness, and cleanse us in Thy mercy and make us worthy participants to receive Thy holy mystery. Let not these coals of fire which we have laid before Thee (even) before Thy holy altar be to us for condemnation, and let not this bread of God which we have broken in faith be to us for punishment, because we have not purified our souls. It is a fearful thing (that) the lips have opened to eat fire and to devour the live coal, if the heart have not purified its inmost part from deceit; it is a fearful thing to look on the putting to death of the pure Bridegroom within His courts; it is a fearful thing to see the slaying of the Son of the living God before His heavenly Father; it is a fearful thing to draw nigh to the brightness of the Godhead and to touch the flashing of the glory. Let us purify ourselves to receive Him, and sanctify our souls to partake of Him.

Pray ye.

And let us say, Glory be to the Father who was pleased that the pure victim¹ should be sacrificed, Glory be to the Son who is the sacrifice, the pure victim (and) Glory be to the Holy Spirit.

Be this bread the body of the pure victim.

Three names, one God, three Persons, one Nature,¹ three Hypostases, one Essence. To Him be glory from the mouth of the angel watchers and to Him holiness from the mouth of the prophets and apostles now and ever and until His coming again.

The deacon saith: Standing (bow your heads).

The priest saith: The Father is with the Son and with the Holy Spirit before hours and days, before times and years. There is no precedence of the First above the Second nor of the Second above the Third² . . . united without alteration, joined without intermingling, existing in the Trinity, and holden in the Unity, equal in hypostasis and equal in splendour and glory.

Continuation about the Essence of the Son and His Incarnation.

Pilot of the Soul, in Basil (and so on).

At the end, but apparently not connected with this Anaphora are eleven similar, but not identical, versions of a Hymn commencing, The Hosts of the angels of the Saviour stand before Him, and crown the Body and Blood of our Lord. (See above in the Anaphora of the Apostles, and note in Brightman, p. 235).

¹ The word means literally 'Face', but it seems to be used in the sense of 'Nature'.

² Here follow the words 'How great is the course of the lightnings and how great the flapping of the eagle's wings'. They seem absolutely meaningless in the context.

INTRODUCTION

The publication of this volume is long overdue. The draft copy was finished years ago, but several reasons have contributed to its delay. The main reason was the retirement of Sister Romaine Theisen, who was not only a good typist, but also, through the experience she acquired from typing Vols V-IX, capable of reading my handwriting, even of detecting spelling mistakes in the transliterated Ge'ez texts. I was extremely fortunate that Mrs. Marianne Hansen, then administrative assistant to the Director, was willing to type the descriptions. Her many years with the typewriter made the transition smoother than I feared, but then family problems interfered.

The second important reason for the delay was the Library's decision to produce the volume by computer. I am happy with the decision because, as readers of this volume will agree, this volume looks much nicer than its predecessors. But learning to command this modern weapon (or taking commands from it) was not easy.

Thirdly, this volume contains Project Nos. 4001-5000, that is, twice the number of descriptions which otherwise would have been the contents of two volumes.

As in some of the previous volumes, there are a number of project numbers whose microfilms, for reasons we cannot explain, were never received. They include 4049, 4094, 4097-4105, 4117, 4146, 4148-4158, 4161, 4175, 4221, 4243, 4244, 4292, 4600, 4690, 4755, 4776, 4837, and 4861. Some of these, e.g. 4148-4158, may be numbers inadvertently omitted from the series.

As with the manuscripts described in the previous volumes, only those that I consider the most important are described in detail. Bibliographical references are not repeated for manuscripts that contain the same text. The reader may have to locate the project number of the text where the necessary references are supplied. As a rule, it is either the first or the first better text.

As the index of libraries shows, we are still in Shoa, with only a few manuscripts from a few churches and private libraries in Wallo. Shoa churches are not famed for owning old manuscripts and non-service books. Accordingly, this huge volume does not contain a proportionate number of rare texts. Yet a few are noteworthy, especially EML 4129-2; 4194; 4298-3; 4346; 4380, 4408-14; 4434, 4493-4; 4553; 4637; 4644-3; 4667; 4769; 4906(varia); and 4979-4(1). The volume also contains an "adequate" number of manuscripts against smoking and chewing tobacco (see index "smoking, note against.").

Colleagues and teachers in the field of Ethiopian Studies, especially Professors Walter Harrelson, Edward Ullendorff, Lanfranco Ricci, and Wolf Leslau, have shown continuing interest in this project. Dr. Cowley corresponded with me until the last days of his life. In fact, it was at my request and to facilitate the cataloguing of New Testament manuscripts that he included in his review of VII "an outline classification of prefatory material in Geez New Testament MSS", JSS, Vol. 29, no. 2 (1984), pp. 327-338, Cowley (Review, 1984), see List of Abbreviations. I will miss his watchful eye and helpful hand. Professor William F. Macomber has not participated directly in the preparation of this volume but the system I follow is his, as I learned it from him. Father Hilary Thimmesh, President of Saint John's University until this year, took it upon himself that the cataloguing of EML should not be interrupted for lack of funds. The computer was tamed so as to become an obedient servant through the indefatigable efforts of Father Peregrin J. Berres, Dr. Jonathan Black and Mr. Richard Wyman. Dr. Julian G. Plante was, as usual, helpful in facilitating the work of the cataloguing. My special thanks go to Mrs. Hansen who always encouraged me to make whatever changes I wanted in the copy which she had so carefully typed.
